A Young Hindoo Scapegrace, of Some Edu- cation, fell into very bad habits, and finding himself one day in financial extremity, he stole some money, about three dollars, from his aunt, with whom he lived. 'Passing along the road one evening," says the missionary, who relates the incident, "he found lying in his path a small Christian book, entitled, 'The Heart Book,' translated and printed in his own language. On reading it his attention was arrested, and his conscience aroused. He went home, humbly confessed his theft, and restored the money. For six months he read and re-read the graphic description of his own heart-workings in the little book. His conscience, so seared and dead before, now gave him no rest. His aunt advised him to go to a friend in a near village, who had a larger book, which they called 'God's Word.' He went, borrowed the friend's Bible, and read it as he had read the Heart Book. The Holy Spirit wrought upon him as he read, He was converted, accepted Christ, ceased all idolatrous worship and rites, and was baptised. His family persecuted him, as a matter of course, and cast him out, and even performed his funeral rites, but he lives, an earnest, happy Christian, rejoicing in the salvation he has found."

The Unexpected Beauty of the Scene.— "There was a poor blind boy—not poor in circumstances, but poor because of his affliction—whose mother took him to all the most eminent doctors, and oculists, to see if anything could possibly be done for him. Only one practitioner gave him any hope. He said if the lady left the boy under his charge for so long, he thought he could enable her son to see. The mother gladly agreed. The boy was left, and at the end of the time was taken home by his mother. On a certain day the bandages were to be taken from his eyes. The day came, a glorious day of sunshine, and there were many friends gathered at the house. The bandage was at length taken from the lad's eyes. He gave one look around him, then running to the couch he hid his face and wept. His mother asked him why he wept. 'Oh mother,' he said, 'why did you not tell me it was all so beautiful?' 'But I tried to tell you, my boy,' she replied. 'Not that it was so beautiful,' persisted the boy.' No matter how faithfully he was told, for want of vision he could not apprehend it; he must see for himself. Similarly, when we tell the sinner of the beauty of Christ, His love and mercy and grace, in a manner they seem to understand, but they cannot realise it in anything of its fulness, until they have seen Him for themselves."

LONGEVITY.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached Last Sunday Morning, June 10, 1888.

"With long life will I satisfy him." Ps. 91 : 16.

Religion a Chariot, not a Hearse—Conducive to Long Life—I. By making Care of Health a Duty—The Caligraphy of God—The Whispering-Gallery of the Soul—An Ill-used Watch—II. By Protesting Against Dissipation—Lives of Genius Curtailed by Sin—Illustrious Examples—III. By Relieving Worry—A Twenty-Millionaire Friend—The Wheels of a Carpet Factory—An Almighty Sedative—IV. By Assuring Post-Mortem Happiness—Four Experiments—The Voice of the Rainbow.

THROUGH the mistake of its friends, religion has been chiefly associated with sick-beds and graveyards. The whole subject, to many people, is odorous with chlorine and carbolic acid. There are people who cannot pronounce the word religion without hearing in it the clipping chisel of the tombstone cutter. It is high time that this thing were changed, and that religion, instead of being represented as a hearse to carry out the dead, should be represented as a chariot in which the living are to triumph.

Religion, so far from subtracting from one's vitality, is a glorious addition. It is sanative, curative, hygienic. It is good for the eyes, good for the ears, good for the spleen, good for the digestion, good for the nerves, good for the muscles. When David, in another part of the Psalms, prays that religion may be dominant, he does not speak of it as a mild sickness, or an emaciation, or an attack of moral and spiritual cramp ; he speaks of it as "the

of all nations"; while God, in the text, promises longevity to the pious, saying : "With long life will I satisfy him." The fact is that men and women die too soon. It is high time that religion joined the hand of medical science in attempting to improve human longevity. Adam lived nine hundred and thirty years. Methuselah lived nine hundred and sixty-nine years. As late in the history of the world as Vespasian, there were, at one time, in his empire forty-five people one hundred and thirty-five years old. So far down as the sixteenth century, Peter Zartan died at one hundred and eighty-five years of age. I do not say that religion will ever take the race back to antediluvian longevity, but I do say the length of life will be increased.

It is said in Isaiah : "The child shall die a hundred years old." Now, if according to Scripture, the child is to be a hundred years old, may not the men and women reach to three hundred and four hundred and five hundred? The fact is that we are mere dwarfs and skeletons compared with some of the generations that are to come. Take the African race. They have been under bondage for centuries. Give them a chance, and they develop a Frederick Douglass or a Toussaint L'Ouverture. And if the white race shall be brought from under the serfdom of sin, what shall be the body? what shall be the soul? Religion has only just touched our world. Give it full power for a few centuries, and who can tell what will be the strength of man, and the beauty of woman, and the longevity of all?

My design is to show that practical religion is the friend of long life. I prove it, first, from the fact that it makes the care of our health

A Positive Christian Duty.

Whether we shall keep early or late hours, whether we shall take food digestible or indigestible, whether there shall be thorough or incomplete mastication, are questions very often deferred to the realm of whimsicality; but the Christian man lifts this whole problem of health into the accountable and the divine. He says: "God has given me this body, and He has called it the temple of the Holy Ghost, and to deface its altars, or mar its walls, or crumble its pillars, is a God-defying sacrilege." He sees God's caligraphy in every page—anatomical and physiological. He says: "God has given me a wonderful body for noble purposes."

That arm with thirty-two curious bones wielded by forty-six curious muscles, and all under the brain's telegraphy ; three hundred and fifty pounds of blood rushing through the heart every hour, the heart in twenty-four hours beating 100,000 times, during the twenty-four hours overcoming resistances amounting to 224,000,000 pounds of weight, during the same time the lungs taking in fifty-seven hogsheads of air, and all this mechanism not more mighty than delicate and easily disturbed and demolished.

The Christian man says to himself : "If I hurt my nerves, if I hurt my brain, if I hurt any of my faculties, I insult God and call for Dire Retribution."

Why did God tell the Levites not to offer to Him in sacrifice animals imperfect and diseased? He meant to tell us in all the ages that we are to offer to God our very best physicial condition, and a man who through irregular or gluttonous eating ruins his health, is not offering to God such a sacrifice. Why did Paul write for his cloak at Troas? Why should such a great man as Paul be anxious about a thing so insignificant as an overcoat? It was because he knew that with pneumonia and rheumatism he would not be worth half as much to God and the Church as with respiration easy and foot free.

An intelligent Christian man would consider it an absurdity to kneel down at night and pray and ask God's protection, while at the same time he kept the windows of his bedroom tight shut against fresh air. He would just as soon think of going out on the bridge between New York and Brooklyn, leaping off and then praying to God to keep him from getting hurt. Just as long as you defer this whole subject of physical health to the realm of whimsicality or to the pastry-cook, or to the butcher, or to the baker, or to the apothecary, or to the clothier, you are not acting like a Christian. Take care of all your physical forces—nervous, muscular, bone, brain, cellular tissue—for all you must be brought to judgment.

Smoking your nervous system into fidgets, burning out the coating of your stomach with wine logwooded and strychnined, walking with thin shoes to make your feet look delicate, pinched at the waist until you are nigh cut in two, and neither part worth anything, groaning about sick headache and palpitation of the heart, which you think came from God, when they came from

Your own Folly.

What right has any man or woman to deface the temple of the Holy Ghost? What is the ear? Why, it is the whispering-gallery of the human soul. What is the eye? It is the observatory God constructed, its telescope sweeping the heavens. What is the hand? An instrument so wonderful that when the Earl of Bridgewater bequeathed in his will $40,000 for treatises to be written on the wisdom, power, and goodness of God, Sir Charles Bell, the great English anatomist and surgeon, found his greatest illustration in the construction of the human hand, devoting his whole book to that subject.

So wonderful are these bodies that God names His own attributes after different parts of them. His omniscience—it is God's eye. His omnipresence—it is God's ear. His omnipotence—it is God's arm. The upholstery of the midnight heavens—it is the work of God's fingers. His life-giving power—it is the breath of the Almighty. His dominion—"the government shall be upon His shoulder." A body so divinely honored and so divinely constructed, let us be careful not to abuse it.

When it becomes a Christian duty to take care of our health, is not the whole tendency toward longevity? If I toss my watch about recklessly, and drop it on the pavement, and wind it up any time of day or night I happen to think of it, and often let it run down, while you are careful with your watch, and never abuse it, and wind it up just at the same hour every night, and put it in a place where it will not suffer from the violent changes of atmosphere, which watch will last the longer? Common sense answers. Now, the human body is God's watch. You see the hands of the watch, you see the face of the watch ; but the beating of the heart is the ticking of the watch. Oh, be careful and do not let it run down!

Again : I remark that practical religion is a friend of longevity in the fact that it is a protest against dissipations, which injure and destroy the health. Bad men and women live a short life. Their

them. I know hundreds of good old men, but I do not know half a dozen bad old men. Why? They do not get old. Lord Byron died at Missolonghi at thirty-six years of age, himself his own Mazeppa, his unbridled passions the horse that dashed with him into the desert. Edgar A. Poe died at Baltimore at thirty-eight years of age. The black raven that alighted on the bust above his door was delirium tremens—

"Only this and nothing more."

Napoleon Bonaparte lived only just beyond mid-life, then died at St. Helena, and one of his doctors said that his disease was induced by excessive snuffing. The hero of Austerlitz, the man who by one step of his foot in the centre of Europe shook the earth, killed by a snuff-box! Oh, how many people we have known who have not lived out half their days because of their dissipations and indulgences! Now practical religion is a protest against all dissipations of any kind.

"But," you say, "professors of religion have fallen, professors of religion have got drunk, professors of religion have misappropriated trust funds, professors of religion have absconded." Yes ; but they

before they did their morality. If a man on a White Star line steamer bound for Liverpool, in mid-Atlantic jumps overboard and is drowned, is that anything against the White Star line? Has capacity to take the man across the ocean? And if a man jumps over the gunwale of his religion and goes down never to rise, is that any reason for your believing that religion has no capacity to take the man clear through? In the one case, if he had kept to the steamer his body would have been saved ; in the other case, if he had kept to his religion, his morals would have been saved.

There are aged people who would have been dead twenty-five years ago but for the defence and the equipoise of religion. You have no more natural resistance than hundreds of people who lie in the cemeteries to-day, slain by their own vices. The doctors made their case as kind and pleasant as they could, and it was called congestion of the brain, or something else ; but the snakes and the blue flies that seemed to crawl over the pillow in the sight of the delirious patient showed what was the matter with him. You, the aged Christian man, walled along by that unhappy one until you came to the golden pillar of a Christian life. You went to the right ; he went to the left. That is all the difference between you. Oh, if this religion is a protest against all forms of dissipation, then it is an illustrious friend of longevity. "With long life will I satisfy him."

Again : religion is a friend of longevity in the fact that

of our temporalities. It is not work that kills men, it is worry. When a man becomes a genuine Christian he makes over to God not only his affections, but his family, his business, his reputation, his body, his mind, his soul, everything. Industrious he will be, but never worrying, because God is managing his affairs. How can he worry about business when God answer to his prayers God tells him when to buy and when to sell ; and if he gain, that is best, and if he lose, that is best?"

Suppose you had a supernatural neighbor who came in and said : "Sir, I want you to call on me in every exigency ; I am your fast friend

I could fall back on $20,000,000; I can foresee a panic ten years; I hold the controlling stock in thirty of the best monetary institutions of New York; whenever you are in trouble, call on me and I will help you; you can have my money and you can have my influence; here is my hand in pledge for it." How much would you worry about business? Why, you would say: "I'll do the best I can, and then I'll depend on my friend's generosity for the rest."

Now more than that is promised to every Christian business man. God says to him: "I own New York and London and St. Petersburg and Pekin; and Australia and California are mine; I can foresee a panic a million years; I have all the resources of the universe, and I am your fast friend; when you get in business trouble or any other trouble, call on me and I will help; here is my hand in pledge of omnipotent deliverance." How much should that man worry? Not much. What lion will dare to put his paw on that Daniel? Is there not rest in this? Is there not in this? "Oh," you say, "here is a man who asked God for a blessing in a certain enterprise, and he lost five thousand dollars in it. Explain that." I will. Yonder is a factory, and one wheel is going north, and the other wheel is going south, and one wheel plays laterally and the other plays vertically. I go to the manufacturer and say: "O manufacturer, your machinery is a contradiction. Why do you not make all the wheels go one way?" "Well," he says, "I have made them to go in opposite directions on purpose, and they produce the right result. You go down-stairs and examine the carpets we are turning out in this establishment and you will see." I go down on the other floor and I see the carpets, and I am obliged to confess that though the wheels in that factory go in opposite directions, they turn out a beautiful result; and while I am standing there looking at the exquisite fabric an old Scripture passage comes into my mind: "All things work together for good to them who love God." Is there not rest in that? Is there not longevity in that?

Suppose a man is all the time worried about his reputation? One man says he lies, another says he is stupid, another says he is dishonest, and half a dozen printing establishments attack him, and he is in a great state of

and fume, and cannot sleep; but religion comes to him and says: "Man, God is on your side; he will take care of your reputation; if God be for you, who can be against you?" How much would that man worry about his reputation? Not much. If that broker who some years ago on Wall Street, after he had lost money, sat down and wrote a farewell letter to his wife before he blew his brains out—if instead of taking out of his pocket a pistol he had taken out a well-read New Testament, there would have been no less suicide. O nervous and feverish people of the world, try this almighty sedative. You will live twenty-five years longer under its soothing power. It is not chloral that you want, or morphine that you want; it is the gospel of Christ. "With long life will I satisfy him." Again: practical religion is a friend of longevity in the fact that it removes all corroding fear about a future existence. Every man wants to know what is to become of him. If you get on board a rail train, you want to know at what point it is going to stop; if you get on board a ship, you want to know into what harbor it is going to run, and if you should tell me you have no interest in what is to be

Your Future Destiny,

I would, in as polite a way as I know how, tell you I did not believe you. Before I had this matter settled with reference to my future existence, the question almost worried me into ruin of health. The anxieties men have upon this subject put together would make a martyrdom. This is a state of awful unhealthiness. There are people who fret themselves to death for fear of dying.

I want to take the strain off your nerves and the depression off your soul, and I make two or three experiments. Experiment first: When you go out of this world it does not make any difference whether you have been good or bad, or whether you believed truth or error, you will go straight to glory. "Impossible," you say; "my common sense as well as my religion teaches that the bad and the good cannot live together forever. You give me no comfort in that experiment." Experiment the second: When you leave this world you will go into an intermediate state where you can get converted and prepared for heaven. "Impossible," you say; "as the tree falleth, so it must lie, and I cannot postpone to an intermediate state reformation which ought to have been effected in this state." Experiment the third: There is no future world; when a man dies, that is the last of him. Do not worry about what you are to do in another state of being; you will not do anything. "Impossible," you say; "there is something that tells me that but the preface to life; there is something that tells me that on this side of the grave I only get started, and that I shall go on forever; my power to think says 'forever,' my affections say 'forever,' my capacity to enjoy or suffer, 'forever.'"

Well, you defeat me in my three experiments. I have only one more to make, and if you defeat me in that I am exhausted: A mighty One on a knoll back of Jerusalem one day, the skies filled with forked lightnings and the earth filled with volcanic disturbances, turned his pale and agonized face toward the heavens and said: "I take the sins and sorrows of the ages into my own heart. I am the expiation. Witness earth and heaven and hell, I am the expiation." And the hammer struck him, and the spears punctured him, and heaven thundered: "The wages of sin is death!" "The soul that sinneth, it shall die!" "I will by no means clear the guilty!" Then there was silence for half an hour, and the lightnings were drawn back into the scabbard of the sky, and the earth ceased to quiver, and all the colors of the sky began to shift into woven out of the falling tears of Jesus, and there was red as of the bloodshedding, and there was blue as of the bruising, and there was green as of the heavenly foliage, and there was orange as of the day-dawn. And along the line of the blue I saw the words: "I was bruised for their iniquities." And along the line of the red I saw the words: "The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin." And along the line of the green I saw the words: "The leaves of the Tree of Life for the healing of the nations." And along the line of the orange I saw the words: "The day-spring from on high hath visited us."

And then I saw the storm was over and the rainbow rose higher and higher until it seemed retreating to another heaven, and planting one column of its colors on one side the eternal hill, and planting the other column of its colors on the other side the eternal hill, it rose upward and upward "and behold there was a rainbow about the throne.' Accept that sacrifice and Quit Worrying.

Take the tonic, the inspiration, the longevity of this truth. Religion is sunshine; that is health. Religion is fresh air and pure water; they are healthy. Religion is warmth; that is healthy. Ask all the doctors and they will tell you that a quiet conscience and pleasant anticipations are hygienic. I offer you perfect peace now and hereafter.

What do you want in the future world? Tell me and you shall have it. Orchards? There are the trees with twelve manner of fruits, yielding fruit every month. Water scenery? There is the River of Life, from under the throne of God, clear as crystal, and the sea of glass mingled with fire. Do you want music? There is the oratorio of the Creation led on by Adam, and the oratorio of the Red Sea led on by Moses, and the oratorio of the Messiah led on by St. Paul, while the archangel with swinging baton controls the one hundred and forty-four thousand who make up the orchestra.

The Other Side of the Grave.

Do you want reunion? There are your dead children waiting to kiss you, waiting to embrace you, waiting to twist garlands in your hair. You have been accustomed to open the door on this side the sepulchre. I open the door on the other side the sepulchre. You have been accustomed to walk in the wet grass on the top of the grave. I show you the under side of the grave; the bottom has fallen out and the long ropes with which the pall-bearers let down your dead, let them clear through into heaven.

Glory be to God for this robust, healthy religion. It will have a tendency to make you live long in this world, and in the world to come you will have eternal life. "With long life will I satisfy Him."

A SCOFFER'S AVOWAL.

A LADY who is doing Christian work among the garrison at Gibraltar, relates a remarkable incident which occurred a few weeks ago. She says: "One evening a Rifleman, well known in the regiment as an atheist, came in to do Satan a service. He meant to snatch away the seed sown, to refute the speaker's arguments in the barrack-room, and throw ridicule upon the whole mission. My subject was, 'What think ye of Christ?' The unbeliever remained to the after-meeting, for the purpose of obtaining a knowledge of our proceedings, and that he might deter some anxious inquirer or 'chaff' a comrade. I asked him, 'What think you of Christ?' 'Thank you, I don't believe, and I don't want to,' he replied. 'Whether you believe or not, here is a fact, that you will have to meet God and render to Him an account. Now, what answer will you give Him to the truth you have heard to-night?' 'If there be a God, I'll take my chance," he answered flippantly, and then added, 'As for hell, I don't believe in it.' After a few more solemn words I left him. He attended regularly, and his presence was by no means cheering to us, as we feared he was undoing the good work among his comrades. God had purposes of grace towards him, and, while we refrained from speaking to him again, His Spirit was dealing with his soul. One evening, on inviting anxious seekers to stand up, our unbelieving friend rose, evidently in much emotion. Prayer was made for him; he was then personally dealt with. 'I confess that I came the first night to mock; but the words haunted me. All next day I was unhappy. I came again and again. I have felt miserable; but to-night I seem to feel there is hope for me.'

"As one who had publicly denied his Creator, and through whose influence a Bible-reader had apostatized, it was thought fitting that he should make a public confession of Christ. Accordingly, one Sunday evening at the large meeting, in the presence of many unconverted who knew him as an atheist and blasphemer, he told the story of his change in a few simple words: "I denied there was a God, I ridiculed the Bible, I gloried in infidelity, but now I do love Jesus. He has saved me, and I wish all my comrades would come to Him and be saved too. I only wish I could undo the harm I have done.' It was a scene calculated to draw tears of thanksgiving and sympathy."

NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION—1888.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled, "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting 75 cents. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a résumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. THE CONVERSION OF THE WORLD.

By Rev. L. W. Munhall, M. D.*

The Scripture Millennium — Events Antedating the Predicted 1,000 Years' Reign of Christ— State of the World When Christ Comes to it — The Days of Noah and of Lot—The Parable of the Wheat and the Tares—The Virgins and the Leaven — The Progress of Christianity.

SOME inquire, "Do not the Scriptures teach that the world is to be converted?" I answer, Not by a single word! But how about these prophecies?

"Ask of Me, and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession." (Psalm 2 : 8). "The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together; and a little child shall lead them. And the cow and the bear shall feed; their young ones shall lie down together: and the lion shall eat straw like the ox. And the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice's den. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all My holy mountain: for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea. (Isaiah 11 : 6-9).

"But this shall be the covenant that I will make with the house of Israel: After those days, saith the Lord, I will put My law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts; and will be their God, and they shall be My people. And they shall teach no more every man his neighbor, and every man his brother, saying. Know the Lord, for they shall all know Me, from the least of them unto the greatest of them, saith the Lord: for I will forgive their iniquity, and I will remember their sins no more." (Jeremiah 31 : 33-34.)

I answer that pre-millennialists believe in the

of them. They believe in a Millennium during which the devil is really bound, with nothing to "hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain," when "the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea." Not the sort of Millennium some think we are having now. Not even a Millennium where Christian principles will dominate the civil governments of earth, as some post-millennialists claim; but a Millennium where all bow to the mild sway of the sceptre of the King of Heaven. The post-millennialists hold that the Church is to march forward in its conquests until the world is converted, or, at least dominated by the principles of the doctrines of Christ, and thus shall these prophecies be fulfilled. The pre-millennialists believe that through the Church, by the preaching of the gospel, all who are to be saved during this dispensation, will be by accepting Christ as Saviour; and then, when God's purposes in grace for this dispensation are accomplished,

to save her from the fires of the great tribulation, at the end of which time He returns with His bride to judge the world in righteousness and destroy the antichrist and his armies, the man of sin "with the brightness of His coming. (II Thess. 2 : 8.)

A careful contextual examination of the above mentioned and similar prophecies, will reveal the fact that their fulfilment will be accomplished by terrible judgments. For instance: the things prophesied of in Ps. 2 : 8, are thus introduced in the following verse: "Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron; thou shalt dash them to pieces like a potter's vessel." (Ps. 2 : 9.) The context to Isa. 2 : 6–9 indicates the same thing: "But with righteousness shall He judge the poor, and reprove with equity for the meek of the earth: and He shall smite the earth with the rod of His mouth, and with the breath of His lips shall He slay the wicked" (Isa. 11 : 4; Jer. 31 : 33, 34) has reference to Israel and Judah only, as the context clearly shows: "Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah: not according to the covenant that I made with their fathers, in the day that I took them by the hand to bring them out of the land of Egypt; which my covenant they brake, although I was a husband unto them, saith the Lord" (Jer. 31 : 31, 32). The stone cut out of the mountain in Dan. 2 : 35, that shall ultimately fill the whole earth, smites the feet of the image (the image represents the world powers) and dashes it to pieces, and it becomes "like the chaff of the summer threshing floors," and so on of the rest of these prophecies to the last.

The renowned Dr. Chalmers was once lecturing to some students on the closing scenes of this dispensation. As he was nearing the conclusion of the lecture, he was interrupted and compelled to leave the class hastily in answer to an imperative summons. As he gathered his hat and coat hurriedly in leaving, he said, "Young gentlemen, think as you will about these matters, one thing is absolutely certain, the dispensation of the Spirit will close with a smash."

But how about Phil. 2 : 10, 11 : "That at the name of Jesus every knee shall bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; and that every tongue shall confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father." Is the bowing of the knee and confessing that Jesus is Lord equivalent to salvation? If so, then the "final restorationists" are right when, chiefly upon the testimony of these verses, they claim that not only all the inhabitants of earth shall at last be found among the "blood-washed throng" in heaven, but of hell also, together with the devil and all demons. But they are not right, for this Scripture teaches no such thing. The time is coming when the devil and all atheists, infidels, and blasphemers will be obliged to kneel and confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father; and every eye shall see Him, and they also which pierced Him, and all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of Him" (Rev. 1 : 7), but it will avail them nought.

When "He Cometh With Clouds,

The Word of God does not teach that the world is to be converted. It teaches most explicitly that it will not be. Let it speak for itself as to what will be the condition of affairs when He shall return:

"But as the days of Noe were, so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be. For as in the days that were before the flood, they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noe entered into the ark, and knew not until the flood came and took them all away; so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be." (Matt. 24 : 37-39.) Surely, no one will claim that the world was converted in the days of Noah. Yet as it was then, so shall it be when Christ returns.

"Likewise also as it was in the days of Lot; they did eat, they drank, they bought, they sold, they planted, they builded. But the same day that Lot went out of Sodom, it rained fire and brimstone from heaven, and destroyed them all. Even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of Man is revealed." (Luke 17 : 28-30.) Sodom didn't look much like it was converted in Lot's time. No more will the world be when Christ is revealed. See Jude, verse seventh.

"This know also, that in the last days perilous times shall come. For men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, truce-breakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good, traitors, heady, highminded, lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God; having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof; from such turn away." (II Tim 3 : 1-5.) Here is of the condition of affairs immediately preceding the advent of the Lord; but we find nothing at all resembling a converted world in the narrative.

"Then Jesus sent the multitude away, and went into the house, and His disciples came unto Him, saying, Declare unto us the parable of the tares of the field. He answered and said unto them, He that soweth the good seed is the Son of Man; the field is the world; the good seed are the children of the kingdom: but the tares are the children of the wicked one: the enemy that sowed them is the devil; the harvest is the end of the world, and the reapers are the angels. As therefore the tares are gathered and burned in the fire, so shall it be in the end of this world" (age). Matt. 13 : 36–40.

This parable, and the Lord's own interpretation of it, leaves no doubt whatever but that when He returns there will be multitudes of unsaved people on the earth:

Tares Growing with the Wheat.

If the parable of the ten virgins represents the professing church, half of it will be found unregenerated when the Lord returns, and the other half asleep. The exegetes are pretty well agreed that "leaven," in the Scriptures, signifies corruption, and the kingdom of heaven the professing church, in part. If these conclusions be true in every other case, why not in Matt. 13 : 33? "Another parable spake He unto them: The kingdom of heaven is like unto leaven, which a woman took, and hid in three measures of meal, till the whole was leavened." In this case this passage would signify that corrupting influences will work in the visible church until the whole is corrupted. Is not such interpretation justified by the question of the unjust judge, "Howbeit when the Son of man cometh, shall He find faith (the faith) on the earth?" (Luke 18 : 8, R. V.) Do not the sixth and nineteenth chapters of Revelation, inclusively, justify such interpretation? Has not this view of the case already come to pass once? Was not the professing church as corrupt as Satan could ever wish it to be for nearly a thousand years? Is man, naturally, any better that this condition of affairs should not occur again?

Let it be said there is nothing, save the word of inspiration, so convincing, that the church is a divine Institution, and, "that the gates of hell shall not prevail against her," as that she has lived and accomplished so much, to the glory of God, despite the formality worldliness, ignorance, and schisms that have marred her beauty and hindered her progress. She shall yet look "forth as the morning, fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners," (Song of Solomon 6 : 10.)

But, while this is so, it should not be forgotten that the Word of God, nowhere, by a single sentence, intimates that the world is to be converted before Christ comes. It does, however, teach that, "This Gospel of the Kingdom shall be preached in all the world (Greek, inhabited earth), for a witness unto all nations, and then shall the end come." (Matt. 24 : 14).

UNAPPRECIATED REWARDS.

No clearer evidence of the degradation of the Central African races and the difficulties of missionary work among them has been given than that contained in a report from Mr. Ousley, the missionary of the American Board at Kambini, who has been trying to stimulate the children in the schools by rewards, and describes the disappointing results in a letter to the Missionary Herald: He says: "We have noticed the desire, on the part of a number of the pupils, to absent themselves from the religious part of the schoolwork. One would not suspect small children of such a spirit, but we have noticed it too prominently of late to continue to offer a little work to those who come regularly to school whereby they may earn a wrap or garment, at the close of school.

"As yet very few appreciate the value of clothes, even after they have secured them. We naturally thought that the parents of the chil dren would be glad to have us furnish their children with work sufficient to earn something to wear. But it is the reverse. They prefer, seemingly, to have their children about them in an almost nude condition, rather than that they secure garments or wraps by working for them. In view of our desire to help them get something to cover their bodies, we have required of our scholars only three full hours' work per day for five days, which is the equivalent to about one fourth or one fifth of the market value of such articles in this part of the world. To our surprise and disappointment the parents of some of the children ceased to come to our services, as also to the school exercises, and their excuse is that we have not given them any clothes or anything to eat for coming. Not one in a hundred of the girls and the women would wear clothes even if they could get them as a free gift, and the men who really desire clothes generally contrive to buy them from the traders."

THE CHIEF PRIESTHOOD RENOUNCED.

A YOUNG man in Persia has voluntarily chosen to be a teacher, when, by abjuring the Christian faith, he might have been made chief priest of his sect. The Rev. S. G. Wilson, in the course of a letter to the Church, thus describes the case: During a recent tour in the southern portion of our field, I was impressed with the manifestations of the power the gospel is exerting upon Mussulmans. Our first stage brought us to a village of Ali-Alahis, a sect so heterodox as to be almost outside the pale of Islam. They always give a ready ear to Christian teaching. We have a convert here who belongs to the priestly family. His father was chief priest of the sect, but consented to put his son in our Tabriz school, where he received the truth. The son might have inherited the office if he had not rather chosen to suffer affliction with the people of God. He was known to all as a Christian. Last spring the school was reopened under his charge. He had offers of employment as teacher in their mosque, with a good family, if he would teach from their books, but he was desirous of doing the Lord's service. His instruction is largely from distinctly Christian books. After awhile the mujteheed (chief mollah) of Tabriz, who has the village tax for his perquisite, sent a demand that he give an account of himself for teaching from "American books," and the mollah, who was instrumental in closing the Mussulman department of our school at Tabriz, came to vex him; so that he has scarcely been able to keep his school together, and many of the people have broken off intercourse with him.

A PHYSICIAN'S EXPLANATION OF DIVINE HEALING.

PHYSICIANS as a rule are more sceptical about Divine Healing than other persons, as their training leads them to believe that only by medical treatment can disease be overcome. One case, however, of a physician frankly ascribing a cure to the intervention of Divine power is related in *Thy Healer this month. Mrs. Hudson, speaking at Bethshan said:

"A young girl named Mary Parker, living in Birmingham, suffered from spinal complaint, and was quite unable to sit up in bed. She had heard of the Lord's healing, and thought He might do for her as He had done for others. She saw the promise and believed it, and then she had a desire to be anointed. A clergyman was willing to anoint her, and she was anointed nine months before the healing came; but during that time she trusted perfectly in the Lord. The friends said it was fanaticism, and the doctors said she was incurable, but she kept on trusting. Yet, after the anointing she became worse. She had an attack of paralysis, and was cramped up in bed with her ancles one across the other. Her speech was also affected, her vocal organs seemed paralysed, but she went on trusting the Lord all the time. There was no anxiety whatever, but she was just resting in His promise, and knowing that when the time came she would be healed. One lady said to me: 'If Mary Parker is healed I shall believe in Divine Healing.' She came to me afterwards and said, rejoicing: 'O! Mary Parker is healed.' Well, this young girl went on in this state. First, her speech came back in four or five months, and she knew the Lord was working; and, at the end of nine months, after a day of great suffering, it seemed as if every joint in her body had become loosed, and she was suddenly made to sit up in bed. She told me this herself. She called to her mother and said: 'Mother, don't be frightened, the Lord's time is come,' and to her mother's glad surprise she rose from her bed and walked. 'When I turned the sheet down,' she said, 'I was surprised to find my legs perfectly straight, and then I walked.' Then the father and other members of the family were called up to rejoice with her. Mrs. Hudson described the visit of the doctor two days afterwards, and how he made her walk up and down the room and saw it was a perfect cure. He said: 'I have had nothing to do with this, it is a miracle of the olden times.'"

AN AFRICAN'S ABSTINENCE.

IN an encouraging report from the West Central African Mission of the American Board, published in the Missionary Herald, Mr. Currie mentions an incident which gave the missionaries much comfort. He says: An effort has been made in almost every place visited to sow some seeds of gospel truth. Many people have thus heard for the first time about Jesus and His love. Many have learned that there are white men in the country who seek to do them good and not evil. One of my boys, while on a journey for the first time, took his stand for Christ; and he has since shown that he was in earnest about what he then did. One of the men, on my last trip, refused to drink beer when it was presented to the carriers, and attended worship every night. Two others attended worship regularly, and frequently lingered, after the exercises were over, to ask questions about what they had heard. Often, while on the march, I could hear some of the men trying to sing the hymns they had heard us sing at worship. In one place, almost seven days' journey from here, I found that some of the people, while on their way to the ombala, had stopped at our schoolhouse, and learned a few truths from the preaching of one of the brethren, which they carried back to their own village and made known to others. These are small items, but they all have a bearing on the future of our work; and while we look for a large crop from bountiful sowing, it is not impossible to get a good plant from a single mustard seed.

A SERVICE IN MADAGASCAR.

THE character of the work done by missionaries in heathen lands, as well as an evidence of the power of the truth, may be seen in the following extracts from a report of the effort Mr. Shaw is making to reach the dark places of the island of Madagascar:

It was not without difficulty that he reached the benighted region of his labors; shipwreck was escaped as by a miracle, and many perils by sea and land were braved, both by the missionary and his devoted wife. The people of one dark village were "the whole of them more or less drunk." During Mr. Shaw's temporary absence from the village in which he settled, war broke out, and on his return home he found his medical and surgical skill in great demand, and soon became known far and near as a true friend of the people.

In an account of his work in a third village, he tells of the very tardy assemblage of men and women to listen to the gospel, as he preached under the shadow of some fine spreading trees. "I begin," he says, "in a chatty way, to tell them of the character of the God whose name they know, but only to fear, as the Creator and punisher. It is a grand new view to them that He is a God of love, and that He has sent His Son that those who believe on Him should have eternal life. We finish our impromptu service by my telling them I am going to speak to this great God but loving Father, and ask them to follow me in their thoughts with bowed head. In a few words, asking for light for them and blessing, we joined in the first prayer ever offered in that village. Before leaving them, they had promised to put up a building in which I could more conveniently talk to them than in the open air; and so we may hope that before very long a rough but commodious chapel will be erected there.

A LAWYER'S CONVERSION IN A CHURCH VESTIBULE.

AN incident which should encourage preachers who are apt to think that their sermons are wasted, is related by Dr. A. J. Gordon, of Boston, in his Watchword. He states that a clergyman had devoted great pains to the preparation of a sermon, which he hoped would be blessed to some members of his congregation who had hitherto been deaf to his appeals. He prayed earnestly over that sermon, and went to his church in a very intense frame of mind. But the night was stormy, and of those whom he was longing to reach, only three were present, and one of them slept through the sermon. He returned home in a dispirited mood. "That sermon was utterly wasted," he said to his wife, as they sat down after the service.

He was mistaken. The next morning a well-known lawyer came to see him, and told him his experience. He had started out that evening without an umbrella, and when the storm came on, he turned into the church vestibule to shelter. The door leading from the vestibule into the church was ajar, so he heard every word of the sermon. He listened with an interest that he was surprised at. It was his boast that he could live, and had always lived and prospered, without religion. He was a successful lawyer, with genial manners, which made him universally popular. He was charitable and generous, not from any sense of duty, but from a kindness of heart that made him willing to do anything to alleviate suffering or distress in others.

He believed himself to be thoroughly sincere, and he was merciless in discovering inconsistencies in the lives of those who professed to be Christians. He was the leader of a large circle of young men, who, admiring his character and talents, followed his example implicity in regard to religious matters. He had not entered the doors of a church for years, and it was only the fury of the elements that had driven him to seek a temporary shelter there this evening. Had the sermon been argumentative he would have sought arguments to refute it. But it was nothing of the kind; it was an earnest appeal to all to come to the Saviour, and he could not doubt that the speaker spoke from his heart.

A strange longing to know somewhat of this joy and peace in believing came over him, as he stood there alone in the darkness. He began to pray, and after he went home he was unable to rest until he had given himself to God, and the next morning he went to the preacher to tell him the joyful news.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Renomination of President Cleveland for the Presidency, and the nomination of Mr. Allen G. Thurman, of Ohio, for the Vice-Presidency, by the Democratic National Convention, at St Louis, last week, were both more unanimous than the political prophets had led the country to expect. In spite of the dissatisfaction of a section of the party with the attempt Mr. Cleveland made in the early part of his term to fulfil his pledges to the civil service reformers who supported him, and in spite of the disapproval of another section with his message on the tariff, he was nominated with an enthusiasm truly remarkable. There was no balloting, no show of opposition; the wave of enthusiasm carried the Convention away, and the nomination was made by acclamation. When the time came for filling the second place on the ticket, there was but little less unanimity. Gen. Black formally withdrew his name by telegraph, in the interest of harmony, as the Convention was evidently overwhelmingly in favor of Mr. Thurman. The name of Gov. Isaac P. Gray, of Indiana, was duly presented, and his nomination urged, on the ground that Mr. Thurman being already seventy-six years of age, there was a possibility of his dying before the completion of his term, when "the Senate might be cursed by another Ingalls." But even that possibility did not weigh with the Convention, and Thurman was nominated at the first call of States.

The Platform Adopted by the Convention was not constructed without a protracted struggle in the Committee on Resolutions. It would, however, have been a stultification if the Convention, after re-nominating Mr. Cleveland, had failed to give a clear expression of its adherence to the principles of his tariff message. Mr. Edward Cooper, of New York, did his utmost, it would appear, to prevent this, doubtless realizing how difficult it will be to carry New York and other doubtful States on any platform tending even slightly in the direction of free trade. But he was outvoted, though not convinced, and he took the precaution of having his dissent from the action of his fellow-members of the Committee publicly announced by the Chairman of the Convention. As finally agreed upon, the tariff plank of the platform not only endorses the President's message, but accepts the Mills' Bill as its practical outcome. It declares that "The Democratic Party in the United States in National Convention assembled, renews the pledge of its fidelity to Democratic faith, and reaffirms the platform adopted by its representatives in the convention of 1884, and indorses the views expressed by President Cleveland in his last earnest message to Congress as the correct interpretation of that platform upon the question of tariff reduction, and also indorses the efforts of our Democratic representatives in Congress to secure a reduction of excessive taxation." The Committee appear to have had a prevision of the application which will be made of the plank in the campaign, and endeavoured to disarm it in advance, by contending that "a fair and careful revision of our tax laws, with due allowance for the difference between the wages of American and foreign labor, must promote and encourage every branch of such industries and enterprises by giving them assurance of an extended market and steady and continuous operations." That the Republican party will join issue on this question, there can be no doubt, and the campaign promises therefore to be fought this time on principles rather than on the personal records of the candidates.

The Decisive Republican Victory in Oregon last week is hailed by the party as an augury of success in the Presidential campaign. An election took place on June 4, of a member of Congress, and members of the State Legislature, who will choose a United States Senator. The election turned entirely on the Tariff question, and the result is unequivocal. The normal Republican majority is 1200, but this year the recent heavy increase of the immigration ran up the figures considerably on both sides. Though the official returns were not published last week, the Democrats concede a Republican majority of at least seven thousand. This year only one county has returned a Democratic plurality, and that was under 50. The change in eastern Oregon was greater than was generally expected. Of the 75 new members of her Legislature, the Republicans elected 63, the Democrats 10, and 2 are in doubt. So the next Legislature in joint ballot will stand at least 71 Republicans to 19 Democrats. Senator Dolph will therefore be his own successor. There is not one county in the State where the Democrats have elected their county ticket. The increase in the Republican vote is more marked in manufacturing and wool-growing districts than in purely agricultural counties. There was a large increase in the Prohibition vote.

The Abolition of Executions by Hanging in New York State was effected on June 4, when Governor Hill signed the bill passed by the Legislature, substituting the electric spark for the rope as the instrument of death. The bill also contains a number of provisions intended to reform the abuses connected with the death penalty which have become a scandal. The condemned criminal now holds a daily levee, and reporters publish the most minute details as to his demeanor, conversation, and habits, which give him a notoriety highly esteemed by the criminal classes. The new bill which now becomes law and applies to crimes committed after January 1, 1889, provides that the prisoner sentenced to death shall be immediately conveyed by the Sheriff to one of the State prisons and there kept in solitary confinement until the day of execution, to be visited only by officers or by his relatives, physician, clergyman, or counsel. The court imposing sentence shall name merely the week within which the execution is to take place, the particular day within such week being left to the discretion of the principal officer of the prison. The execution is required to be practically private, only officials, clergymen, physicians, and a limited number of citizens being allowed to be present.

A Severe but Just Arraignment, of the liquor trade of New York, and of the Police and prosecuting officials who neglect their duty, was made on June 4, by Judge Barrett in his charge to the Grand Jury. He said: "It seems to be a very disgraceful state of things that there should be 5,000 presentations of violations of a particular law not attended to. It warrants the conclusion that there is either deliberate and open defiance of the law by those engaged in the liquor business, or that there is a most decided and inexcusable inefficiency on the part of the officers of the law. It does not seem within the bounds of possibility that the law should be so flagrantly and openly defied as that there should be 5,000 excise cases to be presented to you. Why it should be so, I cannot say. Why persons engaged in the sale of intoxicating liquors cannot do their business in strict obedience to the laws as other citizens do, is something that I cannot understand." He then proceeded to express his contempt for the system of spasmodic raids and the conduct of the police at the trials, which prevented convictions. What was needed, he said, was to have a few of the proprietors of the large saloons in the Penitentiary, which would do more good than the arrest of small barkeepers and the other petty acts of the police.

The New Governor-General of Canada, Lord Stanley, of Preston, arrived by the steamer Sarmatian on June 2. In an interview with a reporter he said that he had acquired while in the Colonial Office considerable knowledge of Canada's vast resources, and had been greatly impressed with the future in store for the country. He would not go to his new post, with preconceived ideas, and did not wish to force any policy upon a country possessing a responsible government. The Marquis of Lansdowne, the late Governor-General of Canada, on leaving the Dominion said he had been deeply moved by the warmth of the farewell given him at Ottawa and Toronto. He had great hopes for the future of the Dominion, owing to the good harvests in the Northwest and the large number of people immigrating into the country.

Another Ministerial Crisis in Germany developed last week, and was only averted by the concession of the Emperor. The interference exercised by Prince Bismarck with the freedom of election during the reign of the late Emperor, was always deplored by the present Emperor when he was Crown Prince. To him and to his English wife it appeared scandalous that the votes of the people should be controlled and manipulated by the Government. In giving his assent to the Quinquennial Landtag Bill which extends the existence of the Legislature from three to five years, the Emperor, therefore, took occasion to write to Herr Von Puttkamer, directing him to refrain from using Government influence in the elections. The Emperor also resolved to publish this letter in the official journal an appendix to the bill. Bismarck was so deeply mortified by the project that he threatened to resign if the letter were published. So acute became the crisis that the Emperor's disease was aggravated, and finally he consented to withold the letter from publication. It is stated, however, that an Imperial rescript will be issued warning the local authorities against interfering in the elections. Herr Von Puttkamer has in consequence resigned his office as Minister of the Interior.

A New Irish Programme of a More Hopeful character is said to have been arranged by Mr. Balfour, the Secretary for Ireland. The New York Sun publishes a despatch from its London correspondent, describing an interview which he has had with Mr. Balfour. The correspondent reports the Secretary as saying: "that the Government is now maturing a great policy of public works in Ireland. It is a scheme of much importance. I purpose to introduce three bills, involving a very large outlay of public money, for the purpose of a scheme of arterial drainage. I hope to follow this up next year by schemes of a similar character. I do not believe that these plans will involve the building of piers and so on, for I am not sure that this sort of work would be advisable. But a very great sum of money will be spent, and this will tend to relieve Ireland. Concerning the prevalent distress, we have found it worst in the Arran Islands. The Government has distributed a large amount of seed potatoes there, sufficient for the whole need of the population. No relief works have been begun on the islands, as they are not considered necessary." The Government will doubtless find schemes of this character, if wisely executed, more effective in pacifying Ireland than coercion.

A Judge Exchanging the Bench for the Pulpit, has surprised a Western city. The Portland Oregonian announces that "Ex-Chief-Justice Roger S. Greene, late of the Washington Territorial Supreme Court, is now closing up his legal business, preparatory to devoting his entire time to the ministry. He is one of the leading members of the Baptist Church, and has always been prominently identified with religious movements connected with it. Judge Greene is senior member of the law firm of Greene, McNaught, Hanford & McGraw, and is ranked as one of the leading attorneys in the Territory. He was Chief-Justice of the Supreme Court for sixteen years, having been succeeded by Chief-Justice Jones. Judge Greene says he finds himself unable to give the amount of time he desires to religious work, and at the same time practice law, and his explanation suggests that in his opinion the two callings are not sympathetic."

Deeply Interesting Services were held Last week at St. George's Church, New York, of which Rev. W. S. Rainsford is rector. On Sunday, June 3, thirteen young men, who have been energetic and devoted workers in the missions of the church during the past four years, were ordained "lay helpers" by Bishop H. C. Potter. These young men, who appeared very intelligent and refined, are empowered to deliver sermons in any Protestant Episcopal church in the diocese, and to read the services. Mr. Rainsford spoke highly of the value of their past services, and was full of hope for the future. On Thursday, June 7, another gratifying service, in connection with the same church, was held. This was the presentation to the church of the beautiful memorial building erected at the expense of Mr. and Mrs. John Pierpont Morgan in memory of the late Mr. and Mrs. Charles Tracy. The building will be used as a clergy house and as the centre of evangelistic and mission work in the parish.

An Unconscious Heir is Wandering About the country, while the executors of his grandfather's estate are looking for him. About fifteen years ago an old farmer died, leaving, among other possessions, a farm on the outskirts of Brooklyn, N. Y. All the property went to the widow for her life, and at her death, to her six children. It was not a large estate when the farmer died, but the land on the outskirts of Brooklyn has now become very valuable, owing to the rapid growth of the city. There is, therefore, a large sum to be divided among the children—the widow being now dead. One of the daughters is also dead, and her share goes to her son, a young man of restless, shiftless disposition, who, five years ago, wandered away from home, pedling coal in scattered villages, and has not been heard of since. If the family had expected much benefit from the farmer's estate, the young man would probably have taken care to keep his relatives informed of his whereabouts; but, as he has not done so, he can have no idea how large a sum is awaiting his return to claim it. It is stated that he was always in a needy, impoverished condition, and exactly the kind of man to appreciate such a sum of money as he is now heir to. In his poverty and vagrancy he resembles the Christian, who, though an heir of God, fails to apply for the riches of grace promised to all who ask. (Mal. 3: 10.)

Three Bears were Killed by a Boy only Fourteen years old, in Monroe County, Pennsylvania, a few days ago. The boy was sent by his father to a clearing in the woods near his house to chop up some trees that had been felled. In about an hour he returned with his axe and his clothing covered with blood, and stated that he had killed three bears. His father was sceptical, but on going to the clearing he found that the boy had told the truth. The lad said that he had commenced chopping on the fallen tree, when a big bear jumped out from beneath it and made a rush for him. He buried the axe in the animal's skull, and another blow killed the bear. The boy then looked in under the tree and discovered the two smaller bears. He routed them out and attacked them. One of the bears showed fight, but the other one slouched away. He killed the young one as quickly as he had the old one, and then gave chase to the other and dispatched it in the same way. After the bodies of the dead bears had been taken home the boy returned to his work as if nothing had happened. The old bear weighed over three hundred pounds. The father is very proud of his young son's prowess. It may be hoped that he will teach him to be equally valiant in the battle he will have to fight with that "roaring lion," the great enemy of souls, and also to tell him that in that battle those are most likely to fail who rely on their own strength, and those sure to succeed who trust wholly in Christ. (Rom. 12: 11.)

A Disastrous Visit to a Lunatic Asylum has been made by a reporter at Milwaukee, Wis. A daily journal of that city states that a brilliant young man engaged in newspaper work was detailed to write an article on the asylums of the State. In order to prepare himself for the work he secured permission to examine the county asylum, and while being shown through the building manifested unmistakable signs of insanity. He became very angry when taken away by the Superintendent, who thought the sights were affecting his brain. The reporter was very indignant and threatened to make a public denunciation of the Superintendent. He was so persistent in his demands to the Governor for an investigation of what he called abuses that one was finally ordered, which resulted in the proof that he is himself insane, and he has now been committed to the asylum. This young man is entitled to sympathy because the investigation which brought the calamity upon him was undertaken not out of curiosity, but in the line of his duty. There are many cases, however, of a still more deplorable disaster coming upon investigators when sympathy must be mingled with blame. The young men who go into the haunts of dissipation "to see life" too often themselves fall into a snare and become as vicious as those whom they go to see. (Prov. 4: 14,15.)

A Silent Marriage took Place in the Office of a Justice of the Peace in Jersey City on Saturday, June 2. A young man entered the office, and held out to the Justice a pad on which was written, "Can you give me a marriage license?" "Cannot you speak?" wrote the Justice. The visitor shook his head. The Justice then wrote "No license is required; I can marry you now." The young man seemed pleased, and going away, soon returned with a young lady, quietly but tastefully dressed. The Justice greeted her cordially, but she stopped his talk by producing a pad on which she wrote that she too was a deaf mute. The usual questions and answers were then given in writing, and finally the Justice wrote, "I pronounce you man and wife." The couple were immediately clasped in each other's arms. The young husband informed the justice that he had a sufficient income to support his wife, and that they had lived in the same town, and had loved each other from childhood. As they went away the Justice said he had never married a more happy looking couple. They were probably attracted to each other by their common affliction. The revelations of the divorce courts prove that many marriages are made in which the parties have nothing in common but an unregenerate spirit. Such marriages are not likely to be happy, and still less promising are those marriages in which one of the parties is a Christian and the other is not. In that case the command of God is violated. (II Cor. 6: 14-15).

Hanged with a Woman's Hair is the fate which befell a sparrow whose body has been sent to the Natural History Society at Worcester, Mass. The Spy of that city states that a gentleman whose house is surrounded with pine trees, recently noticed a sparrow suspended from the end of a limb of one of these trees. He could see nothing by which the bird was hung, and it was a very curious sight. His son, who was called, went up into the tree and carefully sawed off a small portion of the limb. The whole secret was then revealed. On the twig was a neatly built nest, in which were three speckled eggs. When examined they were found to be cold, which showed the home had been broken up for some time. The male sparrow was hung by a woman's hair, which was knotted around his neck just as neatly as though it had been done by human hands. The other end was fastened to the nest, being a part of it. The eggs were on one side of the nest, while on the other side was a hole just large enough for the bird to go through. It is supposed that the bird, in leaving its nest by the hole, became entangled in the hair, which, becoming a noose around its neck, proved strong enough to hold the bird until it died. It is marvellous that so slight a thing as a hair from a woman's head should cause the death even of a bird, but then, the bird was so entangled that it could not use its strength. It is so with many of the habits and temptations that hold men in their sins. They appear slight and trival, but they prove fatal to spiritual life unless the victim is delivered by Christ's Almighty power. (Isa. 61: 1.)

THE WEDDING GARMENT.

A New Sermon By Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And when the king came in to see the guests, he saw there a man which had not on a wedding garment: and he saith unto him, Friend, how camest thou in hither not having a wedding garment? And he was speechless. Then said the king to the servants, Bind him hand and foot, and take him away, and cast him into outer darkness; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth."—Matt. 22: 11-13.

The Loyal and the Rebellious Separated by Preaching—A Further Discrimination—I. What is Meant by the King's Coming In—The Crown of the Feast—A Season of Gracious Visitation—Augustine's Prayer—A Time of Discovery—II. The Meaning of the Wedding Garment—A Distinguishing Mark of Grace—The Gift of the King—Mourning Garb, an Insult at a Wedding—The Robe of Righteousness—III. The Guest Without the Garment—Preferring his Own Dress—IV. Why He was Speechless.

Two Sabbath mornings ago I preached from this parable, and I trust many were encouraged by it; but I noticed among inquirers who came to see me afterwards, a desire to know about the wedding garment; for they feared lest, in coming to join the church, they should come like the man of whom I shall now speak. Many true hearts are extremely sensitive to the impression of fear, and they seem to be on the watch for reasons for anxiety. I do not condemn them; on the contrary, I wish there were more of such holy tremblers. It is much better to be afraid of being wrong than to be indifferent as to what you are.

My chief object this morning will be to allay the fears of gracious ones, If they understand what the wedding garment really is, they will probably discover that they are wearing it; and, if not, they will know in whose wardrobe that garment of joy is to be found, and they will gladly ask to be arrayed therein. Immediately after our text, we find these solemn words: "Many are called, but few are chosen." This is a conclusion drawn from the whole parable, in which we see processes at work, which separate the chosen few from the many who are called.

A Distinction Was Made

by the summoning of the invited guests. The simple delivery of the invitation set a difference between the loyal and the rebellious—a distinction most marked and decisive. So it is in the preaching of the gospel: we preach it to every creature within our reach. Lovingly, tenderly, earnestly; not so well as we would, but still with all our heart we call men to the royal feast of grace; and straightway the very invitation begins to gather out the precious from the vile. When men will not have Christ and His grace, the Word preached by His humble servant drives them away, and they go with the chaff.

But the work of discrimination is not finished after the gospel has been heard and men have been brought into the church. Alas! even in the church division has to be made; indeed, it is there that this is most fully carried out. "His fan is in His hand, and He will throughly purge His floor." If He uses a scourge nowhere else, He will be sure to use it in His own temple. In our text we see a man who has hearkened to the invitation and has come into the feast, and thus has passed the first test; and yet he is unable to abide the second; he has been received by the servants, but he cannot deceive their Master. The King detects him as a spot in the feast, and he is cast out from the palace of mercy into the outer darkness, where there is weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth. May none of us be of this sort!

I. May the Holy Spirit help us while we consider, first, what is meant by

The King's Coming In.

"The king came in to see the guests." They were all reclining at the tables, for "the wedding was furnished with guests." They gathered while the sun was up, but darkness covered the world outside when "the king came in to see the guests." They had feasted, and now the king came to honor the assembly. It was the crown and the culmination of the feast. No matter how dainty the viands, nor how bright the hall, the feast has not reached its height till his majesty appears in gracious condescension. It is so with us, beloved, in reference to our greater King.

These are seasons of gracious visitation: times of refreshing from

The Presence of the Lord.

When the King comes into the assembly, the preaching of the word is in demonstration of the Spirit, and in power. Then the day of Pentecost has fully come; the Spirit is abundantly outpoured, souls are saved, saints are edified, and Christ is glorified. The wedding would have been a failure without guests; but what would the feast have been if the host had refused to come in and see the guests? But the King came in in due time. Ay, came in among that crowd of wayfarers gathered from the highways at a moment's notice, and His presence crowned the festival with honor and rapture.

This coming in to see the guests indicates a glorious revelation of Himself. When the King saw the guests, the guests saw Him; but, inasmuch as His sight of them was the more important sight of the two, the chief thing is mentioned while the minor matter is implied. Do we know what it is to see God? This is the special privilege of the pure in heart. When the Lord's way is in the sanctuary, then His sanctified ones behold Him. Spiritual eyes have looked to Jesus by faith, and He saith, "He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father." When Augustine read those words, "Thou canst not see My face and live," he was bold enough to answer, "Let me die to see Thy face."

But here is the solemn point to which I call your attention: this visitation brings with it a time of discovery and searching of heart. When the King comes in to see the guests, the light grows stronger, and all things are revealed; for all things are naked and open to the eyes of Him with whom we have to do. If the Lord our God were to come into His church to-day there would be an awful shrinkage among the number of His guests; a panic would seize the assembly, and the door would be blocked with men hastening to escape His eye.

Look how the King's discernment is recorded in the text. One man only had refused to put on a wedding garment, but the king at once fixed his eye upon him. The Saviour, by a kind of heavenly charity, mentions only but I fear we must regard the one as the type of many. If the King should come in at the time of our communion, I am afraid He would detect more than one. This is a solemn matter. It will not make the true-hearted wish the King to stay away, but those who are wilful deceivers may well tremble. The King does come to this church. He is specially present in the midst of this people, and the consequence is that His judgment is strict with us. I have seen the rod of his discipline here in a very striking manner. I have seen the fair professor wither in the heat of love, and the rootless Christian dried up in the noontide of grace. He might have gone on very well in any other church, but he has not been able to abide the brandished sword of the Spirit, and its dividing asunder soul and spirit, joints and marrow. He has not been able to sit it out, but has been obliged to go away and find an easier rest.

II. Now I would answer the second question:

What is the Wedding Garment?

You are probably aware that this has been a point greatly disputed among theologians. Is the wedding garment justification, or sanctification, or what? I am not going to be theological and bring doctrinal matters to the text; but I shall read the parable as it stands, and interpret its details by its general run. It is called a "wedding garment"—a garment suitable for a marriage feast. Let us translate the figure, rather than attempt to rivet a doctrine to it. What does a wedding garment mean? What is that which we must have in connection with our Lord's marriage, or be cast out forever?

I think I may say plainly that it must signify a distinguishing mark of grace. Everybody does not wear a wedding garment; he who wears it has put it on because he is a wedding guest. You know the wedding guest at once by his attire. True members of the church of God wear a distinguishing mark. If you are not different from other people, you have no right in the church of God. If a servant can live with you for years and never discover your love to God, I should think there is none to discover. There ought to be a something about us which sets us apart—a something which can be seen and understood by common people, even as a wedding garment could be seen, and at once perceived. Your religion must not require a microscope to perceive it, nor should it be so indistinct that few can discover any meaning in it. It should be as visible as the white garment worn by Easterns at a marriage.

I may boldly add here that the wedding garment was a distinguishing mark of grace; for as these people were fetched in from the highways they could not have provided themselves with wedding garments. It is the custom in the East for a king to provide robes for his guests; therefore this wedding garment was a mark of grace, freely given and received. Is there, then, a something about you which the Lord in love has given you? Do you differ from others, not in natural attainments, but in spiritual grace? Does the difference mainly lie in what God Himself has done for you? That is the question involved in the symbol of the wedding garment.

In the next place, it was

for the king. To be fit for his company, the dress must be special. The absence of such a dress was, in the case before us, the badge of irreverence and disloyalty. This man said to himself: "I will feed at the feast without acknowledging its intent. Whoever stops me, I will push my way in, and I shall sit there in my every-day garments, to let the king know that I do not respect him in the least, and will not wear the robes he provides." It is as if you had lost a son, and some wretched man should say, "I will attend the funeral in a wedding suit. I shall thus wound the feelings of the mourners, and show my contempt for the whole affair." What an insult it would be! To turn the picture. Suppose you were being married, and somebody forced his way into the wedding dressed in mourning, with crape upon his hat, and black kid gloves upon his hands. What a wanton insult! If such impudence were met with a horse-whip, who would be surprised? Now, this man acted in that fashion: he had no respect for the king: he showed his traitorous nature in the worst possible manner, spiting the king in his own halls upon a tender occasion. Dear friends, I trust that you can truly say, "I have on the wedding garment of reverence."

A Token of Honor.

The wedding garment was, moreover, a token of honor for the Prince. My hearers, do you feel a love to the Lord Jesus Christ? Many do not. I grieve to say we have a race of men sprung up nowadays who call themselves Christians, who pour contempt upon His precious blood, and ridicule the substitutionary sacrifice. Dreadful assertion! but it is a matter of fact. The name of Jesus, why, it is to our lives what the sun is to the skies, what the rivers are to the plains. Nothing makes us so glad as thoughts of Jesus. I am sure when I hear a sermon about Christ, my Master, my very heart grows warm within me. Is it so with you? Well, then, you have on the wedding garment; that is to say, you do truly, though it be but in a simple way, pay homage to the Prince of Peace; you love the name and person of Jesus, and you come into His church because you do so.

The wedding garment means, in a word, conformity to the requirments of the occasion It was a wedding, and the guests must put on a suitable dress. This man refused to put it on. He was proud, and would not wear the gift of grace; he was self-willed, and must needs be singular, and show his independence of mind. The regulation was by no means irksome, and to the rest of the guests the commandment was not grievous; but this man would have his own way in defiance of the Lord of the feast. What could come of such folly? Now, one of is, that you with your heart believe on the Lord Jesus, and that you take His righteousness to be your righteousness. Do you refuse this? If you will not accept the Lord Jesus as your substitute, bearing your sins in His own body on the tree, you have not the wedding garment. Another requirement is that you should repent of sin and forsake it; and that you should follow after holiness, and endeavor to copy the example of the Lord Jesus. You are to possess, as the work of divine grace, a godly and upright character. Have you such a character? Even though you are not perfect, yet, inasmuch as you follow after righteousness, you have the wedding garment. You say that you are a Christian; do you live like a Christian? Are you in a position and condition which agree with the gospel feast? If so, you have on the wedding garment.

Those who came unto the feast were, when they came, both bad and good; so that the wedding garment does not relate to their past character, but relates to something with which they were invested when they came to the banquet. The putting on of a wedding robe cannot refer to an elaborate ceremony, or a feat of the intellect, or to a deep experience of the heart; and yet it involved joining in the wedding, or not joining in it. It involved reverence for the King, and homage to the Prince, and sympathy with the whole matter. Look well to yourselves, and see whether you truly yield yourselves to the Lord, and agree with Him in the whole matter.

The Man Without the Garment.

III. Thirdly, who is the man that has not on the wedding garment? I should say, first, he is the man who rejects God's revealed gospel that he may follow his own thought and his own wisdom. He says that he is loyal to Christ, and he expects all his fellow guests to be firm friends with him, for is he not in the banquet as much as they are? But he does not mean by loyalty what they mean by it. He is among believers, but he is not truly of them. He talks about atonement; he does not mean substitution. He talks about the divinity of Christ; he does not mean the Godhead of Christ. He talks about justification by faith; but he does not mean the old-fashioned doctrine. He speaks of regeneration, but means evolution. He girds himself with the garment of philosophy, but he refuses the robe of revelation, for the cut of it is too old-fashioned for him. His robe is not of God's provision; it is from his own wardrobe. He glories in his own culture, and not in the revelation of God, nor yet in the work of divine grace upon the heart. He is in the church, but he is not in Christ. He has a name to live, but he is dead.

The next person who has not on the wedding garment is the man who refuses the righteousness of God because he has a righteousness of his own. He thinks for Christ's own wedding. What does he want with imputed righteousness? He scouts it as immoral. He who is himself immoral! What does he want with the precious blood of Jesus? He does not need to be washed from crimson stains. His own righteousness, though it be of the law, and such as Paul rejected, he esteems so highly that he counts the blood of the covenant an unholy thing! Ah me, the insolence of self-righteousness! Its pride is the very chief of sins, for it slights the righteousness of God.

Why, some dare to come into the church who have not even common morality. It is shocking we should have to say it, but nowadays, we meet with those who call themselves Christians who can drink upon the sly, who can commit uncleanness with their bodies, who can be dishonest in their trading, who can be liars, who can hate their own flesh and blood and be at enmity with their brethren, and yet dare to come to the communion table. In the highlands of Scotland it was at one time difficult to get Christian people to come to the Lord's Table, for they so trembled under a sense of their unworthiness. We do not want to push this too far, but that is a great deal better than that unholy daring, which is to be found in the minds of so many who serve Christ and Belial. God save His church from degradation!

I do not see how that man can be said to have on a wedding garment who takes no interest in the work of the church. You see, when a man puts on the wedding garment, he did as good as say, "I am interested in the wedding. I wish God's blessing to the bride and bridegroom." But many come in now to the King's feast who do not care a snap of the finger for the church of God, nor for Christ either. They come in because a sort of selfishness makes them anxious to be saved; but as to the bride, the Lamb's wife, they do not care whether she starves or flourishes. Sad and wretched business this!

IV. To close, why was this man speechless? We do not often meet with people who have no excuse. Excuse-making is the easiest trade out. A man can make an excuse out of nothing at all, or out of what is less than nothing—out of a direct lie. But here was

A Man Who Could Not Speak.

Why was that? Well, I think, first, the affront was too bare-faced. "How camest thou in hither?" If he did not like the king he could have kept outside. There was no need why he should come in at all, and there display his malice. If any of you are resolved to be lost, you need not add to your eternal ruin by making a profession of religion, for hypocrisy is a superfluity of naughtiness. Next, the affront was so audacious. "How camest thou in hither?" said the king. He must have pushed by the deacons at the door. The fellow would come in. When the king said, "Bind him hand and foot," I think it was because he had used hand and foot to get in. He would get in; he said, "I will get in. I will defy the king to his face, and sit in among his guests without a wedding garment." You, dear friend, do not wish to do that: I am sure it is the last thing you would do. Why, we have to persuade you to come in at all; for you are so tenderly jealous lest you should be mistaken. Do not let this parable condemn you.

Lastly, the reason why he was speechless was because, even if he could have spoken and been free from terror, there was Nothing to be Said.

He could not cry, "Lord, I did not know it." He saw all the rest with wedding garments on. He could not say, "Lord, I could not get a wedding garment": each one had received a garment gratis, and he might have received the same. He could not say, "Lord, I was pushed in here by somebody else." No, he had willingly chosen to come, and to defy the rule. I do not wonder that the King said, "Bind him hand and foot, and cast him into outer darkness; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth."

I have been accused of representing the state of the lost in too horrible a manner. I have never gone beyond the dreadful descriptions given by our Lord Himself. Do not risk your eternal future. Come to the Church of God and join it, but do not join it unless you love the Lord. Do not come to the gospel feast unless you reverence the King; unless you love the Prince; unless you are in sympathy with the great work of grace which is pictured as a wedding feast. If you have sympathy with the wedding, love to the Bridegroom, and delight in the bride, then come and welcome; for you have the wedding garment. I am thinking just now of all those other hundreds of people at the wedding, all of them clothed with the wedding garment. What joy they felt! Many had been bad, and all had been poor: but they all had the wedding garment, and not one of them was cast out. If you will but put your trust in Jesus, and so honor the Son; and rest in the love of the Father, and so honor the King, it is written, "Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out." God bless you for Jesus' sake!

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

BUDDHA'S EARLY LIFE.*

BUDDHA was born at Kapelavastu, the capital of the kingdom of that name, at the foot of the mountains of Nepaul. His father, the King of Kapelavastu, was one of the family of the Sakyas, and belonged to the clan of the Gautamas. His mother was Mayadevi, the daughter of King Suprabuddha. Buddha was therefore by birth of the Kshatriya, or warrior caste, and he took the name of Sakya from his family and that of Gautama from his clan. Endowed with all the gifts of genius and physical beauty, he easily outstripped all his comrades and even his masters, in feats of bodily and intellectual strength. But from childhood he was possessed by a deep melancholy, from which nothing could divert him. Those around could see no cause for it, but it was in truth the sorrow of the world, the insoluble problem of life, which was weighing on his soul. In the hope of turning the current of his thoughts he was married to the beautiful Gopa, the daughter of Danapam. The marriage proved one of the happiest, but Buddha remained as he had been before, absorbed in meditation on the problems of life and death. "Nothing is stable on earth," he used to say, "nothing is real. Life is like the spark produced by the friction of wood. It is lighted and it is extinguished; we know not whence it came nor whither it goes. It is like the sound of a lyre, and the wise man asks in vain from whence it came and whither it goes. There must be some supreme intelligence where we could find rest. If I attained it I could bring light to man; if I were free myself I could deliver the world." The king, who perceived the melancholy mood of the young prince, tried everything to divert him, but all was in vain.

The Renunciation.

At length the decisive day came. One morning when the young prince with a large retinue was driving through the eastern gate of the city, he met on the road an old man, broken and decrepit. One could see the veins and muscles over the whole of his body; his teeth chattered, he was covered with wrinkles, bald, and hardly able to utter hollow and unmelodious sounds. He was bent on his stick, and all his limbs and joints trembled. "Who is that man?" said the prince to his coachman, "he is small and weak, his flesh and his blood are dried up, his muscles stick to his skin, his head is white, his teeth chatter, his body is wasted away; leaning on his stick he is barely able to walk, stumbling at every step. Is there something peculiar in his family, or is this the common lot of all created beings?" "Sir," replied the coachman, "that man is sinking under old age. His senses have become obtuse, suffering has destroyed his strength, and he is despised by his relations. He is without support, and useless, and people have abandoned him, like a dead tree in the forest. But this is not peculiar to his family. In every creature youth is defeated by old age. Your father, your mother, all your relations, all your friends will come to the same state. This is the appointed end of all creatures."

* From "The Ancient World and Christianity," By E. De Pressensé, D. D. Translated by Annie Harwood Holmden. This work is an attempt to show how in the ancient world everywhere, the greatest men were found seeking a God greater than local and national divinities, and uttering bitter lamentations over their failure. Also to show what must be the gloomy future of a democracy without God, and that the only hope of society is in the Light which broke on the world eighteen centuries ago. 479 Pages. Published by *A. The Emperor Frederick III. of Germany in his Study at Potsdam.

"Alas," replied the Prince, "are creatures so ignorant, so weak and foolish, as to be proud of the youth by which they are intoxicated, not seeing the old age which awaits them. As for me, I go away. Coachman, turn my chariot quickly. What have I, the future prey of old age, to do with pleasure?" And the young prince returned to the city without going to his park.

His resolution was taken: kingdom, power, glory, wife, all must be abandoned, while he shut himself up to lead in solitude the life of an ascetic. So far he had not gone in practice beyond the ideal of the Brahmans, who looked upon the life of the Anchorite as the final goal to be reached. But he had already risen to a much fuller and higher conception of the religious life than theirs. He saw more clearly than any before him the intensely sorrowful side of life. To him it appeared, indeed only as a transparent veil cast over the death to which it leads, and which is therefore the only abiding reality. Hence he was not long satisfied with the teaching the Brahmans had to give him. Having learned all that the most illustrious of them could impart, he went away disappointed.

THE SUFFERING EMPEROR.

(See Illustration.)

THE whole civilized world watches with sympathy and admiration the brave struggle for life now being waged by Frederick III., Emperor of Germany. The reports of the physicians and nurses describing his patience and fortitude under suffering, prove him to be a man of true nobleness of character, worthy of the exalted position which he occupies. He has now been removed from Charlottenburg to Potsdam, some twenty miles off, where he occupies the palace built by his illustrious predecessor, Frederick the Great, which was formerly known as "the New Palace," but which the Emperor has named "Friedrichskron," in memory of its builder. There he continues to utilize every interval of relief from pain in attention to public business, as he did at Berlin, and appears conscientiously desirous of leaving no duty unperformed. On the days when he is too weak to sit up he occupies the invalid's lounge provided for him, the head of which can be so adjusted as to allow him to read or write in a reclining posture.

Another contribution to his comfort is the reading-stand shown in the illustration. This was a gift from his mother-in-law, Queen Victoria, and is of much service to him. Standing by his couch, the Emperor can, by stretching out his hand, swing the arm of the stand so as to bring the book it holds to the proper focus, and so enjoy reading without the fatigue of holding the book. As the Emperor is something of a student, this gift is appreciated by him.

It is gratifying to learn that the German doctors now agree with Dr. Mackenzie that his disease is not cancer, though they admit that it is of so serious a nature as to render the prospect of complete recovery very doubtful.

MARY MORGAN'S DARLING.

NEVER was there a more welcome arrival in a home than that of little Eddy in the home of Edward and Mary Morgan. Mary's home before her marriage was full of brothers and sisters, and merry voices were heard in it from morning to night. The little cottage in the country to which Edward took her after their wedding was as pretty as hands could make it, and for the first month or two Mary's time was fully occupied in adorning it and making it home-like. After that, however, the hours hung heavily. Edward had to leave early to be at his office in the city in time for business, and it was not until seven o'clock in the evening, and sometimes later, that he returned. Mary shortened the evening by going to meet his train, thus discounting his coming by the half hour it took her to walk to the station. But the days were very long and very lonely to her.

The baby's birth changed all that. Mary had plenty to do then. Besides, it was such a pleasure to sit and look at him while he was asleep, watching the strange little smiles that flitted across the tiny face, telling of dreams which it was impossible for her to conceive of, so little experience could there be in that short life to make the basis of a dream. Her work even drifted into arrear, baby being so inexhaustible a subject of interest. He was the most wonderful baby, too, so bright and intelligent, and actually seemed, as Mary believed, to understand her talk before he was a month old. Edward had to listen when he came home at night to the account of some extraordinary evidence baby had given during the day of his surprising qualities. The young mother brightened under the new circumstances of her life, and the little cottage was no longer dull.

Eddy's coming, too, had another good result; it led Mary to pray. As a girl she attended church, but she had never given her heart to God. Her mother and father were Godly people but Mary had always been indifferent in religious matters, and when she and Edward were married and lived in the country there was no church near, so they had spent their Sundays at home or in little excursions. Even the form of religion was abandoned. Now, however, a sense of responsibility was upon her. She began to pray, first for her child and then for herself. She said nothing of it to her husband, for, in his case, indifference to religion had developed into opposition to it. She wanted her boy to grow into a good man, and she instinctively recognized that there was no preservative that could keep him from the world's evil as religion could. Therefore she began to pray, and most earnestly, that she might be enabled to train him aright. Poor mother! had she but realized that the first step was to give herself unreservedly to God, her heart might have been saved its worst pang.

As little Eddy grew, his mother's love became more intense. A singularly bright, lovable child, gentle and affectionate, he was loved by all who knew him; but he was his mother's idol. When he was three years old she taught him the Lord's Prayer, a simple prayer for his mother and father, and a verse of hymn, and as he knelt at her knee every night, and went through the little ritual, Mary thought his face looked so like the face of an angel, that she would clutch him to her breast and clasp her arms around him with a passionate fervor that told of a love which overmastered her.

What was her terror, then, when little Eddy fell sick! The doctor was summoned, and his diagnosis awaited with agonizing suspense. It was a relief when she found that he did not apprehend danger; but she could know neither peace nor rest till her little darling was running around as usual. Her husband made light of her fears, but even he grew anxious when little Eddy continued to grow worse. The little fellow would recover, he felt sure, but it seemed a long while about. At length even the doctor began to look grave, and was more careful in his examination of the child's condition. There was no disease in the child's perfect organism, but there was a lack of vitality that puzzled him. Gentle as he was before, Eddy seemed now to be almost angelic in disposition, and his patience touched the mother's heart more than anything had done.

Mary Morgan's Anxious Caress.

One beautiful bright morning Mary set the window of his little bedroom open that he might enjoy the sunlight and the songs of the birds. The child lay looking at the bright prospect for a short time, but at last announced that "Eddy is tired; Eddy wants to go to sleep." He turned over and settled himself comfortably, but presently said that before he went to sleep he must say his prayers. His mother, fearing his weakness, persuaded him to say them in bed, telling him that God could hear them there just as well as kneeling at her knees. The little fellow said the simple words correctly as usual, and then satisfied, dropped into a gentle slumber with his cheek resting on his clasped hands. Mary took her work and sat at the open window to be near him if he waked, but the calm, and summer heat overcame her, and she too dozed. She could not have slept more than half an hour, when she woke up suddenly, with the sensation of something cold passing over her. Her eyes turned to the bed, but there was no change. Eddy had not moved. Still she felt uneasy, and going to the bedside, bent over, and kissed him. There was no response; the child was dead. He must have died in his sleep without a pain or a struggle. The little head lay upon the pillow with the hands clasped just as Mary had seen them before she fell asleep. But the soul was gone.

A neighbor coming in a short time afterward to inquire after the child, found the bereaved young mother in a swoon beside the body, and for a long time it was feared that she too would die. But God mercifully preserved her. Very slowly, through many weeks, she struggled back into life, but her heart seemed crushed within her. As she reclined in her invalid's chair in the room where her darling died, her thoughts full of her loss, she began to ask herself why this trouble had fallen upon her. She asked the question fiercely at first, as if reproaching God, but self-examination followed and reproaches died away out of her mind. Then, she thought of her little child as he must be in the presence of God, and the longing to go to him, and the thought that in her present state there would be eternal separation, overcame her, and for the first time she wept penitent tears. They were the beginning of a new life for her. At first the desire to be re-united with her darling was the supreme motive, but as she realized the cause of her dreaded exclusion better, love to the Saviour, whose death and atonement had made reconciliation with God possible, eclipsed every other feeling, and so Mary entered into peace.

THE EPOCHS OF A LIFE.

A NEW STORY OF AMERICAN COLLEGE LIFE.

By Rev. L. S. Keyser.

Author of "The Way Out," etc.

The First Term in College.

"How is it," asked Hadley one day of his friend George Dane, "that our parents and teachers never told us of these objections to the Bible? Of course they must have known that there were many men who rejected the book, and a still larger number who doubted its inspiration. It seems to me that a wiser course, if they wished us to become believers like themselves, would have been for them to have said to us, 'Such and such arguments are brought against the Bible, but they are unsound,' and then have given us the refutation, if refutation is possible."

"Ah!" said Dane, "I have thought of that. It was the novelty of these arguments that first attracted me. If I had gone over the ground before, under the guidance of some Christian believer, I suppose the lecturer who opened my eyes would have found a less willing disciple. The Christian Church, however, seems to prefer a policy of silence. So much the worse for it, I should say."

And how many young men have had cause to make the same remark! Yet it is still the policy pursued in families and churches. The fatal difficulty with this policy of silence and repression is, that when the young inquirer by some means is brought face to face with the objections of sceptics, as he surely will be, he is unprepared for them; he knows not how to meet them; he has not even been apprised of their existence, and consequently he regards himself as the dupe of his teachers, who have kept the facts hidden from him. In such a case to be forewarned might have been to be forearmed.

The anti-Christian campaign is carried on with more vigor than many persons suppose. Publishing firms in New York and Boston send out their tracts and books in vast quantities to the young men and women of the land, who often read them and brood over them until they are led astray by their specious arguments. The fact must be faced, and as far as possible the influence of this literature must be countervailed. How can this be done if we refuse to investigate the facts, and even close our eyes to their existence?

Early in June, extensive preparations were made for the commencement exercises of the academy. As the young men and women about to graduate were allowed the privilege of choosing their own themes for their addresses, subject, of course, to the approval of the Principal, our two half-fledged sceptics had the presumption to select topics of a decidedly anti-Biblical character. The Principal, however, objected, saying that such a course would damage their prospects in that vicinity for life. They replied, with their usual bravado, that they were not governed by motives of sordid policy and self-interest, but that they were willing to immolate themselves, if necessary, upon the altar of truth. But Professor Borst contended that it would be hurtful to the academy, if they were allowed to utter infidel sentiments under its auspices. Many Christian parents, he said, were sending their sons and daughters to him to be prepared for college, and he could not afford to lose their patronage. When the young men were about to protest, he told them curtly that if they would not accede to his wishes, he would refuse them certificates of graduation, and would not allow any of them to speak at all. So these knights of free-thought concluded to let "the interests of truth" take care of themselves, and finally chose themes for their orations that were tame and harmless enough for the most orthodox taste. They yielded, however, with ill grace, and sneered contemptuously at Professor Borst's "time serving spirit."

During the week of commencement another epoch-making event in their history occurred. The Principal had engaged the Rev. Dr. J. H. Hartridge, President of Grand Central College, of a neighboring State, to deliver an address before the students of the academy, and the people of the village.

On the evening of the lecture the two young men went to the church in which the address was to be delivered. The audience-room was filled to its utmost capacity, there being scarcely standing room in the aisles. A reserved seat had been provided for the graduating class, and to this seat they were conducted.

The Rev. Dr. Hartridge was a man of strong "bodily presence," largely built, and muscular. His face, which was closely shaven, and especially his large jaws, indicated firmness, if not obstinacy, of purpose; his lips were large, almost sensuous, his eyes flashing, his forehead high and receding, and his voice strong and sonorous. Our young students were favorably impressed with him before he arose to speak.

From the beginning of the lecture to its close the audience was held spell-bound. The Doctor was the master of a strong, perspicacious style, with a happy faculty for concise, epigrammatic statement, and a peculiar genius for building up thought, stratum upon stratum, until a mountain of truth seemed to rise, Alp-like, before his auditors. That evening he had a great deal to say about moral character.

"All things must be made to contribute to the formation of moral character," he maintained. "Whatever does not add something to the ethical development of man's being is sin. The earth has been filled with beauty and glory, Alp on Alp, wide valleys, deep cañons, majestic rivers, stretching plains; and wherefore was all this magnificence wrought out by the divine Sculptor? To aid in building us up in moral grandeur of soul. We are to develop and expand into the moral largeness of which these majestic scenes and operations in nature are the prototype. Last evening I climbed one of the hills that sentinel your beautiful village, and looking toward the sky, I beheld Venus, star of the twilight, glowing upon me like the eye of God. I was held enchanted by the scene of earth and sky. 'Why all this sweet and tranquil beauty?' I asked myself. To suggest cheer and help and incentive to man in his struggle for the attainment of moral perfection. As that star glows yonder in heaven's vault, so must I strive to make my character glow and sparkle and gleam in moral effulgence. As that star shines serenely yonder, so must I possess my soul unmoved above the toil and moil and upheaval of earthly passion and carking care. Mr. Ruskin has told us of 'The Ethics of the Dust;' he might also write about the ethics of the mountains and the valleys, of the sea and the sky; for all nature is full of ethical suggestions. Thus, my young friends, I would have you listen to all the voices around you and within you, to all the suggestions of beauty and goodness in the worlds of nature, of thought, of religion, and I beseech you to let every fact that touches your lives become an incentive to nobler deeds and higher aspirations."

The above excerpt, which is rather a paraphrase than a quotation, is sufficient to indicate the general character of the address. The young men were captivated by the speaker's thought and earnest manner. When the address was concluded, and they had taken the Doctor's hand in a warm, grateful pressure, they started arm in arm toward Hadley's home. Their course took them by a well-worn path across the fields and through the woods, and as they walked along they whiled the time in conversation.

"He is the grandest man I ever saw," said Hadley, enthusiastically, for he had arrived at that age when one is inclined, if ever, to be a hero-worshipper.

"I acquiesce in your verdict," responded George. "It is true, he seems to believe in religion, but I'll wager that he does not accept it in the credulous style of the ignorant people with whom we are acquainted."

"Of course not; a man of his calibre cannot be the slave of superstition. He is too broad-minded for that. I was fascinated by what he said of the formation of moral character. Of course, we believe in morality as much as the votaries of religion do. It is only their absurd tenets that we object to; they are not essential to morality, but are rather inimical to it."

"Ah, but you forget," laughed Hadley, "that Christians think that an infidel is almost as bad as a cutthroat, and is fit only to be tortured over a slow fire in a world of a very tropical climate."

"Pooh! that is because they are so dense and do not understand us. They think that a religionless morality is insufficient for the needs of fallen human nature."

The young men walked on awhile in silence

"Tell you what," said Hadley, presently, "I've made up my mind to become a student of the Grand Central College, if you will go along with me next fall. It will be invigorating, intellectually and morally, to live in the atmosphere of such a man as Dr. Hartridge. What do you think about it?"

"It is a happy thought—an inspiration, in fact," replied George, "Yes, yes, I shall go with you, and shall follow you like your shadow. You know that I am your vade mecum every time. Give me your hand on our compact."

The resolution formed so suddenly by the young men was found not to be ill-advised, and it was carried out in the following September. The opening day of the fall session found them pleasantly domiciled in their new college home, ready for the active duties of under-graduate life. The desire to acquit themselves well and achieve academical honors was the all-absorbing ambition with them, as they entered upon their college work, and they, therefore, applied themselves sedulously to their studies. They had not come to college to fritter away their time, or to spend their hard earnings foolishly. Like many other young men from country districts, they brought with them robust bodies and vigorous minds to their college work, and it was not long before they were regarded as students of the brightest promise, on account of which they were shown marked favors by their preceptors.

Their spiritual experiences were exceedingly checkered during the next three years. Even at the threshold of their college career they found themselves sadly disappointed in their instructors, at least in one respect.

"It is inexplicable," remarked George, one day, half to himself.

"What are you dreaming about now?" asked Hadley, looking up from his books.

"Well, you know that we supposed that these intellectual Samsons at the head of an institution like the G. C. C. would accept the Scriptures, if they accepted them at all, in a modified form; in a sort of allegorical sense, rather than as historically and literally true; but most of them actually pride themselves on being what is called 'evangelical,' which means, I suppose, that they gulp down the Bible entire, in regular orthodox fashion. Did you not hear what Dr. Hartridge said the other morning at chapel in regard to 'hacking the Bible to pieces with a rationalistic penknife'? I confess that I am mystified and disappointed."

"I have been puzzling my brain over the same conundrum," replied Hadley. "Is it pusillanimity or lack of information that makes them so credulous? It certainly cannot be the result of honest conviction."

"Tell you what I think," put in George, after a moment's reflection; "I believe that cowardice is at the bottom of it. These men dare not antagonize public sentiment, for fear of losing patronage, or being ousted from their positions. Don't you remember what Professor Borst told us when we wanted to give our opinions an airing at our commencement exercises?"

"But, George," said Hadley, "I think that you are a little ungenerous, and I believe that I have a more probable explanation of the phenomenon. Perhaps these men have been so exclusively devoted to the pursuit of technical studies, burrowing after Greek roots and solving mathematical problems, that the new light which has burst upon others, has not yet dawned upon their mental firmament."

"Well that is an ingenious and charitable theory, and I half believe that you are right."

"There is one fact that confirms my hypothesis," Hadley went on. "Our Professor of natural science, Dr. Busentide, is of course conversant with the advanced thought of the times, and must be acquainted with the disagreements of science and the Bible; and have you not noticed that he is about the only member of the faculty who does not make a profession of religion? He never leads in the devotions at chapel exercises. I'll wager that he has gotten into the current of advanced thinking, while the other professors are still floundering in the stagnant pools and bogs of superstition."

"Yes, that is a more generous view than the other," acquiesced George; "I cannot believe myself that our teachers are a pack of hypocrites and cowards; their investigations have been confined to a narrow field, that is all. Well, that makes our duty clear," said George in a superior way; "we must make up for their deficiencies by disseminating the new light and giving the college a propulsion in the direction of advanced thought."

"And we shall not be afraid of the frothy rage of the bigots, either," declared Hadley. "I despise toadyism above all things."

And so our two college sciolists imposed upon themselves the easy and delightful task of enlightening the Grand Central College on the great problems of Christian theology, and in their conceit and enthusiasm they did not for a time doubt their ability to do so. But soon their enthusiasm received a check, for only a few weeks' stay at the College sufficed to convince them that their instructors were very superior men, and were not the dry pedants that they had thought them.

On several occasions these rash young unfetterers of thought ventured to express their opinions relative to religion in the class-rooms, but they were rather curtly dismissed, or their remarks were entirely ignored by their professors, and in the literary societies, when they undertook to ventilate their views, they soon found that the opinions of college novitiates were regarded by the more advanced students as exceedingly crude, and their splenetic thrusts at religion were greeted with contemptuous outbursts of laughter. It was not so easy, after all, to put a quietus on the religious sentiment of the college. The young men were cowed, but as they were compelled by the force of circumstances to repress the expression of their unbelief, its fire only smouldered within them, and continued to gather force for a violent ebullition by and by. It is needless to say that the treatment they received made them all the more acrimonious against religion.

Finally they made a compact to maintain silence on the subject, both in the recitation rooms and in the literary halls, until they had reached a higher academical standing, and in the meantime they would investigate every department of anti-religious literature, and so strengthen and fortify their positions that they could not be overthrown by a few jeers. They believed that the time would come when their contemporaries would listen to them with respect.

During the first three years of their college life they searched the Scriptures with some degree of assiduity for the purpose of unearthing the "discrepancies." They also poured over the agnostic and anti-Christian scientific literature of the day, passing to the study of a higher class of sceptical writings than those which they had read before their entrance into college. It is true, their libraries received occasionally an accession from those New York and Boston publishing houses that print and circulate the literature of a rampant and vituperative character; but in the main the young investigators had lost their relish for such writings by becoming acquainted with works of higher scientific value. For a time they basked in the light of Spencer and Huxley, until they were filled with agnostic dogmatism. Then they devoured the late Professor Clifford's "Scientific Basis of Morals," with its sly insinuative thrusts at faith and its indefinite and fanciful "Religion of Humanity." Having heard a great deal of that brilliant Frenchman, Renan, they purchased his "Vie de Jésus," and became more strongly intrenched in unbelief by its romantic fancies. Thus while their unbelief was passing to a higher, at least a more respectable stage, it was none the less bitter and uncompromising, but was daily gaining in strength.

Meanwhile they were advancing in mental power and becoming more matured in character. They mastered their technical studies with an ease that astonished their fellow-students, and at the end of the third year it was found that Hadley Madelling stood at the head of his class, and his talented friend, George Dane, was next to him on the roll of honor.

NEWNESS OF LIFE.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for June 24. Eph. 4:20-24. Golden Text, Rom. 6:4.

What Newness of Life is—The Sublime Altruism—How Jesus Lived—Not Sensitive to Unkindness or Insult—Self a Great Bargainer—The Crucified Self—How it is to be Attained—In One Definite Act—The Property Transferred—The Mental Spirit Renewed—Newness of Life as a Testimony—Christ's Life a Model.

"ARE ye ignorant that all who were baptized into Jesus Christ were baptized into His death? We were buried, therefore, with Him through baptism into death: that like as Christ was raised from the dead through the glory of His Father, so we also might walk in newness of life." (Rom. 6:3, 4, R. V.) What, then, is this newness of life? Is it forgiveness of sins? But forgiveness of sins is not new, it is as old as David, for he says, "Blessed is the man whose iniquity is forgiven, and whose sin is covered. Blessed is the man unto whom the Lord imputeth not iniquity." (Ps. 32:1, 2.) It is not cleansing, for that, too, is as old as David, for he says, "Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean; wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow. . . Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me." (Ps. 51:7, 10.) It is not the work of winning souls, for David says, "Restore unto me the joy of Thy salvation; and uphold me with Thy free Spirit, then will I teach transgressors Thy ways, and sinners shall be converted unto Thee." (Ps. 51:12, 13.) All these things are new to unconverted sinners. But Paul is writing of something which is new to God's children, when he speaks of "newness of life." A new thing is a thing which has not been before; and, praise God, Jesus brought into our nature in His own person, a life such as had never been lived on earth before. "Behold, I make all things new." (Rev. 21.5.)

A new life is not a life only free from sin, but

A Life Set Free from Self.

When Jesus came into the world, He would not have sinned had He been born as a prince, with all the attendants of royalty; but He would have done as human nature generally does., He would in this way have sought His own interests; it would not have been "newness of life." When, at the age of twelve years, He sat among the doctors in the temple, He, who knew all things, would not have sinned if He had taken the position of Teacher among them; but this would have been self-assertion, and self-assertion is not newness of life: Jesus never forced Himself upon the notice of any. When His enemies said of Him, "He casteth out devils through Beelzebub, the prince of the devils," Jesus might have resented such an insult in the spirit of the law, which says, "An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth." But resentment is not newness of life, it is self defending itself. Jesus, "when He was reviled, reviled not again; when He suffered, He threatened not, but committed Himself unto Him that judgeth righteously." (1 Pet. 2:23.) This is newness of life. When one of the chief Pharisees invited Him to his house, on purpose to watch Him with critical eyes. Jesus did not expose him, but made use of the opportunity to speak words of life to the guests and to His host, and taught that parable of the gospel feast which has been blessed to thousands of souls. (Luke 14:1-24.) Jesus was not proud, therefore He was to that which touched only Him. Sensitive people are always self-filled people; they do not know newness of life. When the Samaritan woman, who, with all her impurity of life, yet had a kind of zeal for her sect, refused a drink of water to Jesus, instead of His turning from her with the thought that she deserved nothing at His hands, He patiently opened to her the glorious truth about the living water; this was newness of life.

Jesus always acted quite irrespective of the way in which He was treated. The majority of men, even of professing Christians, make their conduct to others to depend upon the conduct of others towards them. But this is not newness of life; the very heathen can do as much. "If ye love them which love you, what reward have ye? do not even the publicans the same? (Matt. 5:46.) Self is

A Great Bargainer.

"We have left all and followed Thee; what shall we have therefore?" is the language of self towards God. "You have never done anything to benefit me; why should I help you?" is the language of self toward man. All this belongs to the old man; it is not newness of life. Jesus taught that we are not to do anything with a view to recompense from man. (Luke 14:13, 14.) "Love ye your enemies, and do good and lend, hoping for nothing again, and your reward shall be great, and ye shall be the children of the Highest; for He is kind to the unthankful, and to the evil." (Luke 6:35.) This is newness of life; a kind of life never lived before Jesus came on earth; a life in which self has no place. Most people who know something of the gospel, live as though they did right to trust Jesus for the salvation of their souls; but they care for themselves, defend themselves, are anxious about themselves, assert themselves, as though no "newness of life" had ever been made possible to them.

Paul teaches the Ephesians that newness of life is learning Christ. "Ye did not so learn Christ; if so be that ye heard Him, and were taught in Him as the truth is in Jesus: that ye put away, as concerning your former manner of life, the old man, which waxeth corrupt after the lusts of deceit." Surely, the "old man" is our self-life, that of which Paul said, "I am crucified with Christ." (Gal. 2:20.) Paul had not died so that his body was laid in the grave, but he had yielded up his self-life, to be nailed to the cross of Christ, so that its claims and hopes and fears and wills were to be no more regarded; but the

and thoughts of Jesus, were to take its place. "Nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me; and the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave Himself for me." This was newness of life—Christ taking the place of self all along. Paul's life was no patchwork, no mended-up affair; he could say boldly, and none could deny it, "Christ liveth in me." "To me to live is Christ." (Phil. 1:27.)

But how are we to "put off the old man" and to "put on the new?" There is but one way: "Yield yourselves unto God as those that are alive from the dead. (Rom. 6:13). Let God have His way with you, own Him in everything, and never resist Him. It may be done, and ought to be done in

of making ourselves over to God, just as definite as the transfer of property by the signing of the title deeds. But then there comes the perpetual claim of self, "the old man," upon the renounced property; and here self has to be denied, "put off" as it is called, or "counted out" continually. For instance, we may be workers much owned of God; we attend a meeting, people know we are there, but take no notice of us. Self says, "That is an intentional affront! Why should I be treated thus?" Christ in the heart says, "Thank God that I am left in quiet and not noticed; for I have such a blessed opportunity to pray for all these people." Christ in us does not mark the affront, or, if it is perceived, puts it off, denies it, will not notice or remember it. This is newness of life.

"And be renewed in the spirit of your mind." We cannot renew ourselves, any more than we can create ourselves. It is the prerogative of Him without whom "was not anything made that was made" (John 1:3) to renew us. "Behold I make all things new." The renewing is the renewing of the Holy Ghost." (Tit. 3:5). We read of this renewing that it is daily; "the inward man is renewed day by day" (II Cor. 4:16), and that the "new man" is "renewed in knowledge after the image of Him that created him." (Job 3:10). The renewing is never in our own power—it is ever, "Be renewed," submit yourselves to the renewing; "Be renewed in the spirit of your mind, and put on the new man, which after God hath been created in righteousness and true holiness." (R. V.). How are we to "put on the new man"? Just as we deny self we are to acknowledge Christ. Just as we count out the old man we are to count in or reckon in, the new man. Christ dwells in our hearts by faith (Eph. 3:17), and we take and maintain our position of being crucified with Christ by faith, we reckon on God's renewing to work out in our lives that newness of life which God wants to be

A Testimony to a Lost World.

The world is full of self. God wants self to have no voice in His little flock. And yet religious selfishness is the most common, the most degrading, selfishness which there is. It seems as though Satan, when he finds a soul escaping from his bondage of sin, would move heaven and earth to keep that soul under the bondage of self, that so God should be frustrated, and that the very principle of self which governs in the world, and which is a theatre for sin to act upon, should be united to a certain amount of spiritual life, as though God should be made to contradict Himself in the people who believe in Him!

Few believers seem to take in that we are called to walk as Christ walked, and that the divine precepts of the Sermon on the Mount are as binding upon us as the Old Law was upon the Jews. Retaliation and resentment reign in rival factions of the church just as in the spirit of Zechariah, whose dying word was, "The Lord look upon it, and require it" (II Chron. 24:22), and few there are who possess the spirit of Stephen, "Lord, lay not this sin to their charge" (Acts 7:60). Yet surely only such as serve "in newness of spirit, and not in the oldness of the letter" (Rom. 7:6) can rightly claim the name of "Christian" or "Christ-man!" It is our privilege to live the life and bear the character of another, and that other the Son of God. Otherwise though we may be converted and cleansed from sin; though we may be wise to win souls and possessed of great zeal, we are not fulfilling the purpose for which God created, redeemed, and sanctified us. "Neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision, but a new creation." (Gal. 6:15). The world has had enough of self—whether heathen self or Jewish self, whether Romish self or Protestant self, whether natural self or spiritual self, is alike hateful. What the world wants is Christ, the new creation. A charitable spirit, Christ-like words, Christ-like deeds; a spirit that will ask nothing and give all; which, like the sun, will shine down upon the evil and the good, and give blessing of some kind to the just and to the unjust. A spirit which will rebuff none but hypocrites from its fountain of love in God, can afford to breathe out love upon all. Newness of life is the clothing of the bride when she makes herself ready. (Rom. 19:1). The Holy Spirit produce in us this newness of life!

"THE SECRET OF HIS PRESENCE."

BY ELLEN LAKSHMI GORCH.
—A Native of India.—

In the secret of His presence
How my soul delights to hide!
O how precious are the lessons
Which I learn at Jesus' side!
Earthly cares can never vex me,
Neither trials lay me low;
For when Satan comes to tempt me
To the secret place I go.

When my soul is faint and thirsty,
'Neath the shadow of His wing
There is cool and pleasant shelter,
And a fresh and crystal spring;
And my Saviour rests beside me,
As we hold communion sweet;
If I tried I could not utter
What He says when thus we meet.

Only this I know: I tell him
All my doubts, and griefs, and fears;
O how patiently He listens!
And my drooping soul He cheers.
Do you think He ne'er reproves me?
What a false friend He would be,
If He never, never told me
Of the sins which He must see.

Would you like to know the sweetness
Of the secret of the Lord?
Go and hide beneath His shadow:
This shall then be your reward.
And whene'er you leave the silence
Of that happy meeting-place,
You must mind and bear the image
Of the Master in your face.

PRINCE HENRY, of Prussia, and his Bride PRINCESS IRENE, of Hesse—The Royal Wedding Cortege.

THE ROYAL WEDDING IN BERLIN.

The Houses United—The Bridegroom—Born in 1862—An Expert Wood-Carver—Arrested by a Park-Keeper—A Connoisseur of Queens—Enlisted in the Navy—The Unpleasantness of Discipline—Voyage Around the World—The Bride—Her Illustrious Mother—A Wonderful Sick-Nurse—Her Service in the Military Hospitals—Her Conversion—The Wedding Ceremony—The Welcome to the Bride—A Courtier Chaplain—An Affectionate Family.

THE interesting royal marriage briefly chronicled in these columns two weeks ago, uniting as it does in another bond of union the heads of the two European nations with which our own people are most closely allied by descent and sympathy, deserves a more extended notice, and we therefore give this week portraits of the bride and bridegroom, and a picture of the wedding cortège.

The Bridegroom

is Prince Henry, second son of Frederick III., Emperor of Germany, and the bride is the third daughter of Louis, Grand Duke of Hesse. They are cousins on the mother's side—the bridegroom's mother, the Empress of Germany, being sister to the bride's mother, Princess Alice, respectively the eldest and second daughters of Queen Victoria. They are also related, on the paternal side; King Frederick William I. of Prussia being their common great, great-grandfather. Prince Henry is in his twenty-sixth year, having been born August 14, 1862. As a boy, he was somewhat careless, and not particularly devoted to study; but he was so amiable and persuasive in manner that he generally turned aside the intended scolding. Like all German princes, he learned a trade, and thus became a finished amateur carpenter, delighting in wood-carving, and turning out charming little presents for his family and friends. His restless disposition often brought him into trouble. Among the incidents of now recalled, is a story of his delight at the consternation with which he filled a park-keeper who did not know him. It seems that one day the lad slipped out with his elder sister, Princess Charlotte, into the gardens at Potsdam, and began picking the flowers. A park-keeper promptly pounced on the delinquent, scolded him furiously, and when the boy replied that he had a right to take the flowers, the irate keeper bade him come to the police station. "All right," said Prince Henry, "but I must tell papa first." "And where does this papa live?" growled the keeper. "Papa is the Crown Prince, and he lives in that palace," was the answer.

He had, too, a boy's lack of reverence for dignities. In the course of his studies he was engaged on one of those histories written by fulsome panegyrists of royalty, who represented all queens as beautiful, graceful, and witty. The lad had seen but two queens—his grandmothers, the queens of Prussia and England—neither of whom could be honestly so described. His quiet comment was: "I think this man never saw a queen."

It is stated that his mother's ardent desire that one of her sons should be a sailor was so frequently expressed that her husband determined to gratify it in Prince Henry's case. Having obtained the consent of the old Emperor William, the boy was received into the navy, and with the true Prussian spirit of discipline, was to be treated as an ordinary cadet. When his turn came for an extended voyage, the mother had a natural feeling of concern for the safety of her boy. But she overcame her maternal reluctance and agreed to his going. During his absence, the royal family had two bereavements. He was at Singapore when the Grand Duchess Alecia died, and off Japan when he heard the news of the death of his younger brother, Prince Waldemar. His mother entreated that he be recalled home to console her, but the old Emperor William was inflexible. "You consented to part with him for two years," he said, "and now he must do his duty, too." He is the first of his line who has ever sailed round the world as representative of the new German name and guardian of the new German rights. It was on board the Prince Adalbert under Captain MacLean, a man of Scottish descent, that Prince Henry familiarized himself with the rules of naval discipline and the risks of the sea by circumnavigating the globe; and a subsequent voyage to the West Coast of Africa on board the ironclad Olga added to his experience as a seaman.

The Bride,

Princess Irene, had the inestimable advantage of a good mother. Every one who knew the late Princess Alice, loved her. She was gentle, affectionate, and unwearying in devotion to her loved ones. During the illness of her father, Prince Albert, she was his constant nurse, and her self-possession and thoughtfulness were as astonishing as her affection. In 1871, after her marriage, when her brother the Prince of Wales was stricken down with the disease which had proved fatal to his father, Princess Alice left her German home, and during his long fight for life devoted herself with the same unselfishness to the task of nursing him. Again, in the Franco-German War, the Princess showed herself an angel of mercy in sickness. The crowded hospitals at Darmstadt were under her superintendence, and the post in her hands was no sinecure. Nearly all her time she was in the wards, personally looking to the welfare of the wounded soldiers, and speaking to them gentle words of sympathy and encouragement.

Her conversion came through the blessing of God on a season of sorrow and bereavement. On June 29, 1873, her little son, Prince Frederick William, then a little more than two and a-half years old, fell from an open window in the palace of Darmstadt, and received such injuries that he died almost immediately afterwards. At first this heavy calamity seemed to have produced only "the sorrow of the world that worketh death"; but gradually it became, by God's inscrutable mercy, the means of leading her to think, so that she finally came to seek and find peace in a firm faith in Jesus Christ revealed in the Scriptures of truth, as the only Saviour of sinners. Herr Bergsträsser, in his "Memoirs," says: "The lamented Princess was for several years a disciple of German Rationalism. She seems, in fact, to have come very near to openly denying the Divine existence. All the while, however, she was a devoted wife and mother, and a pattern of every moral virtue. The loss of a child under circumstances which are still well remembered in England, proved the turning-point in the Princess's life. She said to a friend: 'The whole construction of philosophical conclusions which I had formerly built up I now find to be based on nothing; nothing has remained; and what should we be in life if we had no faith and no conviction that there is a God who governs the world and each single one of us? I feel the necessity of prayer; I like to sing hymns with my children, and each has its favorite hymn.'"

From such a mother, so wise, amiable, and tender, the Princess Irene must have had the best of training, and must have learned, from her example, what a good wife and princess should be. She is in her twenty-second year, having been born July 11, 1866. That was the year of the war between Prussia and Austria; and the ceremony of "christening" the baby Princess was performed on the very day when the treaty of peace was signed. She was appropriately named Irene, the Greek word signifying Peace.

was celebrated on May 24 last. On the previous day the bride was brought to Berlin by her father, and the bridal party was met and conducted to Berlin by the Crown Prince of Germany and a brilliant staff. After the usual greetings had taken place, the Crown Prince introduced the distinguished men by whom he was accompanied, to Princess Irene, and then conducted his future sister-in-law to a carriage. Mourning dresses for the late Emperor were discarded for the occasion, and all the younger princesses appeared in white. Princess Irene, in an open victoria drawn by four black horses, with outriding postilions, looked beautiful in her ivory white silk dress. She was completely overcome by the hearty enthusiasm of the reception. Twenty thousand people lined the route, shouting, "Hoch!" "Wilkommen!" &c. She was pale, though she smiled occasionally. A thousand torches of electric light reflecting on the cuirassiers' helmets and on the Gardes du Corps were all toned down to a full-moon ideal. The bridal reception was in the Blue Salon of the palace. The Prince of Wales, who is uncle of both bride and bridegroom, and distinguished guests awaited the arrival of the royal party, who were driven into the court-yard between lines of the Foot Guards. Afterward the bride and bridegroom held a reception in the palace. The park in front was like fairy-land, illuminated by electric lights.

From an early hour on the wedding-day the beautiful Unter den Linden and were lined with people eager to catch a glimpse of the wedding guests as they drove from the capital to the royal palace in the suburb. The Russian Grand Duke Sergius, who represented the Czar on the occasion, appeared in an open carriage, who was closely followed by the Russian Ambassador, and the Russian Military Plenipotentiary, Count Kutusoff. The German Crown Princess, who was accompanied by the Princess Albert, Consort of the Prince Regent of Brunswick, came next, and behind her Royal Highness's coach followed a closed carriage with her little sons, all dressed in white. The eldest, Prince William, stood up and acknowledged the cheers of the people by raising his right hand to his hat, as if giving a military salute. The Prince of Wales, wearing the scarlet uniform of his Blücher Hussars, also drove out to Charlottenburg in an open carriage. The German Crown Prince, in honor of his brother, the bridegroom, appeared in the uniform of the Naval Battalion. Both he and Prince Henry were greatly cheered by the crowd, as was also Count Moltke, who drove out alone in an open carriage.

Meanwhile the royal family and the most distinguished of the guests had assembled in once the bedroom of Frederick the Great. In this apartment the Empress performed the first act in the proceedings by fastening on the head of Princess Irene, the bride, the Wedding Crown of the Prussian Princesses, consisting of circlets of brilliants resting on a cap of purple velvet. The bride wore a magnificent moiré antique wedding dress, which was adorned at the neck with several diamonds as large as nuts. Like the splendid diamond necklace, the bridal fan of gold work adorned with diamonds, and the diamond bracelets, these precious gems belong to the treasure of the Prussian Crown. Round her neck Princess Irene wore a fourfold chain of magnificent pearls, the wedding gift of the Emperor and Empress. The Indian shawl, which was the gift of the Queen of England, being unsuitable for a bride's attire, was not worn at the ceremony.

After the fastening on of the Crown the civil ceremony of the marriage was performed, and upon its conclusion the Royal persons Proceeded to the Palace Chapel.

Tne bridegroom conducted the bride on his right arm, and they entered the chapel punctually at noon. Behind the bridal pair came the Grand Duke of Hesse, walking with the Empress, the Prince of Wales with the German Crown Princess, and the Crown Prince with the Grand Duchess Sergius. Meanwhile the other guests had assembled in the chapel, a pleasing little structure, adorned with a fine painting of Faith, Love, and Hope, and numerous medallions and reliefs, representing Biblical scenes, the colors, among which blue and gold predominate, blending in admirable har mony. All chairs had been removed in preparation for the present ceremony, with the exception of six large armchairs, placed before the altar, and intended for the highest personages present. Upon the altar, a carved and gilded table, with a cover of red velvet, stood two burning candles and a Bible. The whole space behind and beside the altar, was covered with roses of all colors, the exquisite perfume of which filled the chapel. Just as the bride and bridegroom were stepping up to the altar the Empress Augusta, in deep black with white trimming, entered the chapel in a bath chair. The Empress Victoria stepped up to her mother-in-law and kissed her hand, the other members of the Royal Family following her example.

The service was opened by the choir singing a hymn, "Praise the Lord, the mighty King of Honors," in which the assembly joined. At this point, through a doorway near the Empress Victoria's chair, in Grand General's Uniform, with the ribbon of the Hessian Order, walking erect and with elastic step, attended by General Winterfeld. He bowed urbanely in all directions, and, after kissing his mother's hand, sat down beside the Empress Victoria. The service was conducted by Dr. Kögel, first Court Chaplain, who was assisted by the Rev. Herr Persius, of Potsdam, the bridegroom's religious instructor, Superintend- Müller, of Charlottenbnrg, and Dr. Sell, of Darmstadt. Dr. Kögel took as his text John 14: 27, "Peace I leave with you, My peace I give unto you."

The Emperor Entered,

In the course of his address, he said: "After days of deep mourning and anxious care a May day of happiness and splendor greets our Royal house. Your hearts, devoted in deepest affection to one another, will seal the covenant with a marriage-ring and the oath of fidelity before God's altar. The two illustrious fathers lay on your heads the blessing by which the houses of children are built up; a deeply moved mother draws the child of an early sainted sister to her heart; our Empress Mother, amid the sorrow of isolation, is full of tenderest sympathy for your young happiness, for which the late Emperor folded his hands in blessing; and England's good Queen, who was present lately in this house of God, remembers the wedding-day of her grandchildren in her prayers. Supported by so much love and fidelity, surrounded by the blessings and good wishes of brothers and sisters, relations and friends, yourselves full of ardent gratitude, you enter this memorable sanctuary, and receive the gracious promise of the eternal Prince of peace, 'Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you.'"

At the conclusion of the chaplain's address a chorale was sung, whereupon the Emperor, who had apparently resolved to forget his illness for that day at least, made a sign to Prince Henry to kneel down for which was announced to the outer world by thundering salvos of artillery, and for the prayer and blessing. Handel's "Hallelujah Chorus" concluded the ceremony. The aged Empress Augusta, grandmother of the Bridegroom, embraced and kissed the Prince and Princess. The Empress Victoria then kissed the Bride, while the Emperor embraced his son with much affection. At the déjeuner which followed in the Schloss the Crown Prince proposed the only toast—the health of the Bride and Bridegroom. Prince and Princess Henry drove at three P.M., in a carriage drawn by four horses to the railway station through an outburst of parting cheers from the tens of thousands of spectators lining the streets. They travelled by railway to Ermansdorf, in Silesia, where they are spending the honeymoon.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

The Young Woman's Notion of Prayer.—"'I should not know what to say,' observed a poor young woman in the East of London, when I asked her to pray to God. 'I might make a mistake, and, oh, how dreadful that would be!' To which I replied, 'God knows your heart, and well He knows what you mean, though you cannot express yourself as you would like.' 'Oh, I am so glad to know that!' she answered; 'but I thought I must pray to God like the clergyman, who uses a book, and says things in such a nice and beautiful way. I know I could never pray like that, sir.' It was not long ere with streaming eyes and a plaintive voice this poor penitent exclaimed, 'Oh, have mercy on me, hear me, and save me, for Jesus Christ's sake,' and God answered her prayer, and filled her with the joy of His salvation."

Twenty-five Christians in a Cave.—Mr. McDonald, a Scotch missionary of South Africa, says: "I first went to South Africa immediately after the close of one of our little wars, and great was the desolation it had occasioned. Mission stations demolished, the people scattered, and years of good undone in as many weeks. When I got to what had once been a flourishing mission station, I found only twenty-five Christians left, and they were meeting in a cave to worship God away from the notice of the other natives. But in the course of a few years God has wrought wonders, and the twenty-five Christians have increased to six hundred and twenty-four, no longer meeting in a cave, but with two mission centres having twenty-six preaching stations each. There is room for a great work in Africa, but the difficulty is the scarcity of missionaries. Why are there so many preachers in Great Britain and so few in Africa? God did not mean the Bread of Life to be kept in one corner of the earth while men and women were starving."

An Instance of Divine Retribution.—"Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord." So reads the well-known passage of Scripture, and the Christians in Kanye, Bechuanaland, South Africa, are learning that the words are true. Six months ago they were cruelly attacked by their heathen neighbors; their houses were burnt down, and their property stolen or destroyed. But they did not retaliate, preferring patiently to suffer wrong-doing. The hand of God, however, has overtaken the wrong-doers, and one after another of the ringleaders has died from drink and other evil practices. In relating these facts the Rev. James Good says that both the heathen people and the Christians are alike deeply impressed. Not only so, but more than forty new members have been received into the native church, and they have a larger number of inquirers than in any past year. At their New Year's gathering nearly fifty wagons came in from the out-stations. The church was full, and they had a large gathering on the mountain on the site of their burnt-down church. In the evening 250 rejoicing Christians sat together at the Lord's Table.

Dead on the Doorstep.—"There was a Poor old Scotch woman, who lived in a village in the far North. She had a daughter who resided in a valley at some distance off. One day in winter she went on a visit to her daughter, and as she was taking some refreshment preparatory to returning home, a blinding snow-storm came on, and her daughter advised her to stay where she was for the night; but the old woman insisted on going home at once, so she put on her plaid and set out. Her daughter was very anxious about her all that night, and getting up early in the morning went to her mother's house; but she did not find her there. In great alarm she ran to the nearest neighbor, and procuring help, they searched the hills, but in vain; nowhere could the aged woman be found. They went to her home again, this time by the front door, for they had gone to the back before, and there they found her dead, frozen on the doorstep. She had struggled bravely through the snow, on, on, on; nearer and nearer, until victory seemed within her grasp and safety at hand. Then, just at the doorstep she sank exhausted, and there she died. And are there not many persons who are almost saved, who almost trust in Christ, who will almost get to heaven? But almost is of no use. The individual who is almost a Christian will be lost as irretrievably as the blackest sinner."

A Native Pastor on His Son's Death.—The Rev. Ruttonji Nowroji, native pastor at Aurangabad, Western India, thus writes to the Rev. W. S. Price, in reply to a letter of sympathy on the death of his son from cholera: "I must thank your for your kind expressions of sympathy in my recent loss. It was my second son, a lad about sixteen years of age. The attack was very strong and severe. He struggled for nearly five days, and suffered much in body; but oh! I cannot tell you how completely happy he was in mind. There was no fear—no doubt; all was light and peace. His mind would wander upon all earthly things; but Christ—His atoning sacrifice, His love, His glory—heaven, and heavenly fecility, were deep realities to him. He would quote passage after passage from the Bible without a mistake. He prayed much. He offered a beautiful prayer in which was much praise, commending us all to our Father in heaven. Never before have I ever witnessed so happy and so peaceful a death. It was a sweet sleep. I praise the Lord for this great comfort and consolation. Our hearts have sorely bled, but we have been greatly comforted."

A Climb in the Rocky Mountains.—Mr. McCaul, a Christian worker, of Canada, relates: "I remember spending two weeks in the Rocky Mountains. There were many fine views to be had, but one especially from a certain point which stood high above the surrounding peaks, but the roads to it were so precipitous and dangerous that few cared to risk the dangers. A party of us, however, determined to attempt the ascent, that we might obtain this gorgeous view. Our guide directed us to follow him closely, to put our feet in the marks he left by his feet, to stop where he stopped, and when he, caught hold of a tree and swung himself forward, to wait till it swung back, and then one by one follow his example. I happened to be immediately behind him, and with what earnestness did I watch his every movement, that I might follow it! When we reached the top we were amply rewarded for all we had had to endure. Similarly, dear friends, the only way to reach the heights and view the glory-land which we shall soon enter, is by steadily, earnestly, and watchfully following Jesus, our Divine Guide, and if we endure to the end, what a glorious reward! a crown of life that fadeth not away, and to dwell with Christ forever."

The Young Man With the Blue Ribbon.—Mr. Thomson said: "I once met a young man in his own home who wore the blue ribbon of abstinence. In the course of conversation I inquired of him. 'Are you a Christian, my dear friend?' Replying in the negative, as I had feared, I then said, 'You know, my dear fellow, your blue ribbon will never take you to heaven, glad as I am to see you with it; you must turn your back upon all your sins and seek mercy through Jesus Christ. Are you willing here and now to kneel and confess your sins and find pardon?' He immediately gave his assent, and we both knelt. After I had prayed for him and he himself had asked for forgiveness, we rose from our knees. I then asked, 'Has He forgiven you?' 'I do not know,' was the doubtful reply, to which I responded, 'If we confess our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins. His business is forgiveness, and your business is confession. So He has not proved faithful to you, has He?' Holding out his hand to me, he exclaimed, 'Oh, yes; the Lord has forgiven me for Christ's sake, but it really seems too good to be true.' I have watched that young man during the years that have since passed, and he is still walking in the light and love of God."

PULPIT AND PRESS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached Last Sunday Morning, June 17, 1888.

"The children of this world are, in their generation, wiser than the children of light." Luke 16: 8.

A Golden Opportunity—The Aid the Press Might Render to the Pulpit—Estranged by Indiscriminate Hostility—Justice Sure in the End—Painful Personal Experiences — The Reaction — Christian Courtesy to be Extended to Reporters —A New View of Armageddon—The Evil of Sunday Newspapers—A Bible the First Book Printed—Pointed Sermons Wanted—A Treaty Proposed—Benjamin Franklin's Epitaph—Luke a Reporter—Conversion of a Reporter—Unappreciated Work—A Proposed Marriage.

SACRED stupidity, and solemn incompetency, and sanctified laziness are here rebuked by Christ. He says worldlings are wider awake for opportunities than are Christians. Men of the world grab occasions, while Christian people let the most valuable occasions drift by unimproved. That is the meaning of our Lord when He says: "The children of this world are, in their generation, wiser than the children of light."

A marked illustration of the truth of that maxim is in the slowness of the Christian religion to take possession of the secular printing press. The opportunity is open, and has been for some time open, but the ecclesiastical courts, and the churches, and the ministers of religion are, for the most part, allowing to pass unimproved. That the opportunity is open, I declare, from the fact that all the secular newspapers are glad of any religious facts or statistics that you present them. Any animated and stirring article relating to religious themes they would gladly print. They thank you for any information in regard to churches. If a wrong has been done to any Christian church, or Christian institution, you could go into any newspaper of the land and have the real truth stated. Dedication services, ministerial ordinations and pastoral installations, corner-stone laying of a church, anniversary of a charitable society, will have reasonable space in any secular journal, if it have previous notice given. If I had some great injustice done me, there is not an editorial or a reportorial room in the United States into which I could not go and get myself set right: and that is true of any well-known Christian man. Why, then, does not our glorious Christianity embrace these magnificent opportunities? I have before me a subject of first and last importance: How shall we secure the secular press as a mightier reinforcement to religion and the pulpit?

The first thing toward this result is cessation of

against newspaperdom. You might as well denounce the legal profession because of the shysters, or the medical profession because of the quacks, or merchandise because of the swindling bargain-makers, as to slam-bang newspapers because there are recreant editors, and unfair reporters, and unclean columns. Guttenberg, the inventor of the art of printing, was about to destroy his types and extinguish the art, because it was suggested to him that printing might be suborned into the service of the devil; but afterward he bethought himself that the right use of the art might more than overcome the evil use of it; and so he spared the type, and the intelligence of all following ages. But there are many to-day in the depressed mood of Guttenberg, with uplifted hammer, wanting to pound to pieces the type, who have not reached his better mood, in which he saw the art of printing to be the rising sun of the world's illumination.

If, instead of fighting newspapers, we spend the same length of time, and the same vehemence, in marshalling their help in religious directions, we would be as much wiser as the man who gets consent of the railroad superintendent to fasten a car to the end of a rail-train, shows better sense than he who runs his wheelbarrow up the track to meet and drive back the Chicago limited express. The silliest thing that a man ever does is to fight a newspaper, for you may have the floor for utterance perhaps for one day in the week, while the newspaper has the floor every day of the week. Napoleon, though a mighty man, had many weaknesses, and one of the weakest things he ever did was to threaten that if the English newspapers did not stop their adverse criticism of himself, he would, with four hundred thousand bayonets, cross the Channel for their chastisement.

Don't Fight Newspapers.

Attack provokes attack. Better wait till the excitement blows over and then go in and get justice, for get it you will if you have patience, and common sense, and equipoise of disposition. It ought to be a mighty sedative that there is an enormous amount of common sense in the world, and you will eventually be taken for what you are really worth, and you cannot be puffed up, and you cannot be written down, and if you are the enemy of good society, that fact will come out, and if you are the friend of good society, that fact will be established.

I know what I am talking about, for I can draw on my own experience. All the respectable newspapers, as far as I know, are my friends now. But many of you remember the time when I was the most continuously and meanly attacked man in this country. God gave me grace not to answer back, and for ten years, and much grace was required. What I said was perverted and twisted into just the opposite of what I did say. My person was maligned, and I was presented as a gorgon, and I was maliciously described by persons who had never seen me as a monstrosity in body, mind, and soul. There were millions of people who believed that there was a large sofa in this pulpit, although we never had anything but a chair, and that during the singing by the congregation I was accustomed to lie down on that sofa and dangle my feet over the end. Lying New York correspondents for ten years misrepresented our church services, but we waited, and people from every neighborhood of Christendom came here to find the magnitude of the falsehoods concerning the church and concerning myself. A reaction set in, and now we have justice, full justice, more than justice, and as

as once we had under-appreciation; and no man that ever lived was so much indebted to the newspaper press for opportunity to preach the gospel as I am. Young men in the ministry, young men in all professions and occupations, wait. You can afford to wait. Take rough misrepresentation as a Turkish towel to start up your languid circulation, or a system of massage or Swedish movement, whose pokes and pulls and twists and thrusts are salutary treatment. There is only one person you need to manage, and that is yourself. Keep your disposition sweet by communion with the Christ, who answered not again, the society of genial people, and walk out in the sunshine with your hat off, and you will come out all right. And don't join the crowd of people in our day who spend much of their time damning newspapers.

Again: in this effort to secure the secular press as a mightier reinforcement of religion, let us make it the avenue of religious information. My advice, often given to friends who propose to start a new paper, is: "Don't! Don't! Employ the papers already started." The biggest financial hole ever dug in this American continent is the hole in which good people throw their money when they start a newspaper. It is almost as good and as quick a way of getting rid of money as buying stock in a gold-mine in Colorado. Not more printing-presses, but the right use of those already established. All their cylinders, all their steam power, all their pens, all their types, all their editorial chairs and reportorial rooms, are available if you would engage them in behalf of civilization and Christianity.

Again, if you would secure the secular press as a mightier reinforcement of religion and the pulpit, extend widest and highest to the representatives of journalism. Give them easy-chairs and plenty of room when they come to report occasions. For the most part they are gentlemen of education and refinement, graduates of colleges, with families to support by their literary craft, many of them weary with the push of a business that is precarious and fluctuating, each one of them the avenue of information to thousands of readers their impression of the services to be the impression adopted by multitudes. They are connecting links between a sermon, or a song, or prayer, and this great population that tramp to and down the streets day by day and year by year with their sorrows uncomforted and their sins unpardoned. More than eight hundred thousand people in Brooklyn, and less than seventy-five thousand in churches, so that our cities are not so much preached to by ministers of religion as by reporters. Put all journalists into our prayers and sermons. Of all the hundred thousand sermons preached to-day, there will not be three preached to journalists, and probably not one. Of all the prayers offered for classes of men innumerable, the prayer offered for the most potential class will be few and rare that they will be thought

A Preacher's Idiosyncrasy.

This world will never be brought to God until some revival of religion sweeps over the land and takes into the kingdom of God editors and reporters, compositors, pressmen, and newsboys. And if you have not faith enough to pray for that and toil for that, you had better get out of our ranks and join the other side, for you are the unbelievers who make the wheels of the Lord's chariot drag heavily. The great final battle between truth and error, the Armageddon, I think, will not be fought with swords and shells and guns,* but with pens—quill pens, steel pens, gold pens, fountain pens, and, before that, the pens must be converted. The most divinely honored weapon of the past has been the pen, and the most divinely honored weapon of the future will be the pen; prophet's pen and evangelist's pen and apostle's pen, followed by editor's pen and reporter's pen and author's pen. God save the pen! The wing of the Apocalyptic angel will be the printed page. The printing-press will roll ahead of Christ's chariot to clear the way.

"But," some one might ask, "would you make

also a reinforcement?" I have learned to take things as they are. I would like to see the much-scoffed-at old Puritan Sabbaths come back again. I do not think the modern Sunday will turn out any better men and women than were your grandfathers and grandmothers under the old-fashioned Sunday. To say nothing of other results, Sunday newspapers are killing editors, reporters, compositors, and pressmen. Every man, woman, and child is entitled to twenty-four hours of nothing to do. If the newspapers put on another set of hands, that does not relieve the editorial and reportorial room of its cares and responsibilities. Our literary men die fast enough without killing them with Sunday work.

All things are possible with God, and my faith is up until nothing in the way of religious victory would surprise me. All the newspaper printing-presses of the earth are going to be the Lord's, and telegraph and telephone and type will yet announce nations born in a day.

The First Book Ever Printed

was the Bible by Faust and his son-in-law Schoeffer in 1460, and that consecration of type to the Holy Scriptures was a prophecy of the great mission of printing for the evangelization of all the nations. The father of the American printing-press was a clergyman, Rev. Jesse Glover, and that was a prophecy of the religious use that the gospel ministry in this country were to make of the types.

*Rev. 16: 16–21.

Again: we shall secure the secular press as a mightier re-inforcement of religion and the pulpit, by making our religious utterances more interesting and spirited, and then the press will reproduce them. On the way to church some fifteen years ago, a journalist said a thing that has kept me ever since thinking: "Are you going to give us any to-day?" "What do you mean?" I asked. He said: "I mean by that anything that will be striking enough to be remembered." Then I said to myself: What right have we in our pulpits and Sunday-schools to take the time of people if we have nothing to say that is memorable! David did not have any difficulty in remembering Nathan's thrust: "Thou art the man;" nor Felix in remembering Paul's point-blank utterance on righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come; nor the English king any difficulty in remembering what the court preacher said, when, during the sermon against sin the preacher threw his handkerchief into the king's pew to indicate whom he meant.

The tendency of criticism in the theological seminaries is to file off from our young men all the sharp points and make them too smooth for any kind of execution. What we want, all of us, is more point, less humdrum. If we say the right thing in the right way, the press will be glad to echo and re-echo it. Sabbath-school teachers, reformers, young men and old men in the ministry, what we all want if we are to make the printing-press an ally in Christian work is that which the reporter spoken of suggested—points, sharp points, memorable points. But if the thing be dead when uttered by living voice, it will be a hundred-fold more dead when it is laid out in cold type.

Now, as you all have something to do with the newspaper press, either in issuing a paper or in reading it, either as producers or patrons, either as sellers or purchasers of the printed sheet, I propose on this Sabbath morning, June 17, 1888, between the church and the printing-press, a treaty to be ratified by millions of good people if we rightly fashion it, a treaty promising that we will help each other in our work of trying to illumine and felicitate the world, we by voice, you by pen, we by speaking only that which is worth printing, you by printing only that which is fit to speak. You help us, and we will help you. Side by side be these two potent agencies until the Judgment Day, when we must both be scrutinized for our work, healthful or blasting. The two worst off men in that day will be the minister of religion and the editor if they wasted their opportunity. Both of us are the engineer of long express trains of influence, and we will run them into a depot of light or tumble them off the embankments.

A Treaty to be Signed

What a useful life and what a glorious departure was that of the most famous of all American printers, whom infidels in the penury of their resources have often fraudulently claimed for their own, but the printer who moved that the Philadelphia convention be opened with prayer, the resolution lost because a majority thought prayer unnecessary, and who wrote at the time he was viciously attacked: "My rule is to go straight forward in doing what appears to me to be right, leaving the consequences to Providence," and who wrote this quaint epitaph showing his hope of resurrection, an epitaph that I hundreds of times read while living in Philadelphia:

Benjamin Franklin,

"The Body of Benjamin Franklin, Printer, like the cover of an old book, its contents torn out, and stript of its lettering and gilding) lies here food for worms. Yet the work itself shall not be lost, for it will (as he believed) appear once more in a new and more beautiful edition, corrected and amended by the Author."

That Providence intends the profession of reporters to have a mighty share in the world's redemption is suggested by the fact that Paul and Christ took a reporter along with them, and he reported their addresses and their acts.

Luke was a Reporter, and he wrote not only the book of Luke, but the Acts of the Apostles, and without that reporter's work we would have known nothing of the Pentecost, and nothing of Stephen's martydom, and nothing of Tabitha's resurrection, and nothing of the jailing and unjailing of Paul and Silas, and nothing of the shipwreck at Melita. Strike out the reporter's work from the Bible and you kill a large part of the New Testament. It makes me think that in the future of the Kingdom of God, the reporters are to bear a mighty part.

A Reporter at The Tabernacle.

About thirteen years ago a representative of an important newspaper took his seat in this church, one Sabbath night, about five pews from the front of this pulpit. He took out pencil and reporter's pad, resolved to caricature the whole scene. When the music began, he began; and with his pencil he derided that, and then derided the prayer, and then derided the reading of the Scriptures, and then began to deride the sermon. But, he says, for some reason, his hand began to tremble, and he, rallying himself, sharpened his pencil and started again, but broke down again, and then put pencil and paper in his pocket, and, his head down on the front of the pew, and began to pray. At the close of the service he came up and asked for the prayers of others, and gave his heart to God; and, though still engaged in newspaper work, he is an evangelist, and hires a hall at his own expense, and every Sabbath afternoon preaches Jesus Christ to the people.

And the men of that profession are going to come in a body throughout the country. I know hundreds of them, and a more genial or highly educated class of men it would be hard to find, and, though the tendency of their profession may be towards scepticism, an organized, common-sense, gospel invitation would fetch them to the front of all Christian endeavor. Men of the pencil and pen, in all departments, you need the help of the Christian religion. In the day when people want to get their newspapers at three cents, and are hoping for the time when they can get any of them at one cent, and, as a consequence, are, by the thousand, ground under the cylinders, you want God to take care of you and your families. Some of your best work is as much unappreciated as was Milton's Paradise Lost, for which the author received twenty-five dollars; and the immortal poem "Hohenlinden" of Thomas Campbell, when he first offered it for publication, and in the column called "Notices to Correspondents," appeared, the words: "To T. C.—The lines commencing 'On Linden when the sun was low,' are not up to our standard. Poetry is not T. C.'s forte."

O men of the pencil and pen, amid your unappreciated work you need encouragement, and you can have it. Printers of all Christendom, editors, reporters, compositors, pressmen, publishers, and readers of that which is printed, resolve that you will not write, set up, edit, issue, or read anything that debases body, mind, or soul. In the name of God, by the laying on of the hands of faith and prayer, ordain the printing-press for righteousness and liberty and salvation. All of us with some influence that will help in the right direction, let us put our hands to the work, imploring God to hasten the consummation. A ship with hundreds of passengers approaching the South American coast, the man on the lookout neglected his work, and in a few minutes the ship would have been dashed to ruin on the rocks. But a cricket on board the vessel, that had made no sound all the voyage, set up a shrill call at the smell of land, and the captain, knowing that habit of the insect, the vessel was stopped in time to avoid an awful wreck. And so, insignificant means now may do wonders, and the scratch of a pen may save the shipwreck of a soul.

Are you all ready for the signing of the contract, the league, the solemn treaty proposed between Journalism and Evangelism? Let it be of the pulpit and the printing-press. The ordination of the former on my head, the pen of the latter in my hand, it is appropriate that I publish the banns of such a marriage. Let them from this day be one in the magnificent work of the world's redemption.

"Let thrones and powers and kingdoms be Obedient, mighty God, to Thee;
And over land and stream and main,
Now wave the sceptre of Thy reign.

"O, let that glorious anthem swell,
Let host to host the triumph tell,
Till not one rebel heart remains,
But over all the Saviour reigns."

THE TEXT AMONG THE FLOWERS.

IN Mr. C. H. Spurgeon's magazine for this month, Captain Meldrum relates the following: "A young man, named Robert Reyner, belonging to Hartlepool, whom I know personally, told me the following story a short time ago, and I am sure I can rely upon its truth, he being a thoroughly sincere Christian, as well as a good worker for God's cause. He was by trade a driller in the iron shipbuilding, which is very hard, laborious work. Having to be in all positions at work, he found his labor to be very trying to his constitution; and it ultimately brought on a dreadful malady in the form of a double rupture. The poor fellow toiled on as long as he could, but at last he had to cease his work. He became worse and worse, and was advised to go to London, to see what could be done for him there. After much prayer, he consented to go to the great city, and went to Guy's Hospital. After having been examined by the principal doctors, he was told that there was nothing for him but to undergo a very dangerous operation.

"The surgeons intimated at the same time that they required his own consent, for the operation would be peculiarly full of risk. They gave him a week's consideration, and at the end of the week he gave his consent that in three days the operation should be performed. With much prayer he committed his case in a child-like manner to his heavenly father, in whom he had strong faith. Then he thought of his dear young wife being left in this hard, unfeeling world, without any earthly friend, and this was a sharp trial to his loving heart. This gave him great trouble for the first two out of the three days of waiting. Sometimes, also, his faith wavered at the prospect of premature death. No wonder, for life had its holy pleasures for him.

"He said to himself that he would never again have the privilege of standing up to preach the glorious gospel of the blessed God. This sudden end of his happy service gave him some trouble of mind. However, the day before the operation, lying on his bed meditating, the Lord sent a message from the throne. A delicate-looking lady came to his bedside with a basket of flowers. She talked with him some little time; and, upon leaving, she presented him with a little bunch of flowers, and in the midst of them he found a tiny card, bearing the somewhat singular text of Scripture—we mean singular to be put to such a use: 'He trusted in God: let Him deliver Him now.' (Matt. 27:43.)

"When he read these words they filled him with holy joy, and he cast himself deliberately upon his God, and cried, 'Come on, you doctors!' The following morning the principal doctor was much surprised to see him so full of joy; and was still more taken aback when he told them that he would not be chloroformed, as he intended going to heaven in his sober senses. In the presence of the four doctors he exclaimed, 'Lord, deliver me now! Nevertheless, Thy will be done.' He bore up under the terrible pain like a true hero, for the Lord sustained him. The operation was skilfully performed, and he recovered, and is still preaching the glorious gospel of the ever-blessed God."

REV. W. F. REQUA AMONG THE INDIANS.

A VERY hopeful letter from Mr. ReQua has come to hand. He has been on an evangelistic journey into the Cherokee nation, and has been much encouraged by the result. There is reason to believe that many souls were converted at the meetings held. A local journal published at Muscogee, Ind. Ter., says: "The meetings at Tahlequah were well attended—sometimes the house was crowded—on one or two occasions some could not find seats. These meetings were among the most spiritual ever held at Tahlequah. Christians were greatly benefited, and some led, as it seemed, to trust the Saviour. Brother ReQua's visit will long be remembered by those who attended the meetings, and listened to his earnest words and inspiring gospel songs. He is expecting to procure a tent and conduct gospel meetings at different places in the Territory during the coming summer. If he succeeds in carrying out his plan, we feel sure that wherever he goes the people will be not only interested, but greatly benefited by the services of this earnest faithful servant of God."

On reaching Fort Gibson he found the intertribal convention assembled, and he was enabled to speak to representatives of five tribes: the Choctaws, Cherokees, Creeks, Chickasaws, and Seminoles. Ex-chief Bushey-head, attended the meetings held by Mr. ReQua, and manifested a deep and serious interest in the gospel message. He came to the preacher for personal conversation, and assured him that if he is enabled to carry out his project of tent-work for the summer he will be warmly welcomed, and hundreds of Indians who have never heard of Christ, will flock to his meetings. Bushey-head was also enthusiastic about the idea of an orphanage for the Indian children, those who have lost their parents being in a deplorable condition. He promised to give it his hearty support and to do anything in his power to promote it.

Mr. ReQua has now received sixty-eight dollars toward the tent, and a brother at Eau Claire has promised him a set of harness when he is ready for it. He is confident that God will answer his prayers in this matter. The urgent need of the work among these heathen tribes being so clear, and the blessing that has attended his labors being so manifest, he is assured that in some way God will incline His people to give him the funds still needed. Every dollar brings him nearer to the object of his hope. His address is Rev. W. F. ReQua, Box 14 McAlister, Indian Territory.

A DYING GIRL'S MESSAGE.

AN incident connected with one of Rev. E. P. Hammond's meetings has recently come to light. A Christian gentleman, who attended the meeting to speak to the inquirers, devoted all his attention to one girl, who after a long conversation at last perceived the truth, and joyfully made a profession of her faith. The worker, anxious that she should, as it were, nail her colors to the mast, gained her promise to go right home, and tell her parents, who were godless persons, that she had become a Christian, and was resolved with God's help to lead a Christian life. Whether the girl did so, or what was the result, the Christian worker did not hear for many years, as he left the town, and did not return to it until business took him there. It so happened that at the same time evangelistic meetings were again being held there, and it was stated on the bills that he would speak. After the meeting he was asked to speak to a man who had just made a profession of faith. On going to him the man asked if he was really the person whose name was on the bills, and on being answered in the affirmative, asked if he remembered speaking to a girl named Jeanie many years ago at one of Mr. Hammond's meetings. The Christian worker remembered the incident and said so.

"I am Jeanie's father," said the big man with tears in his eyes. "My wife and I were very angry with poor Jeanie when she told us about joining the church, and it was a sore subject for a long while. Jeanie was true and faithful though, and she was a good girl. Not long ago she fell ill, and when she was dying she made me promise to find you, and tell you that she died quite happy, trusting in Jesus. I never heard of you till I saw the bills of these meetings. I hated to come to the meeting, and my wife would not come, but I would not break my promise to poor Jeanie. I came just to give you her message, and while I sat and listened, waiting to speak to you, the Lord laid hold of me, and I have given myself to Him. I'm so happy, and I want you to pray for my wife. Poor Jeanie! I wish she knew."

THE REFORMATION OF A CONVICT.

A REMARKABLE instance of the power of kindness to overcome desperate natures is related in the Youth's Companion. It says: One of the most hopeless cases ever brought into the great Moyamensing Prison in Philadelphia was a negress, who was convicted of a crime of violence. She was a huge, fierce animal, who had been born and had lived in the slums of Alaska Street. She was a drunkard and dissolute from childhood.

The chaplain, after she had been under his charge for six months, shook his head hopelessly and passed by her cell without a word.

One day the matron, taking a bunch of soiled scarlet flowers from her hat, threw them to "Deb" carelessly, with a pleasant word or two. The woman started in astonishment, and then thanked her earnestly. The next day the matron saw the flowers, each leaf straightened and smoothed, pinned up on the wall of the cell. Deb, in a gentle voice, called attention to them, praised their beauty, and tried, in her clumsy way, to show the pleasure they had given her.

"That woman," said the matron to the chaplain, "has the rarest of all good qualities. She is grateful. There is one square inch of good ground in which to plant your seed."

The matron herself planted the seed. Every day she showed some little kindness to the poor, untamed creature, who was gradually softened and subdued simply by affection for this, her first friend, whom she followed like a faithful dog.

By and by the matron took her as a helper in the ward, a favor given only to the convicts whose conduct deserved reward. Deb was orderly, quiet, and neat from her sheer gratitude only. The matron's hold upon the woman grew stronger each day. At last she told her the story of the Saviour's sacrifice. Deb listened with wide, eager eyes.

"He died for me—me!" she said.

The matron gave up her position, but when Deb was discharged she took her into her house as a servant, trained, taught her, cared for her body and soul, always planting her seeds in that "one square inch of good ground."

Deb became a humble, faithful Christian. "He died for me," was the thought which lightened her darkened soul.

THE GROWING WORK IN CHINA.

SOME idea of the work accomplished by the China Inland Mission through faith and prayer, may be gained from a recent statement made by its founder, Rev. J. Hudson Taylor. He said that twenty-two years ago, on May 26, 1866, there were only three Protestant Mission stations, and these were in two provinces. But now stations had been opened in ten provinces. There were now in connection with all Protestant societies 500 more missionaries, not counting their wives, in the country than there were twenty-two years ago. Four thousand souls at least have been gathered into the fold by the agency of the China Inland Mission. The present staff of the China Inland Mission numbered 294, viz., missionaries and their wives, 112; unmarried missionaries, 169; associates, 13. The native helpers—pastors, evangelists, colporteurs, Bible-women, etc.—number 132. Some of the missionaries have gone out at their own expense. The others have all gone out in dependence upon God for temporal supplies, and with the clear understanding that the Mission does not guarantee any income whatever, and knowing that, as the Mission does not go into debt, it can only minister to those connected with it as the funds sent in from time to time may allow. There are now sixty-six organized churches, eighteen schools, three hospitals, five dispensaries, and sixteen opium refuges. The Rev. E. O. Williams, who is about to give himself up to the missionary work in China, and who was lately vicar of a large parish in Leeds, England, said the question was not, Why should I go? but, Why should I not go? not, Have I a call to the heathen? but, Have I a call to stay at home? Last year Mr. Taylor prayed that he might be enabled to place one hundred more missionaries in the field, and that he might have $50,000 more money for the work. He now announces that 103 missionaries have been sent out, and the income for the year was $168,588, being $55,000 more than the income of the previous year. Mr. C. T. Studd the famous English cricketer, who through Mr. Moody's instrumentality was led to give up all the advantages resulting from a university career and devote himself to missionary work in China, was married on April 7. His wife was Miss Priscilla Stewart, who is also a missionary in China.

A SINGULAR INDIAN RITE.

THE consciousness of inward sin, yet the deplorable ignorance of the only effectual means of cleansing it by the blood of Christ, which cleanseth from all sin, were betrayed in a strange rite recently witnessed by a missionary in India. He saw a young man attempting to cleanse his stomach and intestines by swallowing a piece of cloth about two inches broad and eight yards in length. It is one of their purificatory rites, and great religious merit is attached to it. The Hindus seem to have gone a step further than the Pharisees in this respect. The cloth was, at first, soaked in water, and then, little by little, it was swallowed in a few minutes, and by several spasmodic movements of the stomach and intestines, the washing was effected, and after washing, the cloth was drawn out. The young man who performed this feat has taken to it since the last four months. This rite shows to what extent the Hindoo mind has exerted itself to cleanse itself from the impurities of sin. "I have spoken to him," says the missionary, "and left some Christian books with him to show him the true way of life, and how he may really attain, through Christ, the purity which He requireth who, as the man evidently perceives, 'desires truth in the inward parts.'" (Ps. 51 : 6.)

A DISHONEST CHINAWOMAN'S CONFESSION

A LADY missionary in China—Mrs. Broumton—relates a striking answer to prayer which recently occurred in the mission work. She says: "Mr. Ts'en, the school-teacher and evangelist at Kwei-yang, who is the first-fruits of the work there, has suffered much persecution from his friends and relatives for being a Christian; his wife also has been a great trial to him, through her deceitful and indolent habits, and many prayers have gone up on her behalf, that she might be led to repentance and salvation. Some time ago Mrs. Andrew wrote telling us Mrs. Ts'en was ill; and lately she has written again, and tells us that the disease (dropsy) seems to be on the increase, and has affected Mrs. Ts'en's mind considerably. She behaved very strangely and talked incoherently, saying she had been charged with theft, etc. Mr. and Mrs. Andrew and others often prayed in her room, that the Lord would have mercy on her, and lead her to repentance. The following morning, when her husband and Mrs. Andrew were with her, she spoke of having committed thefts at different times. The recital of her misdeeds appeared to relieve her mind somewhat. She confessed to having stolen food, clothing, and money from different persons, and at different times, extending over a period of several years. After several hours Mrs. Andrew called again, and.

Mrs. Ts'en a second time enumerated the thefts she had committed. She wished the people whom she had wronged to come, that she might ask their forgiveness. Her husband went to the people and told them what his wife had done, and promised to repay them. His relatives wished him to hush up the matter, but God gave him the grace to do what was right. Mrs. Andrew writes, 'She has been weeping, and praying, and confessing her sin, and in those matters her mind has been quite clear.' At other times she would say, 'Ah, to think of the love of God in giving His Son Jesus to die for me!' She had been exhorting those about her to believe in Jesus; she seems penitent and humble, and Mr. Andrew says: 'She appears to realize to some extent the enormity of her sins against God and man.' She says she could not help but confess. We believe not a few, both at home and in China, who take a prayerful interest in Mr. Ts'en, have been praying also for his wife, and we trust this is but the beginning of the answer."

THE GLORIOUS APPEARING.

By Rev. W. Fuller Gooch, M. A.

Three Distinct Appearings Spoken of—The Third Near at Hand—The Pole Star of Hope—A Personal Appearing—His Glory not yet Revealed—The Veil Lifted on the Mount—The Glorious Kingdom—A Confusion of Terms—A Greater Kingdom than Solomon's—Designed to Comfort—And to Quicken Effort.

AMONG the blessed teachings of grace in reference to the salvation wrought out for us by our Lord, the Apostle Paul, in writing to Titus, places this: "Looking for that blessed hope, the glorious appearing of our great God and Saviour Jesus Christ." (Tit. 2:13.) A consideration of this joyous prospect may serve to quicken our faith and animate our joy.

There are three definite and distinct appearings of our Lord spoken of in Scripture. They are all referred to in the ninth chapter of Hebrews; the first is past, and is set forth in verse 26; then in verse 24 we read, "Christ is not entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true, but into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us." This refers to the present, and points to the position He occupies while absent from earth, hidden from mortal sight within the veil; but in verse 28 we read, "Unto them that look for Him shall He appear the second time without sin unto salvation." It is to this latter, future, and our subject, as set forth by Titus, alludes. Christ is gone into heaven only for a time; so soon as this present dispensation of faith has passed away He will again be revealed to sight, in order that the earth, which as yet has only been the scene of His humiliation and suffering, may be the sphere of His glory and complete triumph over all the works of the devil. Hence we read in Acts 3:20, "He shall send Jesus Christ, who before was preached unto you, whom the heavens must receive until the times of restitution of all things which God hath spoken by the mouth of all the holy prophets since the world began." There is nothing more sure and certain than the fact that Christ shall come again, and be made manifest as the King of kings and Lord of lords. As surely, and as personally, as He came the first time to suffer and to die shall He come the second time "to reign, and to prosper on the earth."

The second advent is as much a part of God's purpose as the first, and is essential to the completeness of that redemption which He came to obtain. No spiritual influence connected with the gospel dispensation, however widespread or blessed it may be, can answer the great ends of His promised appearing in the glory of His kingly power, nor can anything He does in heaven as the Aaronic Priest within the veil, or as seated on His Father's throne on high, answer to, take the place of, or render needless, His Melchisedek priesthood, as the One who is to be "a Priest upon His throne," in the day when "He shall reign in Mount Zion and in Jerusalem, and before His ancients gloriously."

This glorious appearing of Christ is the great object of Christian hope, which cheers and guides the earnest watchers whose place it is during the night of time to watch for the dawn of the coming day. Grace teaches us that here we are only strangers and sojourners, called to be followers of our Lord in His rejection by the world, and to suffer with Him, treading the same path of self-sacrifice and consecration to the Father's will He so constantly and perfectly pursued. He assures all who faithfully do so that, if they suffer with Him, they shall also reign with Him; sharing His cross, they shall share His crown; thus animating their hearts with hope and inspiring them with courage to do battle with every foe, and to resist steadfastly all that impedes their course. It is well for us, therefore, to have a clear knowledge of the hope set before us in the gospel, and to acquaint our minds with Scripture teaching on a subject so closely allied with our present experience and future prospects as "heirs of God, joint-heirs with Christ."

Let us consider this appearing in reference to the glory of Christ, which shall then be revealed. The Revised Version, instead of "the glorious appearing," reads, "the appearing of the glory of our great God and Saviour, Jesus Christ." Hitherto the world has only beheld His humiliation. "He was in the world, and the world was made by Him, and the world knew Him not." Once, for a brief space, and to the favored three, Peter, James, and John, a glimpse was given of His glory; they were allowed to be "eyewitnesses of His majesty, when they were with Him in the holy mount," so that they were enabled to make known with certainty "the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ." But full soon the splendid vision passed away, and gave place to revelations of the sufferings and death their Lord was to undergo at Jerusalem. After His resurrection no eyes saw Him but those of disciples and chosen witnesses. He appeared at intervals to those who knew and loved Him, by many infallible proofs assuring them that He had risen, and then ascended to heaven without making any sign or manifestation of His kingly glory or power. The men of Galilee who watched His ascension were comforted as He vanished from their sight by the promise that, "This same Jesus shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven," and went their way to learn that the glory which He was to have in accordance with the predictions of the Old Testament was to follow (not precede) this present dispensation of faith during which their Lord would be hidden from view, remaining absent from the earth until the time should come for His glory to be revealed.

The Veil was Withdrawn,

Then too shall the glory of His kingdom be revealed.

The Kingdom and the Church have often been confounded, one with the other, as though they were one and the same, but Scripture does not so speak of them. The prophets of the Old Testament continually set before us a far different state of things, under the reign of Christ, to that which obtains in connection with the Church. The era of Solomon is typical of a time far brighter than any that has been known upon earth, or than can be known while "the King of Glory" is absent. Psalm 72, brings before us a King and a kingdom of which Solomon's palmiest days were but a shadow and figure. Israel shall under His sway be no longer scattered and peeled, but regathered, restored to Divine favor, and made a blessing and a praise in all the earth.

In that day He who is now rejected and disowned by the vast majority in every land shall be universally adored, and His "name be set up for an ensign of the people; to it shall the Gentiles seek, and His rest shall be glorious." It is for this we are taught to pray, saying, "Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven." Glory beyond compare shall then be seen upon the Son of Man, the ruler whose coming shall be bright "as the light of the morning when the sun riseth, a morning without clouds, as the tender grass springing out of the earth by clear shining after rain." Then shall all that God has decreed for men in connection with the work of Christ be accomplished, and His solemn oath be performed, "As truly as I live, all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord."

But we must turn from this part of our subject to consider what is the attitude grace teaches us to maintain in reference to this bright appearing of our Lord. It is to be cherished by us as a blessed hope. Hope is one of the three chiefest of the Christian graces, and is as important to the completeness of the Christian character as faith or love. It is and soothe in the midst of sorrow and trial ever incident to mortal life. Its province is to soar beyond things seen and temporal, and to rejoice in the things not seen and eternal. It animates the heart and nerves the soul for conflict and endurance, and by its ever-increasing confidence and assurance, begotten of experience, it enables the believer to sing and triumph even though the clouds be dark and all surroundings adverse. The object of our hope is clearly defined to be one and distinct in its nature, "We are called in one hope of our calling," so that there need be no mistake as to what it is we are to be yearning after and aspiring to. The teaching of our text is uniform with that of the New Testament throughout. The appearing of the Lord, His return in glory and in power to reign as King of kings, and Lord of lords, is the one sure and blessed end and consummation to which we are to look forward. Not death, or its results to the unclothed spirit, not heaven in the technical sense of the word, but Christ Himself; perfect salvation is only attained when He appears.

We are to be looking for this blessed hope. The words are significent and suggestive. They denote eager desire. We do not look for that for which we have but little concern, or on which we set little value. Well may we long for the appearing of our Lord; all that is brightest and best in our calling and destiny as believers depends upon it, is attained when it takes place.

One of the Truest Tests of our regard for the Saviour is found in this, if our hearts are full of faith in Him, and of joy in His service, we shall "love His appearing," the period of His absence will be to us a season of earnest longing for His return; while if we are, on the other hand, taken up with the world, and living to ourselves, we shall have little desire for His coming, being consciously unready to meet Him. Diligent preparation is also involved in looking for His return. What manner of persons ought those to be who expect His speedy approach? The only fitting reply is found in the words of II. Peter, 3: 14, "Wherefore, beloved, seeing ye look for such things, be diligent, that ye may be found of Him in peace, without spot and blameless." This "blessed hope" is intended to exert a holy influence upon our hearts and lives, kindling a flame of sacred devotion, and arousing to zeal and fidelity in every sphere of life. It is impossible to cherish it and be careless, worldly, and half-hearted, for "every man that hath this hope in Him purifieth himself, even as He is pure," May the Holy Spirit so reveal Christ in us, "the hope of glory," that under its blissful inspiration we may indeed "live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world."

CURRENT EVENTS.

Four Large Ships are to be Added to the Navy if the Naval Appropriation Bill prepared by the House Committee is adopted by Congress. The bill makes an appropriation of $6,000,000, of which $4,000,000 are for construction and $2,000,000 for armament. Strong efforts have been made to induce the committee to provide for a lot of small vessels, which could be quickly built and would afford more places for commanding officers, but these efforts have not been successful. The bill authorizes the construction of four ships: two unarmored cruisers, each to have a guaranteed speed of nineteen knots, one unarmored cruiser with a guaranteed speed of twenty knots, and one armored ship of about 7,500 tons, with no guarantee of speed, but planned to make not less than seventeen knots. One of the four must be built in a navy-yard, and all may be built in such yards if the President is satisfied that none of the bids made by contractors is reasonable. The six ships in process of construction are expected to be ready for service before the end of this year. Four of these are double turreted monitors.

International Arbitration was Indorsed by the Senate on Thursday last, by the adoption of a concurrent resolution reported by Mr. Sherman, requesting the President, from time to time, as fit occasions may arise, to invite negotiations with foreign Governments, "to the end" that any disputes that cannot be adjusted by diplomatic agency, may be referred to arbitration, and be peaceably adjusted by such means." Ths resolution, however, was taken up for reconsideration, when Mr. Riddleberger pointed out that probably the first use to which it would be put by the Government would be the settlement of the Fisheries dispute.

The Fisheries Treaty Occupied the Attention of the Senate on two days last week. On Monday, Senator Gray, of Delaware, made an eloquent speech in its defence. He contended that the only ground there could be for objecting to the treaty was based on the theory that the bays of Canada, Nova Scotia, and Newfoundland, which were more than six miles wide, were not territorial waters. That theory the United States could not afford to lay down on account of the valuable fisheries of Behring Sea. Discussing each clause of the treaty, he argued that it gave to American fishermen the right to enter Canadian ports on all occasions to purchase all the supplies ordinarily asked for trading vessels, the only exception being supplies distinctively peculiar to fishing vessels, and asked whether it was not the part of statesmanship to secure impartial privileges by the ratification of the treaty. The treaty secured every right of American fishermen and left the tariff on fish where it ought to be left—as a subject to be dealt with by the legislative branch of the Government. On Wednesday, Senator Hale, of Maine, made a strong speech against ratification. He said that the American fishermen were opposed to the treaty to a man. He also insisted that it was a device on the part of Great Britain to get Canadian fish admitted free. Further consideration was postponed until June 25. As matters now stand, the probabilities are that the treaty will not be ratified.

The Progress Made in the Preparations for cutting the Nicaragua Canal, encourages the hope that this gigantic enterprise will be completed at no distant day. Four of the surveyors who have been at work on the route, returned to New York on June 14. They were last on the western division of the canal, to which they were transferred a few weeks ago, after completing their work on the San Juan River. The entire expedition enjoyed excellent health, and all were happy over the successful results of their work. The hydrographic party completed the off-shore soundings at Brito, and the work in the lake, at the mouth of the Rio Lajos, and went to the San Juan about the middle of May. After a few days' work at Don Carlos, the party were to proceed to Greytown, to finish the survey of the harbor. Of the two large parties to which the four surveyors belonged, there was not one man sick during the three months they were on the ground. This is a remarkable fact, proving conclusively the superiority of the Nicaragua over the Panama route.

The New Governor-General of Canada. Lord Stanley of Preston, took the oath of office at Ottawa, on June 11. The ceremony took place in the Senate chamber, in the presence of a brilliant and distinguished assemblage. In reply to the civic address of welcome, Lord Stanley returned hearty thanks for the kindly welcome that had been accorded him on his first coming to reside among them as Her Majesty's representative. Although only in Canada a few hours, he thought he could already say that he experienced, even before his arrival, that hospitality, kindness, and cordiality which made the name of the Dominion proverbial. In regard to the question of federal union in Australia, no one who had ever been connected with important interests of great colonies could fail to perceive the advantage of that movement when it proceeds spontaneously and when the feeling that dictated it was genuine.

A New Expedition for the Exploration of the Ruins of Babylon and other Old Testament cities is to sail on June 23, from New York. It is under the auspices of the University of Pennsylvania. The expenses of the expedition will be defrayed by Mr. George W. Childs, Messrs. Clark, the bankers, and other prominent citizens of Philadelphia. Professor Peters, Ph. D., Dr. R. F. Harper, of Yale, and Mr. J. D. Prince, of Columbia College, are to be among the explorers. In an interview with a reporter, Dr. Peters said: "The field is full of ruins of the most ancient cities of the world, only one or two of which have ever been explored, and those only in the very least degree. We know the names of fifty or sixty cities which existed there—cities of importance—and the sites of not one dozen of these have been determined. It will give some idea of how little work has been done when the sites of these cities have been left undetermined. The actual site of digging cannot be definitely stated before departure. It depends primarily upon the permission granted by the Turkish authorities, and, secondarily, upon information to be obtained on the spot. The region in which these ancient cities lie is comprised between the rivers Tigris and Euphrates." The expedition is to follow the preliminary work performed by the Wolfe expedition of 1885, the cost of which was defrayed by the late Miss Catherine Wolfe, of New York.

The Melancholy Intelligence of the Death of the Emperor of Germany on Friday last has caused world-wide regret. The cheering reports of his condition, recently published, encouraged the hope that his valuable and useful life would be prolonged, even if his complete recovery was impossible. The wise and liberal principles which have marked his brief reign, and his evident desire to enlarge the constitutional liberties of the people, were so acceptable to th masses in Germany that, apart from the person love and sympathy with which he inspired then they ardently hoped that he might be spare for a few years. Other European nations, too recognizing the immense interests that hun upon his life, and how enormously the dange of war would be increased by his giving place t the fiery young man who is his son and succes sor, were no less anxious than the Germa people for him to live. God in His wisdon however, decided otherwise, and the Emperc bowed in resignation to His will. On Thur day, when he was no longer able to speak h wrote upon a pad: "I have tried my best to d my duty to my God and to my country. I fe that the end is now near. God's will be done. It would appear that the fear expressed by D Mackenzie a month ago, and published in thes columns on May 31, that the corrosive sore i the Emperor's throat might eat inward and pro duce fatal results, was realized. The wall an cartilages between the gullet and the windpip were on June 12, found to be impaired, and pa ticles of food consequently passed into the a passages. The physicians then abandone hope, and informed the family that death wa near at hand. The patient was kept alive b food artificially administered until Friday, whe he succumbed to the dreadful disease, and abou 11 A. M. he peacefully passed away. He was i his fifty-seventh year.

The Austrian Government Proposes to Rais the sum of eight millions dollars for extraord nary military and naval expenditure for the cu rent year, in addition to the ordinary outla There is a curious preamble to the appropri tion bill, in which these expenses are propose It states that, though all the European cabine are united in desiring peace, circumstances, nev ertheless, indicate that an increase in Austri Hungary's defences is the surest safeguard c peace. Remarks of the same tenor were mad by the Emperor Francis Joseph, in receiving th Delegations. He said he was satisfied with th amicable relations existing between Austria an the powers. The great military credits demand ed did not mean that trouble was impendin They were asked because other States had aug mented their forces. He declared that he ea nestly desired peace. Genial and pacificato as these statements were, they did not impre Russia to any great extent, though they wer probably uttered mainly for the benefit of tha country. A prominent Russian journal some what cynically observes, in commenting upo them, that if Austria's intentions were tho oughly pacific, it would rest with her to init ate a settlement of the Bulgarian question.

The Panic in England Produced by the A sertion of eminent military authorities that would be quite practicable for an enemy to in vade the country, gains increased force fro disclosures now being made of official corru tion. The London correspondent of the Ne York Herald, who is a Member of Parliamen states that the public as yet do not know or half of the disgraceful details. The Duke c Cambridge complains that the army is no strong enough, and Lord Charles Beresford wh is in the navy, declares that the navy is ineff cient, but independent Members of Parliamen contend that the hundred and fifty million do lars a year now spent on those two departmen is ample to make them all that they should b if the money were economically spent. Th charge is made that the Queen's relatives hol ing offices in the army and navy absorb larg sums annually without adding to the efficienc of the service, that contracts are not honestl awarded, and that wholesale corruption exist Bayonets of tin, ships imperfectly armore guns that burst, and shells that will not bur are supplied by contractors who, having to pa bribes, try to come out with a profit by furnish ing material of the cheapest and poorest kin Meanwhile Lord Salisbury's government rid cules the agitation, and insists that the pani has been excited for political purposes.

Contributions to the Fund for Supplying Colored ministers in the South with this journal have been received since our last acknowledgement to the amount of $36. They are from: Montreal, Can., $5; Orange, Mass., $1: Bethel, Me., $5; "Adventist," Cambridgeport, Mass., $25. Our friends will be glad to learn that letters are being sent from some of the ministers who have received the paper through their kindness, speaking in terms of warm gratitude of the help they derive from its pages, and saying that God is blessing their labors now more abundantly than even before.

The Mother of the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon Died at Croydon, on May, 23, at the age of seventy-three. An English journal says: "It is impossible to tell how much of the blessing that has rested upon the ministry of her sons is to be attributed to the training they received at their mother's knee. We have heard that, on one occasion, as her husband, the Rev. John Spurgeon, was on his way to fulfil a preaching engagement, it suddenly occurred to him that possibly he was neglecting his own family while going away from home to do the Lord's work. Returning to the house, and seeing no one about, he went up-stairs, and, listening outside the bedroom door, he heard his wife pleading with and for their children. He came down without disturbing her, feeling that he could safely leave his family with such a mother." She was a Congregationalist.

The Great International Missionary Conference in London opened on June 9 and was in session throughout last week. Each day has been devoted to a separate field of foreign missions. When the work in Africa was under consideration, Gen. Fisk, who presided, urged the necessity of opposing the liquor traffic in that country, and of inculcating higher standards of morality in commercial dealings. He said that nothing was so calculated to prejudice the natives and retard the work of the missions as fraudulent commercial transactions. The recent remarkable revival of Islamism was anxiously considered by the Conference on June 11. Mr. Schrieber, of Berlin, said that throughout the Dutch possessions in the East, Moslem schools had been established to oppose Christian missions. Dr. Post, who is one of the American delegates, spoke of the destructive social and political influence of Islamism in perverting individual morality and crushing the life out of the people. He also referred in strong terms to the success of medical mission work in Syria. He said the benefits derived by the people from the medical treatment by the missionaries greatly helped in gaining their attention to the gospel. The Lord Mayor of London has shown civic hospitality to the delegates by entertaining them at a sumptuous luncheon at his official residence.

Six Weeks on a Coral Reef were Spent by a shipwrecked crew and passengers recently. The oceanic steamer Mariposa, which arrived at San Francisco on June 9, rescued a number of shipwrecked people whom she picked up from Palmyria Island, a coral reef, north of Samoa. They belonged to the British bark Henry James, which had been wrecked on April 16, while on a voyage from New South Wales to San Francisco. The Henry James struck on a reef, and the captain, finding the vessel sinking, got his people into the boats. After a perilous voyage of twelve hours they reached Palmyria, where they found some abandoned huts, but no inhabitants. They had but little provision with them, and it was, at first, feared they would starve to death. Among the passengers were several women and children, who were likely to suffer severely from hardship and exposure. Happily, however, an exploration of the island led to the discovery of good water. Cocoanuts, also, were found in abundance, and these, with birds, land crabs, and peppergrass, formed their diet. Six long weeks of weary waiting were passed, and they had begun to despair, when, on May 29, to their great delight, the Mariposa came in sight, took them all on board and carried them safely to Honolulu. Had any of those castaways neglected to go on board the Maraposa, when it came to their rescue, they would have been thought crazy; yet when men, shipwrecked of sin—moral castaways, in imminent danger of perishing, are invited on board the gospel ship and offered eternal salvation, comparatively few accept it. (Heb. 2: 3.)

An Aristocratic Young Shoeblack is Pursuing his occupation in Newark, N. J. A reporter in that town noticed recently a lad of sixteen, who, with two colored boys under his leadership, has set up a shoeblacking establishment in a shanty on one of the Newark streets. The boy's manner and educated talk led the reporter to believe that there was some mystery about him, and, on questioning the boy, he heard a strange story. The lad asserted that he was the son of a well-known political leader, who is at present Lieutenant-Governor of a Western State. The father wanted to send him to college, but the boy, who hated books, and was of a restless, roving disposition, shrank from that arrangement. Finally, being unable to change his father's mind, he ran away from home. He beat his way to Portland, Ore., and from there went to Omaha, where he got a blacking outfit. Since then, he says, he has made a living by blacking boots, and has been in Memphis, New Orleans, Atlanta, and all the larger Southern and Western cities, and in New York, Philadelphia, Brooklyn, and Newark. Several times, he says, some of his father's friends have recognized him, and urged him to go home, but he is not ready to do so yet, because he thinks he has not yet seen enough of the world. The undutiful youngster has had many hardships, but they have not subdued his rebellious spirit. He is like those older wanderers with whom the voice of mercy pleads to return and be reconciled to their Heavenly Father, but who prefer the ways of the world, with its sins and miseries, to the delights of their Father's house. (Jer. 18: 11, 12.)

A Neglected Corpse Lay in the Grand Central depot, New York, nearly the whole of last week. It came from Pittsfield, Mass., in a common stained coffin on Monday night and was placed in the baggage room. No one came to claim it until Thursday, when a man called and said it was the body of his wife, and he was going to send it on to Philadelphia when he had obtained the necessary permit. He removed the address label from the box in which the coffin came, and also took away the trunk that accompanied the corpse. He did not return, however, and at length the Board of Health was notified and the corpse was sent to the Morgue. A clue to its identity was discovered there, and word was sent to Pittsfield. This brought some relatives of the deceased woman to New York, who took charge of the body and sent it on to Philadelphia to be interred in the family lot in the cemetery there. They said that they had furnished the money for embalming and burying the body, and had placed it in charge of the husband, whose neglect was probably due to his dissipated habits. His apparent indifference and negligence must have been painful to the friends, but, happily, his wife, who could she have known of it must have been sorely pained, was beyond reach of that affliction. It may be hoped that she had given her soul into Christ's keeping and if so, that being safe, the disrespect shown to her body would be a matter of no concern to her. (II Tim. 1: 12).

Two Lovers Were Unexpectedly Reunited in a hospital in Quebec recently. A despatch from Chicago to the New York Tribune states that in a suburb of that city a newly married couple have come to live whose history is a romance. The husband is the son of an Episcopal rector in Yorkshire, England, and he for a time was curate of the parish. Adjoining his home a landed proprietor, one Molineux, of French descent, lived. He was a Catholic. The young clergyman fell in love with Mr. Molineux's daughter and proposed for her hand, but the father drove him from the premises. The daughter was sent away where he could not find her. The young curate, heart-broken, gave up his work and came to America, obtaining a situation as book-keeper in a New York wholesale house. He was made travelling salesman. One day, while in Quebec, he was run down by a heavy omnibus, picked up and conveyed to a hospital. During his sickness, as much to his surprise as to his delight, he discovered that one of the Sisters of Charity in the hospital was none other than the girl he had loved in Yorkshire. Miss Molineux's parents had sent her to a convent in France, and from there she was transferred with other French nuns to Quebec. He renewed his suit, and she joyfully consented to marry him. As soon as he recovered, the marriage took place, and they have settled near Chicago. Thus the prize for which the young man longed came to him through misfortune. Had he not been run over by the omnibus he might never have found his bride. The man who has faith in God's providence ought never to count anything that happens to him an evil. God designs every event to be the means of good to His children. (Rom. 8: 28.)

A MESSAGE TO SLAVES.

A New Sermon By Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And Moses spake so unto the children of Israel: but they hearkened not unto Moses for anguish of spirit, and for cruel bondage." Ex. 6: 9.

The Importance of a Monosyllable—The Responsibility of a Messenger—The Message Moses Delivered—I. Salvation from Bondage—Spoke of God—Of the Covenant—Of God's Pity—Of His Coming Deliverance—II. The Message Rejected—Disappointment at First—Discomfort of Rebuilding a House—Poverty and Misery Producing Spiritual Indifference—John Newton's Wonderful Transformation—III. The Rejected Message True—A Notice in a Shop Window.

LITTLE words often contain great meanings. It is often the case with that monosyllable "so." In the present instance we must lay stress upon it and read the text thus, "Moses spake so unto the children of Israel." That is, he said what God told him to say. He did not invent his message. He did not think out the gospel that he had to carry to the people. He was simply a repeater of the divine message. As he received it, so he spake it. "Moses spake so unto the children of Israel." If he had not done so, the responsibility must have rested upon himself, whether the nation was moved by his words or not; but when he was saying only what God would have him say, his responsibility was limited. If he delivered the Lord's own word and it failed to win the heart of Israel, he could not be blamed. Although it was a great sadness of heart to him that the people did not, and even could not, receive the divine message, yet as far as he was concerned, his conscience was clear. It is ever so with the preacher of the gospel: if he declares the word of the Lord as he has received it, whether men will hear or whether they will forbear, he is clear before God, whatever his hearers may do or may not do.

When a man-servant goes to the door with a message from his master, if you do not like what he tells you, do not be angry with him. What has he to do with it? Has he said what his master told him to say? If he has, then be angry with his master if you must be, or accept what his master says if you think fit; but let the poor man that brought the message be held clear if he has faithfully reported his master's words. I claim that if I have preached my Master's gospel, whether men are saved or lost, whether they accept it or reject it, I must leave that with themselves, and not have their sin laid at my door. How heartily do I cry to God that the Word may not be a savour of death unto death, but a savour of life unto life; but oh, my hearers, if you perish after hearing the gospel of God, do not think that you can cast the blame on me.

Now, the message Moses brought was rejected, and he knew

Why it Was Rejected.

He could see the reason. The people were in such bondage, they were so miserably ground down, they were so unhappy and hopeless, that what he spake seemed to them to be as idle words. There are hundreds of reasons why men reject the gospel. We will not go into them now. Oh that men were less cunning in making apologies for refusing the Lord Jesus!

Amongst all the reasons, however, that I ever heard, that with which I have the most sympathy, is this one—that some cannot receive Christ because they are so full of anguish, and are so crushed in spirit, that they cannot find strength enough of mind to entertain a hope that by any possibility salvation can come to them. It is to their sad case that I desire to speak. I think that I can speak to the case, if God help me, for I have felt the same. I do remember when I could not believe even Jesus Himself by reason of sore anguish and straitness of spirit; and, therefore, as one who has worn the chains, I speak to those who are still in chains. I know the clanking of those fetters, and what it is to feel the damp of the stone walls, and to fear that there is no coming out of prison, and to be so despairing that even when the emancipator turned the great key in the lock, and set the door wide open, yet still my heart had made for itself a direr cage, and I could not believe in the possibility of liberty, and therefore I sat bound in a dungeon of my own creation. Ah! there is no Bastille so awful as that which is built by despair, and kept under the custody of a crushed spirit. Many are the desponding ones whose eyes fail so that they cannot look up, or look out. To such I speak.

I. And first, will you notice that what Moses brought to these people was glad tidings. It was a free and full gospel message. To them it was the gospel of the gospel of hope, the gospel of glorious promise. It is a very admirable type and metaphorical description of what the gospel is to us. Moses' word to them was singularly clear, cheering, and comforting; but they could not receive it. "They hearkened not unto Moses for anguish of spirit and cruel bondage."

First, Moses spoke to them about their God. He said, "You have a God, and His name is Jehovah, the God of your fathers, the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob." They looked up from their bricks, and they seemed to say, "God? What have we to do with Him? Oh, that the straw were given us to make our bricks! we are up to our necks in this filthy Nile mud making the bricks, and you come and talk to us about God. Go, and preach to Pharaoh and the taskmasters that rule us; but as for us poor creatures slaves that we are, we do not understand you. What do you mean by JAH, Jehovah, our God? Bring us more garlic and onions, or lessen our daily tasks, or take away the sticks from our drivers, and then we will listen to you." And so they shook their heads, and said that such mysteries and theologies were not for them.

What a poor reason for refusing light because the night is so dark! Man's best hope lies in His God. O you whose lives are bitter with toil and want, there is something for you after all, much better than the hard saying, "What shall we eat, and what shall we drink?" There is an inheritance above of every-day life. There is a portion much better than this killing care, which frets so many of you, and makes life a calamity to you. Do not, therefore, because of the heaviness of your lot, refuse to hear about God, your Maker, your Benefactor. In that direction lies your only real hope. Have this God for a father and a friend, and life will wear another aspect, and you will be another man.

So Moses went on to speak yet more about God's pity to them. He reported that Jehovah had said, "I have also heard the groaning of the children of Israel whom the Egyptians keep in bondage, and I have remembered My covenant." I fancy that those words opened their eyes a little. They looked up and said to one another, "Is there, indeed a God who has heard our groanings? Oh, but," they muttered, "look at the many years we have been groaning. Why, it is forty years since this man Moses first came out and saw our burdens! What is the use of pity that is so Tardy in its Movements?"

And yet, dear sirs, if you are inclined to talk so, it may be that if God be slow He is sure; and if He be slow to you, it is out of patience and long-suffering to others. He knows best when and how to save His people. Remember that when the tale of bricks was doubled then Moses came; and when you are getting to your very worst, and your night is darkening into a sort of hellish midnight, it may be that your darkness is coming to an end.

And then Moses went on further with his blessed gospel message to tell them about the Lord's resolve to rescue them by a great redemption. The Lord had said, "I am Jehovah, and I will bring you out from under the burdens of the Egyptians, and I will rid you out of their bondage." Do you notice that all along the Lord uses strong words, and speaks like a great king? "I am Jehovah. I will. I will. I will." When you go home, just notice what a number of "I wills" there are in this declaration of the great God. When God says, "I will," he means it; depend upon it. God means to save you. Poor, troubled, confessedly guilty sinner, believe in Jesus Christ the Son of God, and trust yourself with Him, and the Lord will save you.

He Will Deliver You

from all the guilt of your past life, the evil habits of your present life, and from the temptations of your future life.

Moses told them about the Lord's ways of grace and the inheritance which He had prepared for them. My message is after the same sort. God will take you, poor guilty ones, to be His children. He will promote you to be His willing servants. He will use you for His glory though now you dishonor His name. He will sanctify you and cleanse you, and He will bring you to heaven, even you who have lien among the pots and have been defiled in the brick-kilns of sin. He will never rest till He makes you sit upon his throne with Him, where He is glorified, world without end. This I speak to you who are in bondage. Believe you in Christ Jesus, and He who has come to save the lost will give you as clear and clean a deliverance from the power of sin as Jehovah gave Israel deliverance from the power of the Egyptian tyrant. He will bring you out of bondage and guide you through the wilderness till you come into the rest, even to a goodlier land than Canaan, though it flowed with milk and honey.

II. We come now to note, that it was caused by anguish of heart. The message was from the Lord, and it was full of hope for them, but they were too much broken down to receive it. We can quite understand what that meant. Let us look into the case. They could not now receive this gospel because they had at first caught at it, and had been disappointed. They were under a misapprehension, for they expected to be free at once, as soon as Moses went to Pharaoh; and as they did not get immediate relief, they fell back into sullen despair. When Moses came to them and said that God had appeared to him at the bush, and had sent him to deliver them, they bowed their heads, and worshipped. Great things they looked for on the morrow, for they were at the end of their patience; but after that when Moses went in unto Pharaoh, and the tyrant doubled their labor by denying them straw, then they could not believe in God or in his messenger. The man who judges with shortness and straitness of judgment, demands a remedy that will cure his soul of all evils on the spot, and if it does not evidently and immediately do this, he cries, "Away with it!"

Grace may truly and effectually come to a heart, and for a while cause no joy, no peace; but the reverse. I have known many a man coming to this Tabernacle, who has been prospering in business, and so on, and yet he has been going down to hell as fast as ever he could travel. Well, he has come and heard the gospel and he has made a great many improvements in his conduct, and has become a regular and attentive hearer; and at that very time he has fallen into an affliction the like of which he had never experienced before; and he has consequently complained, "Why, I am

Worse Instead of Better.

I find my heart grows more rebellious against God than ever it was before." I do not wonder that it should be so, for I have seen so many examples of it. The discipline of the household of God begins very early. But a present increase of sorrow has nothing to do with what the main result will be, except that it works towards it in a mysterious manner. Perhaps what you at first thought was genuine faith, was not faith and God is going to knock down the false before He builds up the true.

If you had an old house, and any friend of yours were to say, "John, I will build you a new house. When shall I begin?" "Oh!" you might say, "begin next week to build the new house." At the end of the week he has pulled half your old house down. "Oh," say you, "this is what you call building me a new house, is it? You are causing me great loss, I wish I had never consented to your proposal." He replies, "You are most unreasonable: how am I to build you a new house on this spot without taking the old one down?" And so it often happens that the grace of God does seem in its first work to make a man even worse than he was before, because it discovers to him sins which he did not know to be there, evils which had been concealed, dangers never dreamed of. Thus the work of grace even makes his bondage seem to be heavier than ever it was; and yet this is all done in wisdom, in love, and in fulfillment of the promise which God has given. The work of deliverance began very grimly, but it ended very gloriously.

The inability of Israel to believe the message of Moses arose also from the fact that by heavy oppression: the mere struggle to exist exhausted all their energy, and destroyed all their hope. The extreme hardness of their lot made them despondent and sullen. I do not wonder that a great many are unable to receive the gospel in this city of ours, because their struggle for existence is awful. I am afraid that it gets more and more intense, though even now it passes all bounds. If any of you can do anything to help the toil-worn workers, I pray you do it. The poor workwoman, who sits so many hours with the candle and needle, and does not earn enough, when she has worked all those hours, to more than just pay the rent and keep body and soul together, do you wonder that she thinks that this gospel of ours cannot be for her, and does not care to listen to it? I know that it would be her comfort, but her soul refuseth to be comforted, she is so crushed. The dock laborer, who comes home five days out of the six having earned nothing, and hears his little children crying for bread—is it any wonder that he cannot hear about heavenly things? It is all very easy to say that it ought not to be so; but it is so; and it is so with multitudes in London. And yet, dear friend—if such a one has come in here to-night—I pray you do not throw away the next world because you have so little of this. This is sheer folly. If I have little here, I would make sure of the more hereafter. If you have such a struggle for existence here, you should seek that higher, nobler, better life, which would give you, even in penury and want, a joy and a comfort to which you are a stranger now. May the Holy Ghost come upon you, and raise you out of this present evil world to newness of life in Christ Jesus!

But worst of all, there are some who seem as if they could not lay hold on Christ because their sense of sin has become so intolerable, and the wretchedness which follows upon conviction has become so fearful, that they have grown almost to be contentedly despairing. I hardly know any condition of mind that is worse than when, at last, that which seemed alarming enough to drive to madness settles down into a listless, sullen moroseness. These Israelites had at last sunk so low that they said, "Let us alone, that we may serve the Egyptians." Oh, it is a dreadful thing when a heart gets to that point when a man desires that Christ would depart from him, and let him alone to perish. Do not some men virtually say, "I know I am lost. Let me enjoy myself as well as I can; I cannot—I will not enjoy sin; but don't vex my conscience. Do not worry me with your talk here, for I shall have enough hereafter. Do not tantalize me without saving faith, for I shall never believe. Do not begin talking to me about repentance. I shall never have a soft and tender heart; I know I never shall." A man who has begun to be benumbed with cold, cries to his comrades, "Leave me to sleep myself to death"; and thus do despairing ones ask to be left in their misery. Dear soul, we cannot, we dare not, desert you.

I will tell you what you shall do; do give me a hearing. In the name of God, believe that there is hope yet—that even now Christ Jesus invites men, and especially such as you, to put their trust in Him. O, you who are burdened with sin, He calls you to let Him be your Saviour. If there is a man in the world He died for, you are the man. If there is one man here that is worse than any other, more sad, more sick, more sorry, more despairing, than another, my Lord Jesus Christ, who is here, has come to meet with such a one. Oh troubled heart, Jesus has come to seek and to save you! Did you never hear on the coast of Africa? He had got himself into such a state by his sins, his drunkenness, his vice, that at last he was left on the coast of Africa, and virtually became a slave. Did John Newton dream, when he wandered up and down with a hungry belly, full of fever, and at death's door, that the day would come when he would be the companion and dear friend of Cowper, and when the church of St. Mary Woolnoth, over there in the city, would be crowded every time he stood up to preach of free grace and dying love? He did not think it, but it was so predestined. Something equally gracious may be ordained for you.

III. I have many more things to say, but I might weary you with them rather than bless you. The message was at first not received by Israel by reason of their anguish, but it was and the Lord made it so. What did the Lord do when He found that these people did not hearken to Moses for anguish of spirit, and for cruel bondage? What did the Lord do? He was not going to give them up because of their wretched condition. He had said, "I will bring them out," and he meant to do it. The first thing the Lord did to prove His persevering grace was to commission Moses again. (Ex. 6:1; 7:2.) So the Lord God, in everlasting mercy, says to His minister, "Again proclaim My grace." It seems a terrible thing to have to pour our souls into deaf ears. Yet I shall not give it up, for I have done it with some here for nearly thirty-three years, and I may as well go on. Why should I lose so much labor? I will try again, like Peter, who, after toiling all night and taking nothing, yet let down the net at the Lord's bidding. One of these days those dead ears will be made to live.

It is a grand point when the Lord lays the conversion of men on the hearts of His ministers, and makes them feel that They Must Win Souls.

Moses was bound to bring out Israel. God has issued His royal decree, and be you sure it will stand. I believe that God is saying to His church, "You have to do it. You have to gather out mine elect out of every nation under heaven." To the church in London He says, "Bring this people out of the bondage of sin." "Oh," says one man, who lives down some street near this place, "Sir, I can hardly live in this street. It teems with ill-living women." You have to save them. Passing a little shop as I did the other day, I saw written up in the window, "If any poor girl that wishes to lead a better life will only step inside she will find a friend. That is one of our dear members. I felt so pleased as I saw it. I should like to see such a notice in a great many windows. I would like to see you live among the wicked, and put up in your windows, "If anybody wants a friend, there is one inside. Come in." You are called to save them! They must not be lost.

Somebody says, "What are you talking about, Mr. Spurgeon? We cannot save them." I am talking as God said, when He told Moses and Aaron that He gave them a charge to bring His people out of Egypt. They could not do it, but yet they did it. Anyone can do what He can do, but it is only God's servant that can do what he cannot do. We, my brethren, are called to perform the impossible; we are to be familiar with miracles. To the eye of reason there is no use in preaching to men dead in sin. I freely admit that; but if it is a commission from God, then it is not ours to raise questions, but to do as we are bidden. Oh that He may give us grace to tell out the gospel, and to keep on doing it till He has brought His own elect out of the bondage of sin and Satan, and saved them with an everlasting salvation! The Lord bless you for His name's sake, Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

THE BASTINADO.*

WHILE in Egypt, Dr. Lansing visited the sugar plantations of Mustapha Pasha. While talking to Markus a Copt, who had bought a number of books, and to whom Dr. Lansing was anxious to sell a Bible, the missionary's attention was attracted by a cry of distress, and on looking out of the window to learn the cause, he beheld for the first time, the judicial administration of the bastinado. A number of the night watch on one of the cane plantations had gone to sleep at their posts, and were being punished therefor. The sentence was carried out in the presence of the judge, in front of the village café. Each man stepped forward in turn, and apparently without reluctance, and, lying down on his face, raised the soles of his feet. Two men sitting on the ground, one on each side of the culprit, firmly grasped his extended hands, and then placed their feet against his sides. Two others, likewise sitting on opposite sides of his knees, held his feet in place by means of a stick about four feet long, with a noose in the middle, which was wound around the ancles, they also steadying themselves by placing their feet against his sides, so that he was held as if in a vice. The torturers were two strong men, who had their flowing sleeves tied up so as to give their arms free play, and the instrument of torture was a koorbash, which is a heavy whip, much like our cowhide, about five feet long and made of hippopotamus skin. Each man struck the foot of the culprit. The whip was raised high in air, and came heavily down with a crash that reminded the missionary of our old-fashioned threshing with flails. The number of strokes was twenty-five. Some, whose hardened feet did not seem to suffer so much, received a few more; others, who squirmed very much and besought the Effendi very piteously for mercy, were let off with less. Most of them did not move, and when they rose, after limping a few steps, put on their shoes, and walked off as if nothing had happened.

An Escape from Darfurians.

During the afternoon, Dr. Lansing, while taking a stroll through the town, met with an adventure which came very near terminating his missionary career. Passing near a large factory, he observed in the yard some strange-looking black fellows, quite different from the tawny or dusty brown Copts and Arabians. On stepping in to look about, he found himself surrounded by twenty or thirty of them, violently gesticulating and vociferating, and evidently bent on mischief. One huge, ferocious fellow was on the point of striking, when the missionary sternly demanded to be let alone. Another then asked him what he wanted, and Dr. Lansing replied, "Nothing; I only walked in to look about me." The fellow at once, with no gentle grasp, laid hold of him, offering to show him about; but the doctor did not relish such friendliness; and on observing some others closing the huge gate, he wrested himself free, and walked out as fast as dignity would permit. On inquiring of a man whom he met, who the black fellows were, he was told that they were savage Darfurians, who had been brought from their native land to be trained as soldiers, and were detained at Esneh to be partially acclimatized. The man added, without knowing anything of Dr. Lansing's adventure, "They kill people when they can get them inside."

A Maronite Martyr.

Asaad El Shidiak, a talented Maronite priest, was employed to reply to the teachings of the missionaries in Syria, and began his preparations for the work by a course of research. While so engaged, the truth dawned upon him, and he became an advocate of the religion he had attacked. This drew upon him persecution, threats of excommunication, and twenty members of his family assembled to carry him by force to the Patriarch, his second elder brother being the leader. Asaad's expostulations and his mother's tears were alike in vain. He was taken to the convent of Alma and afterward to Canobeen. The place where he was destined to wear out the remainder of his days was one of the wildest and least accessible recesses of Lebanon. On his arrival there he was subjected by the order of the Patriarch to the most cruel treatment. With a heavy chain around his neck, the other end of which was attached to the wall, he had to lie on the bare floor. When he died, or how, is not definitely known. When Ibrahim Pasha captured Acre, Mr. Tod, an English merchant, procured from him ten soldiers, and searched the convent, but Asaad could not be found. The Patriarch asserted that he had been dead two years, but though this was doubted, nothing reliable could be learned.

MGR. LEON BOULAND.

(See Portrait.)

THE remarkable letter sent to the Pope by the distinguished ecclesiastic, whose portrait appears on this page, will win for him the respect of all Protestants. Though so highly placed in the Romish Church he has voluntarily severed himself from her communion on conscientious grounds. He wrote: "My decision to withdraw from the Roman Church is not a thought of recent origin. It is the mature result of convictions forced upon me during my travels in both hemispheres, and of my study for ten years of the chief religious and social questions which agitate our time—questions to which the Christian fathers furnish solutions wholly at variance with the Syllabus, and the policy of the Ultramontane Court."

Leon Bouland is about forty years of age. He is a Frenchman, and a graduate, with the highest honors, of the University of Paris. His studies for the priesthood were carried on under the personal direction of Cardinal Lavigerie, Archbishop of Algiers and Primate of Africa. In 1881 Monsignor Bouland received the honorary appointment of Canon of St. Michael the Archangel, Rome; and in 1882, that of President-General of the Society of the "Avocats de St. Pierre" in North America. The same year he was made a member of the "Academie des Arcades" in Rome; Canon of the Metropolitan Church of Rheims; Commander of the Order of the Holy Sepulchre; and Private Chamberlain to Pope Leo XIII. In June, 1886, Monsignor Bouland was also appointed by the Pope General Director of the organization in North America of the Society of St. Peter's Pence. He first visited this country in 1875 for the purpose of writing a history of the French in North America, a work now nearly completed.

While preparing his book for the press Monsignor Bouland has occupied himself with the charge of a French Roman Catholic church at Central Falls, R. I., and with the founding of another French church in Boston.

THE PROMENADE IN CUBA.

(See Illustration.)

THE Queen of the Antilles, as the island of Cuba is called, has an estimated population of about a million and a half, of whom the whites, including the coolies, number about 800,000. It has an area of 43,000 square miles, which is about the size of the State of Virginia. Its climate is one perpetual summer, of which August and September are the hottest months. In the lovely uplands of the south alone are those two months tolerable. In the low-lying districts the yellow fever scourge is then fearfully active, and annually carrries off its large percentage of victims. The illustration on this page represents the promenade in Havana, the capital, which is almost the only amusement at the command of the Cuban ladies. The strange, awkward-looking vehicles appear early in the day, and, as the sun grows hot, they disappear, and the ladies resume their monotonous life within doors. The men do not often join in these promenades. Their time is divided between their offices and the numerous cafés and restaurants, which are declared to be the most sumptuous in the world. Religious life in Cuba is at the lowest ebb. Nominally, it is Roman Catholic, but, especially among the males, practical Atheism is the rule.

FRED HOLDEN'S DEFALCATION.

TWO men were seated in the smoking-room of a hotel, in a large city, one dull, drizzly January afternoon. The one whose name was Frederick Holden was a middle-aged man, dressed somewhat expensively, but in excellent taste. His companion, Alfred Willett, was much more homely in appearance; evidently not a city man, judging by the provincial cut of his clothes and his quieter, more sluggish manner. They smoked for some time in silence, or talking on impersonal matters; but as the last of the other occupants of the room rose and went out, they drew their chairs near together.

"Now, then, Fred," said Willett, "what did you mean in your telegram? What is the urgent matter that you wanted me to decide for you?"

"Well, Alf," said Holden, "I have no real friend besides you, and I want you to advise me in the worst strait a man can be in. I am in a desperate fix, and I do not know which way out of it involves the least risk."

"I am sorry to hear that," said Willett; "as a general principle, however, I do not think it is best to look at a difficulty from that standpoint. When a man is cornered, I believe he ought to ask what is the right course, and not trouble himself about the risk. However, let me hear what the trouble is."

"Well it is money trouble of the worst kind. You remember that five years ago, when I was married, marriage seemed to be the most desirable thing on all hands. Daisy's father was dead, and she had decided to seek a situation as governess. I was earning enough as confidential clerk to support us comfortably, though living alone I was spending the greater part of my salary. If I had possessed about five or six hundred dollars to furnish a home, we might be married immediately. Daisy would be spared the humiliation of earning a livelihood, and I should be better and happier in married life. The advantages were undeniable, but then I did not possess the requisite five hundred dollars, and I fretted considerably over that miserable deficiency. Finally I could bear it no longer, and as I had a large sum belonging to the company always passing through my hands, I concluded to borrow what I needed, and repay it gradually out of my salary. It was easily done, but to repay it was difficult. We had many expenses at first, Daisy's sickness and my own, and then the children came. The first three years the salary did not cover expenses, and the ice being broken, I borrowed more money to make up the deficiency. So it has gone on, until now my shortage is fully two thousand dollars."

Willett raised his hands in horror. "I hoped you were going to say it still stood at five hundred. I would have made an effort to let you have that, but two thousand is hopeless."

"Thank you, old man," said Holden, "I knew I could count on your good will, but I did not expect you could lift me out of this. The worst feature of the affair is that discovery is inevitable. There is a new element in the Board of Directors. Two or three of them are troubled with conscientious scruples about their duty, and there is to be a thorough audit next week; I shall have to show that my balance is correct to a cent. Now what am I to do?"

"Oh, you can have no doubt of that. You should confess the whole case; tell the Directors the circumstances, and offer, if they will forgive you and retain you in office, to work on half pay till the shortage is repaid."

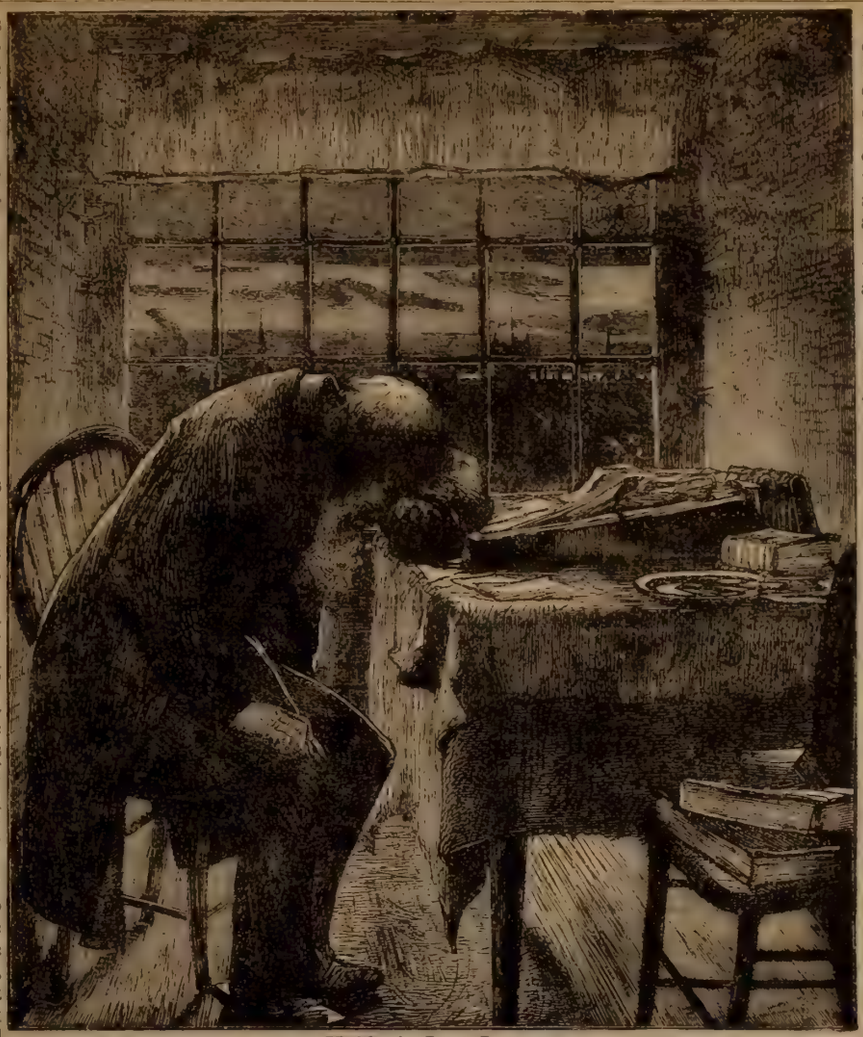
"Ah! there your country training leads you astray. No director would do that. He dare not, in view of what would be said if the thing leaked out. No, I should be dismissed without a character; Daisy would break her heart, and we should all starve. No that would not do. What is generally done, is for the clerk to seize all he can lay his hands upon, and make tracks for Canada, sending for his family afterward."

"I would rather die than do that, Fred," said Willett; "you would never be happy again. Your conscience would torment you continually. No; be persuaded; do the right thing, whatever the consequence may be. Make your peace with God by repentance and entreat His forgiveness through Christ, and He will see you through, somehow. You may have to suffer; sin involves that, but you will be supported."

"Frankly," said Holden, "I have not the courage to confess. I know what the result would be. Is there nothing else you can think of? Do you know any one who would advance the two thousand dollars?"

Willett shook his head. "No, my dear boy," he said, "there is only the one course open to you. Depend upon it, any other will involve you in deeper sin and misery."

Holden was not convinced. The other way was so much smarter and had so often succeeded. He sighed heavily, and the two friend separated never to meet again on earth. Many years afterward Willett heard the end of his friend's tragic story. An unfinished letter in Holden's hand came to him enclosed in one from Mrs. Holden. In his own letter Holden said that the money he took with him to Canada, as he decided, had been lost within a year. That despairing of earning a living there, he had gone to England, only to meet with new disappointment. He was then in utter destitution, living in a wretched garret, earning a scanty subsistence by copying law documents. "I wish," he wrote, "I had taken your advice. I have found it true that the way of transgressors is hard." The letter ended there, and Mrs. Holden wrote that she found him dead in his chair, his head resting on his arm, the pen still in his hand, and the unfinished letter before him on his desk. His last words were those written to his friend.



Holden's Last Letter.

THE EPOCHS OF A LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. L. S. Keyser.

WHEN the third summer vacation was over the two students were back again in their old college haunts shaking hands with the friends who had returned, like themselves, to their academical duties At the close of the first day of the session, George and Hadley sat in their old study, talking in a desultory fashion.

"By the by, George," said Hadley at length, "did you notice that we have a new accession to our class this term?"

Dane gave vent to a sarcastic snort, as he replied, "Oh, yes, I saw him, and I amused myself by fixing the category he belongs to."

"Well, in what sort of a gauge did you succeed in putting him?"

"He is rather a priggish, starchy character, and his mental diamond is not of the first water. Forehead too smooth and narrow. No danger that he will snatch the honors from us. Rather handsome, though, and may be a ladies' man."

"You are quite an analyst. But did you learn anything about him?"

"I played the part of Paul Pry, I acknowledge, and learned that he studied under a private tutor before he came here, and has passed a creditable examination for admission to the Senior Class. And more than that, thanks to my inquisitive proclivites, I have found out that he is designed for the ministry."

"Wh-e-e-w!" whistled Hadley, intensely interested in these facts. "There is some fun in store for us at last. This embyro parson will make a splendid target for our wads of humor. We shall see how much of an expert he is at intellectual fencing. If you have gauged him correctly, we need not be afraid of discomfiture. Of course, we might know that he is not a man of much calibre, or he never would have chosen the ministry as his profession. No one with a sound, healthy brain would throw away his manhood and his prospects in life for a useless and puerile vocation like that."

"Hold, there!" interfered Dane, "let us be fair. Dr. Hartridge, President of the College, is a preacher—a D. D., you know—and I understand that he served a number of congregations very acceptably before he was hoisted to his present position. So is Dr. Battinger, our Professor of Latin, a clergyman, and yet you think him the most brainy man of the Faculty."

"Yes that is so," Hadley admitted. "They are shining examples of able men in the pulpit; but you must remember that they have abandoned the profession now, and you may depend that their present occupation is much more congenial. It is not unlikely that they were glad to find a way of escape from regular preaching that did not necessitate a confession of change of view."

"Still, they were able men, and I should think as young men as they were, to use your reprehensible slang, brainy men and they chose the profession of the ministry, so we must not be too hasty in concluding that the same choice in another young man is a clear proof of semi-imbecility. I base my opinion of the new student on more philosophical grounds."

"Well we shall see how he acts: I think we shall have some fun with him."

The fun commenced not many days afterward. In some colleges it might have begun earlier; but in the Grand Central hazing was not permitted. There are methods, however, of trying a man's power of self-control quite as severe as the rough horse-play of hazing. An insult, a withering sarcasm, a brutal taunt, may goad into fury a man who could bear physical pain with the endurance and unruffled composure of an Indian. Harrison Duneman, the new student, was a man peculiarly susceptible to such treatment. He was a dull man, whose strong animal nature was proof against pain, but whose mental nature was weak and undisciplined. He was morbidly sensitive to slights, as most dull men are, and had none of the nobleness of spirit which can bear to see another's superiority recognized by society. Conscious of mental power, and proud too of acquirements which his sluggish nature had gained only by severe labor, it mortified him when a company which had been bored by his serious remarks was charmed by the light jests of some witty humorist. He could not forgive a man who so eclipsed him, and he hated with vindictive hatred a man who made him the butt of his raillery. Duneman took life seriously, and a good-humored joke to which he could find no repartee stung him like a blow. It was a cruel fate that threw him into rivalry with Madelling and Dane, who, having none of the instincts of good breeding, which keep a true gentleman from wantonly hurting the feelings of another, had no compunction about wounding him wherever he might be vulnerable.

It was in the class-room of the Professor of mathematics that the campaign opened. A difficult problem was submitted, and Duneman, with some show of confidence, undertook its solution on the black-board. He worked rapidly and without hesitation for some minutes, to the surprise of some members of the class who had confessed their inability to solve it. But then his hand wavered; he had lost the thread of calculation, and stood before the board in evident embarrassment. An audible titter went through the class, in which Duneman would have joined if he had been less conceited or more self-possessed.

Madelling was then called upon to essay the solution of the problem. Mathematics had long been his favorite study, and he was perfectly familiar with the problem in hand. He saw where Duneman had gone astray, and with easy celerity the figures were displayed on the board and the correct result underscored with a flourish. Hearty applause broke out on all hands except from Duneman, who stood glaring at the board, the prey of chagrin and mortification. Hadley glanced at him, saw his suffering, and with a spirit of wicked mischief took up the crayon again and wrote at the foot of the black-board: "For the benefit of the unevolved Parson." It was a cruel blow, applied with the dexterity of the Dublin hackney coachman who prided himself on his ability to rouse his beast to a gallop by applying his whip to "a raw." The class, however, thought it witty and burst into loud laughter. Duneman winced, his face flushed, and he turned angrily on his tormentor. But the words would not come, and he gnashed his teeth in impotent rage. Finally he turned to the Professor and said: "Am I to be insulted by a country bumpkin? The sacred calling I have chosen has nothing to do with this matter, and it ought to be protected from coarse, boorish, and sacrilegious indignities."

It was Hadley's turn now to lose temper. The reference to his rusticity brought the blood to his face and showed that he too had "a raw." It was a gratuitous insult, like his own, and the tormentor who had felt no compunction at giving pain, quivered from head to foot when he received punishment in kind. He advanced with clenched hand as if to strike. By a violent effort, he controlled himself sufficiently to allow his partly lifted hand to fall by his side, and then the two angry students stood glaring at each other. At length Hadley hurled out from between his teeth a speech of vulgar abuse, which he afterward thought of with shame. He said: "You show more of the spirit of a wild-cat than of a man! I suppose that you are cultivating yourself for the pursuit of your 'sacred calling,' as you term it. Like most of your set, you have the spirit that built the inquisitorial fires in the Dark Ages. It is a pity that you can't take a joke, but must bristle up like a hyena! A pretty specimen of a pulpit exhorter, you are!"

"Gentlemen, gentlemen," interposed the Professor, with as much seriousness as he could command under the circumstances, "be seated, and do not quarrel over a harmless joke."

The class tittered.

"I do not think it a joke," said Duneman. "The fellow meant to insult me"; but he obeyed the Professor by taking his seat.

The class tittered louder.

"And I am persuaded that he is too much of a torpedo to make a good parson," put in Hadley, sarcastically.

The class broke into a loud guffaw.

"I insist that this interchange of words be stopped at once," broke in the Professor, sternly, and all knew that he meant what he said. "Gentlemen, I regret that this undignified passage has taken place in my recitation-room, and hope that such an offence against decorum will not be repeated. Since it is your first offence, I will not report you to the President, but a repetition of the scene shall be summarily dealt with. The class is excused."

Hadley walked sullenly to his room in company with his friend Dane, who was still laughing over the encounter and was amused as much by his friend's tragic mood.

"What is it that is so ludicrous?" Hadley asked, "I see nothing to laugh at. The fellow is a regular porcupine. Don't you think he disgraced himself?"

"Oh! there was not much difference between you, I think," said Dane; "you called each other names, that was all. You began it, you know, and I thought you were going to hit him. I am glad you stopped in time. It was grand, though, to see you both there on exhibition like a couple of wild beasts. Oh, Oh!" and Dane went off into another explosion of laughter.

"Well you are not very sympathetic," said Hadley. "I should have thought my friend would have resented such an insult to me. A country bumpkin indeed!"

"Oh! there is no need for me to take up the cudgels; you showed yourself fully a match for our clerical friend. You forgot, I suppose, when you began throwing stones that you live in a glass-house. Well, well get the panes replaced and think no more about it."

Repairs, however, were not easily made on either side. The dislike engendered between the two students increased rather than diminished. Duneman, too, having discovered that Madelling held sceptical opinions, came to regard the quarrel as in a sense a religious dispute and to regard himself as a martyr suffering for conscience sake. He spoke of Madelling as "the infidel student," and it was not difficult in a community of the kind in which they lived to arouse a prejudice against him on that ground. He began to meditate on plans for humiliating him, and with Jesuitical spirit to think that it did not much matter whether the means employed were quite honorable, so desirable did it seem that the enemy of religion should be put to shame. So on each side the enmity between them grew and intensified.

In the mean time other events of importance were occurring. It was thought advisable by the college authorities to give the undergraduates an opportunity for frequent practice in public speaking. Besides many special days and anniversaries, when speaking was in order, every third Saturaday forenoon was devoted to the reading of essays and the delivery of orations by the young men and women of the college. The exercises were held in what was called "Chapel Hall," which, although a large, commodious room, was almost invariably filled to overflowing by an interested audience. In this way the young aspirants for literary or oratorical distinction had excellent opportunities for the exercise and display of their budding talents, and it must be confessed that many of the productions delivered there were above a mediocre quality. There was the embryonic promise of the future essayist, poet, lawyer, or legislator.

On the first Saturday morning devoted to these exercises after the beginning of the new session, there was a general rush for Chapel Hall. Our two friends, Hadley and George, sat together as usual, on one of the seats occupied by the Senior class. The hum of conversation was heard through the hall before the exercises began. Suddenly Hadley's attention was arrested by the entrance of a young lady, through the doorway at the side of the room, whose appearance impressed him.

"Do you see that young lady?" he whispered to Dane. "The one just entering the door."

The young men watched her, as she stepped up the aisle along the wall, and then turning, found a seat near them, a little in front and to their right. Courtesy would not allow them more than a brief occasional glance at her, but those furtive glances were sufficient to convince them that she was a fascinating girl, with dark-blue eyes, and pearly, slightly pale cheeks. Yet there was an element of hauteur and imperiousness in her bearing, and a kind of reckless abandon characterized the toss of her head, as if she cared very little for the good or bad opinion of others, and as if her thinking was carried on with entire independence.

"Mr. Analyst," said Hadley, touching his friend's arm, "there is another specimen upon whom to exercise your critical faculty. What is your opinion of that young lady, eh?"

Dane scrutinized her closely for a few minutes before he answered.

"She is certainly very beautiful," he said, "and appears to be intellectual. No doubt she is a cultivated girl, and there is something charming about her apparently easy and careless carriage. She is a girl, too, who will not swallow every kind of teaching she hears. You can read her independence in her physiognomy, and in every movement of her graceful head. Yet I cannot say that my admiration of her is unqualified. I am afraid that she is too haughty and too indifferent to public opinion, and probably a little 'strong-minded' for a woman. She reminds me of a certain forward female I once met, who was an arrant scoffer at religion, and I could not help but feel that such raillery came with an ill grace from her lips. It seemed so out of harmony with that modest femininity which is the peculiar heritage of woman. I wouldn't be surprised to learn that this girl entertains some opinions not in accord with reigning ideas, and that she has the courage to assert them. Nevertheless, I confess that I admire her blonde beauty."

"Well, you have characterized her very happily," returned Hadley. "You have put in apt phrases what I had indefinitely in my mind. It remains to be seen whether your analysis is correct."

During the progress of the exercises, Hadley divided his attention about equally between them and the young lady who had arrested his attention. While some well-digested and thoughtful production was being delivered, he noticed that she was an attentive and appreciative listener; but when the performance was crude and puerile, she could not conceal her impatience. A frown of displeasure would contract her brow and her eyes would wander restlessly over the audience.

"She has no patience with immature thought," reflected Hadley. "Evidently she is a thinker herself. At any rate, she has got ten beyond the crude state. The question is, where does she belong? I shall start out on a voyage of discovery as soon as the exercises are over."

No sooner was the last speech delivered and the audience dismissed, than Hadley proceeded to put his resolve into execution; but his inquiries only proved that his fellow-students were as ignorant of the girl's name and whereabouts as he was himself. It appeared that she was a stranger. Not many of the young men of the class had observed her in the crowd, and none of them could give him a clue. But Hadley was a resolute young man, and he was not to be thwarted easily.

"Tell you what, Dane," he said, taking his friend's arm, "I have a plan by which we may ferret out her hiding-place. Come along, let us follow her—accidentally, of course—until we find out where she lives."

In the crowd passing down the stairs to the ground floor they had some difficulty in keeping the girl in the range of their vision, but by dint of considerable effort they got closer to her, and then, assuming a careless manner which one of them at least did not feel, they sauntered along in the crowd a few paces in the rear. As the people dispersed to the right and left, the young men had to be more careful lest their surreptitious pursuit should be discovered. The young lady, accompanied by a friend, continued her walk along Main Street through the heart of the town, and by the time she had reached the suburbs beyond, there were very few persons besides herself upon the sidewalk. Presently she turned aside, opened the gate in front of an elegant residence, surrounded by tall poplars and maples, and waving her friend adieu, she stepped lightly up the stone walk and entered the house with that familiar freedom which says, "This is my home."

GOD'S COVENANT WITH ISRAEL.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for July 1, Exodus 24: 1-12. Golden Text, Heb 8: 10

Moses Called Up to the Mount—The Old and the New Dispensations—The Vow of the People—The Signification of the Offering—Something Lacking—Power Given Through Christ—Moses Supernaturally Sustained—The Indispensable Element of Worship—The Plan of the Tabernacle Imparted—Its Types—The Emblematic Stones—The Anointing of the Priests.

THE children of Israel were still in the Wilderness of Sinai. The law had been spoken to them from the mountain by the voice of God, with attendant circumstances which were calculated to inspire awe and terror, so that they had said to Moses, "Speak thou with us, and we will hear; but let not God speak with us lest we die." (Ex. 20: 19.) "And Moses drew near unto the thick darkness where God was." It was darkness to the people, but it was light to Moses. It was there that the directions and promises of the next three chapters were given. And then God said to Moses: "Come up unto the Lord, thou, and Aaron, Nadab, and Abihu, and seventy of the elders of Israel; and worship ye and Moses alone shall come near the Lord; but they shall not come nigh; neither shall the people go up with him." Oh, how different from the invitations of the New Testament! "Come unto Me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." (Matt. 11: 28). Having therefore boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus . . . let us draw near." (Heb. 10: 19-22.) The law says, "Stand off;" the Gospel, "Draw nigh."

Moses came and told the people all the words of the Lord, and all the judgments: and all the people answered with one voice and said, "All the words which the Lord hath said, will we do." It was the second time they had made this declaration (see Ex. 19: 8), but how little did they realize that they had not in themselves power to do all that they now engaged to do! "And Moses wrote all the words of the Lord." Whether he wrote upon a rock, as was often the case at that period, or whether, as in Deuteronomy 27: 23. upon stones, plastered with plaster, which would harden when the writing was finished, we know not. As the writing seems to have formed a portable book, perhaps it was on a wax tablet, or on the papyrus leaf, which was much used in Egypt later. After writing God's messages, Moses built an altar, with twelve pillars, that all the tribes of Israel might be represented there. And then he sent young men, which offered burnt offerings, and peace offerings, as a seal of the people's pledge of obedience. The burnt offering signified the offering of themselves to God, and the peace offering, their vows and thanksgiving to God." (Lev. 7: 12-17.) "And Moses took half of the blood, and put it in basins; and half of the blood he sprinkled on the altar. And he took the book of the covenant, and read in the audience of the people: and they said (for the third time), All that the Lord hath said, will we do, and be obedient." But there was Something Still Lacking:

Man may have the best intentions, but without the precious blood of Christ he cannot carry them out. "The blood of Jesus Christ, His Son, cleanseth us from all sin"; the unclean might not enter into the tabernacle. We "were not redeemed by corruptible things, such as silver and gold . . . but with the precious blood of Christ." (1 Pet. 1: 18.) Moses took the blood and sprinkled it on the people, and said, "Behold the blood of the covenant which the Lord hath made with you concerning all these words." It was but a type—man's imperfect offering to God. But He saw through it His beloved Son, "an high priest of good things to come," who "neither by the blood of goats and calves, but by His own blood . . . entered in once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us." (Heb. 9: 12.) Jesus pleads for us that He has been slain as the one great Offering, and on this ground He makes it possible for man to enter into covenant with God. How many have said, not three times, but fifty times, a hundred times, "All that the Lord saith unto me, I will do, I will walk so as to please God, I will not turn aside," and yet, again and again, there have been failures. "But what the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh," God did. How? He sent "His own Son in the likeness of sinful flesh and for sin." He sent Him to shed His blood, and so "condemned sin in the flesh, that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit." (Rom. 8: 3, 4.) The law says, "You ought to walk so as to please God." The precious blood says, "You can walk so as to please God; your sins are atoned for, they condemn you no more. The life is in the blood, life for you to enable you to do the will of God." "I will put My laws into their mind, and write them in their hearts." (Heb. 8: 10.) Praise God, it is not only our duty, but a blessed possibility, to do the will of God. "Almost all things are by the law purged with blood, and without shedding of blood is no remission." (Heb. 9: 22.) Life purges death. The law is the "ministration of death, written and engraven in stones (II Cor. 3: 7); the precious blood is the very life of Christ, not only poured out, but imparted to us as our life.

Having thus mediated God's covenant with the people, Moses went up into the mountain with Aaron, Nadab, Abihu, Joshua, and seventy elders of Israel, "and they saw the God of Israel." It was "devouring fire" to all who were below, but on the mountain all was glory and the effulgence of light. After eating and drinking together in the mountain, Moses and Joshua arose, and "Moses went up into the mount" that he might be permitted to enter into the thoughts of God, and into His plans and purposes as never before. Moses was content, at the call of God, to leave the people, much as his presence seemed necessary; God was responsible. Forty days and forty nights, without eating, drinking, and probably without sleeping, too, Moses was in the mount with God; but he was breathing in an atmosphere of life itself from his close contact with God; and no doubt He who breathed into Adam's nostrils the breath of life, had some means of sustaining Moses supernaturally.

God was about to teach Moses His will about worship. The first element of worship (now that the people had been sprinkled with the blood) was the spirit of sacrifice. "Speak unto the children of Israel that they bring Me an offering; of every man that giveth it willingly with his heart shall ye take my offering." There is no real worship without Giving to the Lord.

The right order is, They "first gave their own selves to the Lord," (II Cor. 8: 5), and then, according to our value for Jesus, will be our further giving to Him. Some count themselves worthy of a richly furnished house, horses, carriages, and servants, and Christ worth about as much as the wages of their kitchen maid. The first disciples were in a hurry to get rid of all that belonged to them, "Neither said any of them that aught of the things which he possessed was his own, but they had all things common." (Acts 4: 32.) They counted Jesus worthy of their all. Then God gave Moses the pattern of an ark of testimony which was to contain the law within, and the manifest presence of God without. "And then I will meet with thee, and I will commune with thee from above the mercy seat, from between the two cherubims which are upon the ark of the testimony, of all things which I will give thee in commandment unto the children of Israel." Then God commanded Moses to make a table on which the shew-bread should be placed before Him always; and a candlestick of pure gold with seven branches. All this was to speak of Christ. He is the ark, God's meeting-place with man; He is "the Bread of Life" typified by the shew-bread; He is "the Light of the world," God's golden candlestick. Then the tabernacle was to be made of many parts, pillars, boards, curtains, tables, loops and sockets to make "one tabernacle" (Ex. 26: 6.) It was to be thus a beautiful picture of the Church of Christ, "For as the body is one and hath many members, and all the members of that one body, being many, are one body, so also is Christ." "For by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body. . . For the body is not one member, but many." (1 Cor. 12: 13-14.)

He next commanded him to make holy garments for Aaron, "for glory and for beauty" (Ex. 28: 2), and above the holy garments Aaron was to wear two onyx stones upon his shoulders with the names of the children of Israel graven upon them, "And Aaron shall bear their names before the Lord upon his two shoulders for a memorial" (Ex. 28: 12). His strength was to bear their weakness! Oh! What a type of our beloved Lord who bears our unworthy names upon His Almighty shoulder. "The government shall be upon His shoulder (Isa. 9: 6.) And then Moses was to make a breast-plate with the names of the children of Israel also engraven upon it. "And Aaron shall bear the names of the children of Israel when he goeth in unto the holy place, for a memorial before the Lord continually." (Ver. 29.) But he was not only to bear the judgment of the children of Israel upon his heart, but also Aaron must have a plate of pure gold upon his forehead with the inscription "Holiness unto the Lord," "that Aaron may bear the iniquity of the holy things . . . that they may be accepted before the Lord." (Ver. 38.) Oh how wondrous! The sin which we have committed so lightly, lies heavy on the heart of our great High Priest. Then God commanded Moses to clothe Aaron and his sons with the holy garments and consecrate them. But before they could be anointed, their right ear, right hand, and right foot must be marked with blood, in token that they were a blood-bought and ransomed priesthood. (Ex. 29: 20.) Are not we too priests unto God? Then they might be anointed with the holy oil made for no other purpose, and none like it must be made, on pain of death. "Upon man's flesh shall it not be poured," but only on the holy garments. (Ex. 30: 30-33.) There must be no imitation of the Holy Ghost, God's true anointing; and the Spirit cannot rest upon the flesh; God's Spirit comes on Christ in us, and not upon our self-life. And God commanded also that when a census of the children of Israel was taken, every man should give "a ransom for his soul unto the Lord," an acknowledgement that his life was forfeited. yet redeemed. And He also ordained that a continual burnt offering should be offered, a morning and an evening sacrifice, "at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation before the Lord; when I will meet you, to speak there unto thee. And then I will meet with the children of Israel, and the tabernacle shall be sanctified by My glory . . . And I will dwell among the children of Israel, and will be their God. And they shall know that I am the Lord their God, that brought them forth out of the land of Egypt, that I may dwell among them: I am the Lord their God." This was the purpose of all—that God might dwell among them. The purpose of His dealings with us is that He may dwell in us.

NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION—1888.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled, "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting 75 cents. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a résumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have on entering the study of that portion of the Word of God.

" NEVER MIND."

What's the use of always fretting,
At the trials we shall find
Ever strewn along our pathway?
Travel on, and "Never Mind."

Travel onward, working, hoping;
Cast no lingering glance behind,
At the trials once encountered
Look ahead and "Never Mind,"

What is past, is past forever.
Let all fretting be resigned.
It will never help the matter,
Do your best and "Never Mind."

And if those who might befriend you,
Whom the ties of nature bind,
Should refuse to do their duty,
Look to heaven, and "Never Mind."

Friendly words are often spoken,
When the feelings are unkind,
Take them for their real value,
Pass them by, and "Never Mind."

Fate may threaten, clouds may lower,
Enemies may be combined,
If your trust in God is steadfast,
He will help you, "Never Mind."

For Nervous Exhaustion
Use Horsford's Acid Phosphate.

Dr. H. C. McCOY, Algona, Ia., says: "I have used it in cases of dyspepsia, nervous exhaustion and wakefulness, with pleasant results. Also think it of great service in depressed condition of the system resulting from biliary derangement."

In every community there are a number of men whose time is not occupied, such as teachers, ministers, farmers' sons and others. To these classes especially we would say, if you wish to make several hundred dollars during the next few months, write at once to B. F. Christian Work in Mexico.

Through the reading of the Holy Scriptures translated into Spanish some earnest souls in Mexico have, by God's blessing, been led to a clear knowledge of the Gospel. From their numbers able preachers of the Christian faith in its primitive purity have been raised up, around whom congregations have been gathered from among the humble poor, who have been the first to publicly welcome and defend the pure Gospel in Mexico. The members of these congregations, rich in faith, have worked earnestly and bravely for Christ and his truth among their fellow countrymen in that beautiful Southern portion of North America called Mexico. Schools have been established by them, in which large numbers of bright boys and girls have received a good secular education and been carefully taught the Christian faith. From the children thus educated faithful Christian workers have been raised up. A Mexican Church of Christ, that maintains the faith in its purity and integrity, has been organized among these native Christians in the Republic of Mexico. The members of this Mexican Church of Christ, though gathered mostly from among the poor, are yet doing a most important Christian work in Mexico. To continue that work, we need to pay a few leading workers small monthly salaries, and also to defray some current expenses. To raise the needed funds we have formed a society with an office at 43 Bible House, New York, U. S., and should be pleased to have many of our fellow Christians join this society by becoming regular contributors to its treasury. We are trying to secure monthly or quarterly contributions to meet the regular monthly expenses of the work. In order to continue and extend the work, we wish to raise four hundred dollars a month, by endeavoring to have four hundred persons each give on the average one dollar every month to this object, leaving the donors to give less or more as they may be able and willing.

We earnestly invite all who will, to join us in this systematic effort in behalf of the cause of Christ in Mexico, by becoming monthly subscribers to this fund. We have already regular subscribers whose gifts amount monthly to over eighty dollars, and a growing circle of friends who are forwarding us occasional donations.

This Mexican Church of Christ is a very effective instrumentality through which to do Christian work among the 50,000,000 who speak the Spanish language, few of whom have ever had a Bible in their hands. A beautiful church building has been secured in the City of Mexico as the centre of the activities of this Mexican Church of Christ. Through the workers connected with that centre more than forty congregations have been gathered from among the poor. We have some faithful and able preachers now in the field, but more young men need to be trained for the ministry. Multitudes of Protestant children in Mexico, some of them orphans, need to be educated. We make three requests of you, Christian reader: first, that you will become a monthly or quarterly subscriber in behalf of this Christian work; second, that you will try and induce your friends to do the same; third, that you will remember this precious work in Mexico in your prayers.

I most sincerely thank all who are already generously contributing to this Christian work for their timely and generous gifts, and I earnestly invite many others, to unite with us in aiding this important Christian work by also becoming monthly subscribers in its behalf. Those who may not feel that they can give as much as a dollar a month are earnestly asked to give what they can, whenever they are able—EVERY LITTLE HELPS. If you will generously consent to contribute a dollar a month or more or less to the work, will you kindly inform me of the fact? Contributions either large or small can be mailed directly to my address as follows:

THE death of the Emperor of Germany on Friday, June 15, should remind us that we walk by faith, not by sight. Were it not so, such an event would be altogether grievous and lamentable. Happily the Christian is assured that in public affairs, as in the events of his own life, God is ordering everything according to His own wise purposes. The world is not controlled by chance, nor by the caprices of a malevolent fate. At times we are confronted by events which we cannot understand; success and failure are not distributed according to our ideas of merit, and the ills that flesh is heir to fall more heavily upon one whose life appears to us the most blameless, while the evil-doer escapes them. So is it with the end of life. A man whose career promises to be a blessing to the world is cut off before his beneficent projects are realized, while others live on, working mischief and causing misery, into old age. We feel as the disciples did on the road to Emmaus, as they talked together, and were sad, and are inclined to say with them, "We trusted that it had been He which should have redeemed Israel." At such times even prayer seems to be of no avail, and our spirits are depressed by the taunts of the enemy, who uses their apparent failure as a reproach. As a nation we have had to bear those taunts,

As When Lincoln Died, and again when Garfield was taken away. It is so now in Germany when the enlightened Prince, from whose wisdom and justice so much of good was expected, is removed at the commencement of his reign, and his place occupied by one whose character and principles are antagonistic to national liberty and progress. Disappointment is natural, but its voice is hushed by the thought that some wise purpose surely underlies the mysterious event and will become manifest when all mysteries are explained. In this special case it may be that the sagacious, peace-loving ruler has been called to give place to the headstrong, ambitious youth who succeeds him, in order that in upon the world Germany may play the part marked out for her by divine wisdom, and the impending calamities may be brought down by an appropriate instrument. "Thou shalt be gathered to thy grave in peace," said the Lord to the good King Josiah, "because thine heart was tender, and thou didst humble thyself before God, and thine eyes shall not see all the evil that I will bring upon this place." (II Chron. 24: 27, 28.) God in His providence works by natural means: the curse causeless does not come; it may therefore be that in the final crisis is this world's history on which we are about to enter—a period of wars and tumults—there is work appointed for Emperor William II. to do, which he will do from the promptings of his own ambition, unconscious that he is fulfilling the purposes of the King of kings. Thus it will be seen that it was in mercy that Emperor Frederick was gathered to his fathers and Emperor William reigns in his stead.

Frederick's Childhood was passed in a time of general European unrest. He was born at Potsdam on October 18, 1831. His grandfather, Frederick William III., the grand-nephew of Frederick the Great, was then King of Prussia. The country was menaced by Austria from without, and by the discontented people within. England was passing through the throes of a great political convulsion. France had just driven out her weak king, and filled his place by one still weaker. Russia was crushing out, with cruel, ruthless hand, the last embers of the Polish revolt. Spain and Portugal were in anarchy, and Turkey was sullenly bowing before the inexorable logic of the events of 1827–29. Two lives—those of his uncle and father, lay between the child and the throne, and those two lives covered a momentous but glorious period of national history. Of the Prince's boyhood not much is related. His mother, who was a pupil of Goethe, devoted herself, unremittingly, to his training, and she was aided by Ernst Curtius, the historian of Greece.

In 1840 Frederick William III. died, and was succeeded by his eldest son, Frederick William IV., the uncle of the late Emperor. His reign was chiefly remarkable for the civil commotions which, in common with all Europe, agitated Prussia. The part which Prince William, the father of the late Emperor, took in suppressing the rising in Berlin rendered him obnoxious to the people, and it was deemed advisable that he and his family should leave Prussia for a time. They went to England, and then it was that the young prince Frederick, then a youth of seventeen, who quitted the university to accompany his father, first saw the little girl who afterwards became his wife. It was the hope of both families that these two might be united, and ten years later that hope was realized. The story of opens in so simple and natural a manner that, though it has often been told, it deserves reproduction here. In September, 1855, when all England was rejoicing over the capture of Sebastopol, Frederick paid a visit to the Queen at Balmoral. He went thither with the consent of his parents and of his uncle, the King, Frederick William IV., to ask for the hand of Princess Victoria, a young maiden of fifteen years.

Writing in her journal, on Sentember 29th, the Queen says: "Our dear Victoria was this day engaged to Prince Frederick William of Prussia. . . . He had already spoken to us, on the 20th; but we were uncertain, on account of her extreme youth, whether he should speak to her himself, or wait till he came back again. However, we felt it was better that he should do so, and during our ride up Craig-na-Ban, this afternoon, he picked a piece of white heather (the emblem of good luck), which he gave to her, and this enabled him to make an allusion to his hopes and wishes as they rode down Glen Girnock, which led to this happy conclusion." A pretty story, simply told. Writing on Oct. 2, the Prince Consort says that Prince Fritz left Balmoral on the previous day, and speaks in ardent praise of the childlike simplicity and candor of his daughter. "The young people are ardently in love with one another," he adds, "and the purity, innocence, and unselfishness of the young man have been, on his part, equally touching." It was this engagement in 1855 which was fulfilled on January 25, 1858, when the gallant soldier-prince was married to the Princess on whom his heart was set.

The bride and bridegroom were heartily welcomed in Berlin, and in August of the same year Queen Victoria and the Prince Consort visited them in their new home. A great change was impending over Prussia. The then King was stricken with a painful malady, and after the royal travellers from England had returned to her shores, Prince William was formally declared Prince Regent. He had acted in that capacity since the autumn of 1857; but in October, 1858, he was appointed Regent with full powers, his brother's dementia being declared incurable. Three years later, January 2, 1861, the afflicted monarch died, the Prince Regent became King, and our hero

Crown Prince.

The King, under the guidance of Bismarck, at once set himself to the thorough reorganization of the army, which in spite of the resistance of his people he enormously increased. He insisted on the old feudal prerogatives of royalty and though he was faithful to the letter of the Constitution, he took advantage of all his resources to render it powerless and to defeat the checks it imposed upon him. That slowly but surely brought on a constitutional crisis During the long persistent struggle with the majority in the Lower House, which had taken England for a model, Herr Von Bismarck fought the King's battle with a force and dexterity totally unexpected, and the temper of the combatants rose to such a pitch that quarrels and duels were frequent. Prince Frederick William was imbued with English opinions; his wife's influence, which was paramount with him to the end of his life, having already operated upon him. In 1863 the strife had reached a critical stage, the policy of the Government became harsh, and the Crown Prince was so moved that he addressed words of strong remonstrance to his father. He did so in a memorable letter, in which he respectfully but earnestly besought the King to yield to the wishes of his people and warned him that the fate of the dynasty would be imperilled by his despotic policy. He even offered to resign his command in the army and the offices he held about the court, if his father desired.

The Outbreak of War,

however, put an end to this controversy, and also showed that the King's persistence in strengthening the army was justified by resuks. The Crown Prince was disgusted with the unequal struggle between Prussia and Austria combined, and the little Kingdom of Denmark, but his duty as the first subject of the realm was clear, and he went through the one short campaign, which sufficed to end the struggle, on the staff of Marshal Wrangel. The conflict with Austria, in which this Danish war culminated in 1866, appealed much more forcibly to the Crown Prince's patriotism, and it also established his reputatiou as an able general. Scarcely had the declaration of war been heard when he was marching through the mountains of the Silesia frontier with 125,000 men at his back. Once over the mountains into Bohemia the Crown Prince's successive blows—Trautenau, Nachod, Skalitz—fell upon the bewildered Austrians like thunder from a clear sky, while Prince Frederick Charles fought his way toward the same point from the other side, sweeping away all obstacles with a rapidity which gave to this strange campaign its now historical name of the Seven Days' War. But before the two invading hosts could unite, the Austrian commander-in-chief fell upon Frederick Charles with a superior force, hoping to overwhelm him before the Crown Prince could come up. The scene was the field of Sadowa, and at first it seemed lost to the Prussians, for the pressure of the Austrian masses was tremendous, and all the valor of the Northern army could barely hold its own against such odds. Suddenly the smoke rolled aside for a moment from the hard-fought field; and the Crown Prince, who had made a circuit to take the Austrians in the rear, was seen approaching. His arrival decided the day and won him the applause of all Europe. At the close of the day the Crown Prince joined his father on the meadows of Problus, where the delighted veteran took off his breast the Order of Merit and gave it to his son. The King has recorded the affecting incident: "At last I came upon Fritz, with his staff. What a moment, after all we had gone through, and upon the evening of such a day! I gave him the Ordre pour le Merite with my own hands, so that the tears ran down his cheeks."

The Franco-Prussian War,

four years later, rendered the Crown Prince still more illustrious. The victories of Weissenburg and Wörth, the investment of Strasburg, the passage of the Vosges, followed each other like claps of thunder, and he was pursuing his victorious advance when he learned that his late opponent, McMahon, was marching towards Metz to join Bazaine against Prince Frederick Charles. It was the situation of Sadowa over again, and once more the Crown Prince turned the scale. Although McMahon had nearly four days' start, the indefatigable German leader overtook him at Sedan, where a second Waterloo placed at the mercy of the conquerors 80,- 000 French soldiers, 4,000 officers, 400 guns, and the Emperor himself. After this he took part in the investment of Paris, and held his position until the capitulation was signed. During both these wars the Prince was the idol of his troops. It was not only his skill and valor that won their love, but his own regard for their comfort.

A Characteristic Incident

related by a press correspondent illustrates this interest. He wrote: "I have been the accidental and unseen witness of a little scene just now which is worth recording. A country cart was rumbling down the street with two wounded officers—young men—on their way to the station. An officer on foot beckoned to the driver to stop, and went up to the cart, the occupants of which tried to salute him, but he made a gesture, and leaning over, entered into conversation with them for ten minutes, evidently asking after their wounds. On parting, he shook each by the hand and continued his way up the street, accompanied by two other officers. He halted at my quarters and inquired if there were any wounded inside—they had been removed, some to their last resting-place—then went on, and, meeting a cart full of wounded soldiers, talked to them each in turn, and so went on, visiting the hospitals and the wounded in the most unostentatious manner. It was the Crown Prince. No wonder his men are fond of him."

The Years of Peace

which succeeded the war of 1870 were occupied by Frederick in the work allotted to capable men in his station; and he frequently represented the King in visits and ceremonials. Before that period, he was at the opening of the Suez Canal, and visited Palestine. After it, he went to Vienna, in 1873, to be present at the opening of the Exhibition; and subsequently travelled in Sweden, Norway, and Denmark. He paid a visit to Victor Emmanuel at Naples in 1875, and attended the funeral of that King in Rome in 1878. He presided over the Commission organized when the assassins Nobiling and Hödel endeavored to slay the Emperor William; and in 1881 it was his sad duty to witness the funeral of Alexander II., at St. Petersburg. On many other occasions he took part in public business, and was always ready to foster education, literature, and art. The excavations at Olympia, which yielded such fruit, owed much to him; and he did not forget his student days at Bonn. He was Rector of that University, and he presided over one of its great student celebrations. In addition to his scholastic rank at Bonn, the degree of Doctor was conferred on him by the Universities of Königsberg and Oxford. Moreover, he wrote one or two books; one on his Eastern tour, and another on the war of 1866.

His Fatal Malady

first appeared in January of last year. It was then thought to be only an inflammatory affection of the throat, with a cough and hoarseness. The affection, however, not yielding to treatment, Dr. Mackenzie, the famous specialist in throat diseases, was consulted, and in May he removed a foreign growth from the Prince's throat. The operation caused general uneasiness in Europe, which was not allayed by the report of Professor Virchow that cancer cells were not found in the part removed. Subsequent operations were performed, until at length the disease appeared so low down in the throat that it was no longer possible to operate from the mouth. By Dr. Mackenzie's advice the illustrious patient went to Italy to spend the winter. Varying reports of his condition appeared, but when, in February of this year, tracheotomy was finally resorted to, to save him from suffocation, the prospect of his recovery faded in gloom. On March 9, while he was still in Italy, his aged father died, and the Prince became Emperor.

His address to his people, and the dignities he conferred on eminent men, confirmed the good opinion previously entertained of his character. His last official act was a still more decisive evidence of the enlightened policy he would have pursued had he lived. It was an indignant reproof to Government agents who interfered in the elections in the interest of the Government, and of Herr Puttkamer, the Secretary of the Interior, who directed them.

Meanwhile, however, his disease was making rapid progress. He became unable to take solid food, and his strength speedily declined. On June 14 it became evident that was close at hand. The disease had affected the lungs, and the inflammation there could not be otherwise than fatal. Still, the Emperor maintained the tranquillity of mind which had characterized him throughout his affliction, and which did not desert him at the trying moment when he first learned the nature of his disease. He continued to write loving messages for his friends long after the power of speech had left him. Ever mindful of others, and knowing the jealousy with which the German physicians regarded Dr. Mackenzie, he wrote on one of his slips: "I feel that Dr. Mackenzie has done all that human science, watchfulness and skill, could do to prolong my life. I thank him." The Empress was promptly at his bedside when the dangerous symptoms appeared, and during the remaining hours of his life would not quit her post. The Emperor lay with her hand clasped in his, and once, when Bismarck appeared at his bedside, he placed it in that of the grim old chancellor, as if commending her who was soon to be a widow to his powerful protection. He remained perfectly conscious during the day and night, though the fatal symptom of coma occasionally asserted its sway. On the morning of Friday, June 15, the intervals of unconsciousness grew longer, and the members of the family grouped around the bed perceived that he was rapidly sinking, At eleven o'clock Dr. Mackenzie signed to the Empress, who fervently kissed the hand of the dying Emperor, and it was observed he drew it to him and kissed it—his last act. At twelve minutes past eleven o'clock Sir Morell took out his watch, and declared that life had passed away. So ended a life singularly noble and useful, and Germany now mourns in her dead Emperor, the soldier, the scholar, and the statesman, whose love for her, and concern for her welfare, ended only with his life.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A Condemned Murderer's Despair.—An Evangelist remarks: "Not long ago there was a man who for murder was condemned to die, and was in one of the prisons awaiting the day of his execution. An old friend happening to visit the governor of the State, was being shown around the city, and among other places was taken through the prison and shown the condemned cell. After they were gone a warder attending the felon, said to him, 'Do you know who that was that was visiting you?' 'No, he gloomily replied. 'That was the governor of the State,' replied the warder. Then the condemned man stamped his foot in a paroxysm of despair, and exclaimed, 'Why did you not tell me before? If I had but known I would have knelt before him and prayed him to save me; but now it is too late.' Why does not every sinner kneel and ask pardon of the Saviour and Governor of the Universe, now, while He is passing by."

A Farmer's Death Foreshadowed.—"A farmer went almost daily into a market town to buy and sell. He regularly dined in a certain hotel in that town. One night he dreamt that he had entered the hotel, and when he was passing through the hall, he saw a door that he had never noticed there before. He turned the handle and walked in. The door immediately closed behind him, and to his horror he found himself in a room with a great number of his friends who had died. He tried to get out, but his efforts were in vain. 'You cannot get out,' said one of his skeleton friends; 'you, also, shall be dead in eight days.' In the morning the farmer awoke, much disturbed about his dream, and went at once to his minister and related it to him. 'You are an unsaved man,' said the minister, solemnly. 'You ought to come to Christ at once; a distinct call may have come to you through this dream.' 'No,' replied the farmer, 'I will not be whipped into the kingdom, but have no objection to be wooed and won by Christ.' 'Friend, don't let your proud folly ruin you for ever,' the minister exclaimed; 'God has been trying to win you for years.' 'And do you mean to tell me that I shall be a dead man in a week? It is all fancy; I will take my chance.' Next day, when the farmer was in the hotel, he looked for the door of which he dreamed, but he did not see it, and he went on living as before, until the eighth day arrived, when he entered the hotel to partake of his dinner, at which he drank a bottle of wine—perhaps more. Presently he mounted his horse, to go home; but on the road he fell from it, and was killed. How shocking is the end of all who obey not the gospel of Christ!"

The Smuggler's Cargo.—The Rev. Mark Guy Pearse told, in a recent sermon, of a boatman with whom he went fishing, and who joined him in greeting the daylight with the morning hymn. "Ah," said the man, "I could not have done that in the past; I did not feel like singing hymns when the day was breaking." And he told how in the past he had belonged to a smuggling crew, and how one day they saw the Government boat giving chase, and their one hope was in throwing the cargo overboard, lest that which would convict them should be discovered; they preferred to surrender the cargo rather than run the risk of imprisonment. At last, just as they were thinking that nothing that could lead to trouble would now be found on board, the hopeless cry was raised, "It's floating—it won't sink!" And there, in the wake of their vessel, and in sight of the Government officials, floated the incriminating cargo that the waves would not engulf! But it is not so with the evil that the heart abandons as it looks up to Christ. The tempter sometimes whispers to us that our sins are unpardonable, and such as must drive us to despair. But, whatever the tempter or our own depressed natures may suggest, there is nothing between the seeking soul and the Redeemer. "Their sins and iniquities will I remember no more." "He will subdue our iniquities; and Thou wilt cast all their sins into the depths of the sea."

The Bank Manager's Investment.—Mr. Hamilton remarked: "A late very popular manager of a bank was visited by a friend, who said to him, 'Oh, Mr. B., I know of a first-class chance for making a fortune, if I had but a few hundred pounds to invest.' 'May I ask what it is?' replied the manager. His visitor then went into the details of the contemplated transaction, and Mr. B. said, 'I think it will be very profitable. Do you not mean to touch it?' 'I cannot,' said the other, despondingly, 'I have not sufficient capital just now.' That was all that was said, and the bank manager's friend took his departure. Some time afterwards, as he had drawn several rather heavy checques, this gentlemen sent his bankbook to be made up, and when it was returned to him he was surprised to find that there was an entry of £500 in his favor, which he did not remember having paid into the bank. He immediately went to the bank and inquired concerning it. The clerk could give him no information other than that the entry had been made at the instance of the manager. He went to his friend, the manager, about the mistake. 'It is not a mistake,' replied Mr. B., 'I directed it to be put there. When you were here last you gave me some information on a certain subject. I thought your views were right, and acted upon your advice, with the result that I have cleared a considerable profit, and the £500 paid in to your account is your share of it.' That man took his religion into practical business, and rendered to every man his due. Nothing would have been easier than for him to keep the whole profits, and few, knowing the circumstances, would have dared to find fault; but he loved his neighbor as himself."

HUMAN CONSTELLATIONS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached at Winfield, Kansas., last Sunday Morning, June 24, 1888.

"They that turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars for ever and ever." Dan. 12 : 3.

Every Man has Influence—Is Peopling Heaven or Hell—How to Turn Many to Righteousness—I. By a Right Example—Result of a Little Child's Ablutions—The Best Kind of Binding for a Bible An Intrepid General in the Mexican War—II. By Prayer—A Mother's Prayer for a Wayward Boy—III. By Christian Admonition—IV. The Reward.—To be as Stars—Shining with Borrowed Light—A Light Independent—Unknown Graves at Richmond—Like Stars in Clusters—In Swift Motion—In Magnitude—In Duration.

EVERY man has a thousand roots and a thousand branches. His roots reach down through all the earth; his branches spread through all the heavens. He speaks with voice, with eye, with hand, with foot. His silence often is thunder, and his life is an anthem or a doxology. There is no such thing as negative influence. We are all positive in the place we occupy, making the world better or making it worse, on the Lord's side or on the devil's, making up reasons for our blessedness or banishment; and we have already done work in Peopling Heaven or Hell.

I hear people tell of what they are going to do. A man who has burned down a city might as well talk of some evil that he expects to do, or a man who has saved an empire might as well talk of some good that he expects to do. By the force of your evil influence you have already consumed infinite values; or you have, by the power of a right influence, won whole kingdoms for God.

It would be absurd for me to stand here, and, by elaborate argument, prove that the world is off the track. You might as well stand at the foot of an embankment, amid the wreck of a capsized rail-train, proving by elaborate argument that something is out of order. Adam tumbled over the embankment sixty centuries ago, and the whole race, in one long train, has gone on tumbling in the same direction. Crash! crash! The only question now is, by what leverage can the crushed thing be lifted? By what hammer may the fragments be reconstructed? I want to show you to righteousness, and what will be our future pay for so doing.

First. We may turn them by the charm of a right example. A child coming from a filthy home, was taught at school to wash its face. It went home so much improved in appearance that its mother washed her face. And when the father of the household came home, and saw the improvement in domestic appearance, he washed his face. The neighbors happening in, saw the change, and tried the same experiment, until all that street was purified, and the next street copied its example, and the whole city felt the result of one school-boy washing his face. That is a fable, by which we set forth that the best way to get the world washed of its sins and pollution, is to have our own heart and life cleansed and purified. A man with grace in his heart, and Christian cheerfulness in his face, and holy consistency in his behavior, is a perpetual sermon; and the sermon differs from others in that it has but one head, and the longer it runs, the better.

There are honest men who walk down Wall Street, making the teeth of iniquity chatter. There are happy men who go into a sick-room, and, by a look, help the broken bone to knit, and the excited nerves drop to a calm beating. There are pure men whose presence silences the tongue of uncleanness, of good on earth is a consistent Christian. I like the Bible folded between lids of cloth, of calfskin, or morocco, but I like it better when, in the shape of a man, it goes out into the world—a Bible illustrated. Courage is beautiful to read about; but rather would I see a man with all the world against him, confident as though all the world were for him. Patience is beautiful to read about; but rather would I see a buffeted soul calmly waiting for the time of deliverance. Faith is beautiful to read about; but rather would I find a man in the midnight walking straight on as though he saw everything. Oh, how many souls have been turned to God by the charm of a bright example!

The Mightiest Agent

When, in the Mexican War, the troops were wavering, a general rose in his stirrups and dashed into the enemy's lines, shouting, "Men, follow me!" They, seeing his courage and disposition, dashed on after him and gained the victory. What men want to rally them for God is an example to lead them. All your commands to others to advance amount to nothing so long as you stay behind. To affect them aright, you need to start for heaven yourself, looking back only to give the stirring cry of, "Men, follow!"

Again: We may turn many to righteousness

By Prayer.

There is no such detective as prayer, for no one can hide away from it. It puts its hand on the shoulder of a man ten thousand miles off. It alights on a ship mid-Atlantic. The little child cannot understand the law of electricity, or how the telegraphic operator, by touching the instrument here, may dart a message under the sea to another continent; nor can we, with our small intellect, understand how the touch of a Christian's prayer shall instantly strike a soul on the other side of the earth. You take ship and go to some other country, and get there at eleven o'clock in the morning. You telegraph to New York, and the message gets here at six o'clock in the same morning. In other words, it seems to arrive here five hours before it started. Like that is prayer. God says: "Before they call, I will hear." To overtake a loved one on the road, you may spur up a lathered steed until he shall outrace the one that brought the news to Ghent; but a prayer shall catch it at one gallop. A boy running away from home may take the midnight train from the country village, and reach the seaport in time to gain the ship that sails on the morrow; but will be on the deck to meet him, and in the hammock before he swings into it, and at the capstan before he winds the rope around and on the sea, against the sky, as the vessel ploughs on toward it. There is a mightiness in prayer. George Muller prayed a company of poor boys together, and then he prayed up an asylum in which they might be sheltered. He turned his face toward Edinburgh and prayed, and there came a thousand pounds. He turned his face toward London and prayed, and there came a thousand pounds. He turned his face toward Dublin and prayed, and there came a thousand pounds. The breath of Elijah's prayer blew all the clouds off the sky, and it was dry weather. The breath of Elijah's prayer blew all the clouds together, and it was wet weather. Prayer, in Daniel's time, walked the cave as a lion-tamer. It reached up, and took the sun by its golden bit, and stopped it.

What Prayer can Do.

We have all yet to try the full power of prayer. The time will come when the American Church will pray with its face toward the West, and all the prairies and inland cities will surrender to God; and will pray with face toward the sea, and all the islands and ships will become Christian. Parents who have wayward sons will get down on their knees and say: "Lord, send my boy home," and the boy in Canton shall get right up from the gaming-table, and go down to find out which ship starts first for America.

Not one of us yet knows how to pray. All we have done as yet has only been pottering. A boy gets hold of his father's saw and hammer, and tries to make something, but it is a poor affair that he makes. The father comes and takes the same saw and hammer, and builds the house or the ship. In the childhood of our Christian faith, we make but poor work with these weapons of prayer, but when we come to the stature of men in Christ Jesus, then, under these implements, the temple of God will rise, and the world's redemption will be launched. God cares not for the length of our prayers, or the number of our prayers, or the beauty of our prayers, or the place of our prayers; but it is the faith in them that tells. Believing prayer soars higher than the lark ever sang; plunges deeper than diving-bell ever sank; darts quicker than lightning ever flashed. Though we have used only the back of this weapon instead of the edge, what marvels have been wrought! If saved, we are all the captives of some earnest prayer. Would God that, in desire for the rescue of souls, we might in prayer lay hold of the resources of the Lord Omnipotent!

We may turn many to righteousness

By Christian Admonition

Do not wait until you can make a formal speech. Address the one next to you. You will not go home alone to-day. Between this and your place of stopping you may decide the eternal destiny of an immortal spirit. Just one sentence may do the work. Just one question. Just one look. The formal talk that begins with a sigh, and ends with a canting snuffle, is not what is wanted, but the heart-throb of a man in dead earnest. There is not a soul on earth that you may not bring to God if you rightly go at it. They said Gibraltar could not be taken. It is a rock, sixteen hundred feet high and three miles long. But the English and Dutch did take it. Artillery, and sappers and miners, and fleets pouring out volleys of death, and thousands of men reckless of danger, can do anything. The stoutest heart of sin, though it be rock, and surrounded by an ocean of transgression, under Christian bombardment may hoist the flag of redemption.

The Reward.

But is all this admonition and prayer and Christian work for nothing? My text promises to all the faithful eternal lustre. "They that turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars forever." As stars, the redeemed have a borrowed light. What makes Mars and Venus and Jupiter so luminous? When the sun throws down his torch in the heavens, the stars pick up the scattered brands, and hold them in procession as the queen of the night advances; so all Christian workers, standing around the throne, will shine in the light borrowed from the Sun of Righteousness—Jesus in their faces, Jesus in their songs, Jesus in their triumph.

Christ left heaven once for a tour of redemption on earth, yet the glorified ones knew He would come back again. But let Him abdicate His throne, and go away to stay for ever, the music would stop; the congregation disperse; the temples of God be darkened; the rivers of light stagnate; and every chariot would become a hearse, and every bell would toll, and there would not be room on the hillsides to bury the dead of the great metropolis, for there would be pestilence in heaven. But Jesus lives, and so all the redeemed live with Him. He shall recognize them as His comrades in earthly toil, and remember what they did for the honor of His name, and for the spread of His kingdom. All their prayers and tears and work will rise before Him as He looks into their faces, and He will divide His kingdom with them; His peace—their peace; His holiness—their holiness; His joy—their joy. The glory of the central throne reflected from the surrounding thrones, the last spot of sin struck from the Christian orb, and the entire nature a-tremble and a-flash with light, they shall shine as the stars for ever and ever.

Again: Christian workers shall be like the stars in the fact that they have

of each other. Look up at the night, and see each world show its distinct glory. It is not like the conflagration, in which you cannot tell where one flame stops and another begins. Neptune, Herschel, and Mercury are as distinct as if each one of them were the only star; so our individualism will not be lost in heaven.

great multitude—yet each one as observable, as distinctly recognized, as greatly celebrated, as if in all the space, from gate to gate, and from hill to hill, he were the only inhabitant; no mixing up—no mob—no indiscriminate rush; each Christian worker all the story of earthly achievement adhering to each one; his self-denials and pains and services and victories published. Before men went out to the last war, the orators told them that they would all be remembered by their country, and their names be commemorated in poetry and in song; but go to the graveyard in Richmond, and you will find there six thousand graves, over each one of which is the inscription, "Unknown." The world does not remember its heroes; but there will be no unrecognized Christian worker in heaven. Each one known by all; grandly known; known by acclamation: all the past story of work for God gleaming in cheek and brow and foot and palm. They shall shine with distinct light as the stars, for ever and ever.

Again: Christian workers shall shine like the Stars in Clusters.

In looking up, you find the worlds in family circles. Brothers and sisters—they take hold of each other's hands and dance in groups. Orion in a group. The Pleiades in a group. The solar system is only a company of children, with bright faces, gathered around one great fireplace. The worlds do not straggle off. They go in squadrons and fleets, sailing through immensity. So Christian workers in heaven will dwell in neighborhoods and clusters.

I am sure that some people I will like in heaven a great deal better than others. Yonder is a constellation of stately Christians. They lived on earth by rigid rule. They never laughed. They walked every hour anxious lest they should lose their dignity. But they loved God; and yonder they shine in brilliant constellation. Yet I shall not long to get into that particular group. Yonder is a constellation of small-hearted Christians—asteroids in the eternal astronomy. While some souls go up from Christian battle, and blaze like Mars, these asteroids dart a feeble ray like Vesta. Yonder is a constellation of martyrs, of apostles, of patriarchs. Our souls, as they go up to heaven, will seek out the most congenial society.

Yonder is a constellation almost merry with the play of light. On earth they were full of sympathies and songs and tears and raptures and congratulations. When they prayed, their words took fire; when they sang, the tune could not hold them; when they wept over a world's woes, they sobbed as if heart-broken; when they worked for Christ they flamed with enthusiasm. Yonder they are—circle of light! constellation of joy! galaxy of fire! Oh, that you and I, by that grace which can transform the worst into the best, might at last sail in the wake of that fleet, and wheel in that glorious group, as the stars for ever and ever!

Again: Christian workers will shine like the stars in swiftness of motion. The worlds

Do not Stop to Shine.

There are no fixed stars save as to relative position. The star most thoroughly fixed flies thousands of miles a minute. The astronomer, using his telescope for an alpenstock, leaps from world-crag to world-crag, and finds no star standing still. The chamois hunter has to fly to catch his prey, but not so swift is his game as that which the scientist tries to shoot through the tower of observatory. Like petrels mid-Atlantic, that seem to come from no shore, and be bound to no landing-place—flying, flying—so these great flocks of worlds rest not as they go—wing and wing—age after age—for ever and ever. The eagle hastes to its prey, but we shall in speed beat the eagles.

You have noticed the velocity of the swift horse under whose feet the miles slip like a smooth ribbon, and as he passes, the four hoofs strike the earth in such quick beat your pulses take the same vibration. But all these things are not swift in comparison with the motion of which I speak. The moon moves fifty-four thousand miles in a day. Yonder, Neptune flashes on eleven thousand miles in an hour. Yonder Mercury goes one hundred and nine thousand miles in an hour. So like the stars the Christian shall shine in swiftness of motion.

You hear now of father or mother or child sick one thousand miles away, and it takes you two days to get to them. You hear of some case of suffering that demands your immediate attention, but it takes you an hour to get there. Oh, the joy when you shall, in fulfilment of the text, take starry speed, and be equal to one hundred thousand miles an hour! Having on earth got used to Christian work, you will not quit when death strikes you. You will only take on more velocity. There is a dying child in London, and its spirit must be taken up to God: you are there in an instant to do it. There is a young man in New York to be arrested from going into that gate of sin: you are there in an instant to arrest him. Whether with spring of foot, or stroke of wing, or by the force of some new law that shall hurl you to the spot where you would go, I know not; but my text suggests velocity. All space open before you, with nothing to hinder you in mission of light and love and joy, you shall shine in swiftness of motion as the stars for ever and ever.

Again: Christian workers, like the stars,

Shine in Magnitude.

The most illiterate man knows that these things in the sky, looking like gilt buttons, are great masses of matter. To weigh them, one would think that it would require scales with a pillar hundreds of thousands of miles high, and chains hundreds of thousands of miles long, and at the bottom of the chains basins on either side hundreds of thousands of miles wide, and that then Omnipotence alone could put the mountains into the scales and the hills into the balance. But puny man has been equal to the undertaking, and has set a little balance on his geometry, and weighed world against world. Yea, he has pulled out his measuring line, and announced that Herschel is thirty-six thousand miles in diameter, Saturn seventy-nine thousand miles in diameter, and Jupiter eighty-nine thousand miles in diameter, and that the smallest pearl on the beach of heaven is immense beyond all imagination. So all they who have toiled for Christ on earth shall rise up to a magnitude of privilege, and a magnitude of strength, and a magnitude of holiness, and a magnitude of joy; and the weakest saint in glory become greater than all that we can imagine of an arch-angel.

Brethren, it doth not yet appear what we shall be. Wisdom that shall know everything; wealth that shall possess everything; strength that shall do everything; glory that shall circumscribe everything! We shall not be like a taper set in a sick man's window, or a bundle of stick kindled on the beach to warm a shivering crew; but you must take the diameter and the circumference of the world, if you would get any idea of the greatness of our estate when we shall shine as the stars for ever and ever.

Lastly—and coming to this point my mind almost breaks down under the contemplation—like the stars, all Christian workers shall

Shine in Duration,

The same stars that look down upon us looked down upon the Chaldean shepherds. The meteor that I saw flashing across the sky the other night, I wonder if it was not the same one that pointed down to where Jesus lay in the manger, and if, having pointed out His birthplace, it has ever since been wandering through the heavens, watching to see how the world would treat Him! When Adam awoke in the garden in the cool of the day, he saw coming out through the dusk of the evening the same worlds that greeted us last night.

In Independence Hall is an old cracked bell that sounded the signature of the Declaration of Independence. You cannot ring it now; but this great chime of silver bells that strike in the dome of night, ring out with as sweet a tone as when God swung them at the creation. Look up at night, and know that the white lilies that bloom in all the hanging gardens of our King are century plants—not blooming once in a hundred years, but through all the centuries.

The star at which the mariner looks to-night was the light by which the ships of Tarshish were guided across the Mediterranean, and the Venetian flotilla found its way into Lepanto. Their armor is as bright to-night as when, in ancient battle, the stars in their courses fought against Sisera. To the ancients the stars were Symbols of Eternity.

But here the figure of my text breaks down—not in defeat, but in the majesties of the judgment. The stars shall not shine forever. The Bible says they shall fall like autumnal leaves. As, when the connecting factory-band slips at nightfall from the main-wheel, all the smaller wheels slacken their speed, and with slower and slower motion they turn until they come to a full stop; so this great machinery of the universe, wheel within wheel, making revolution of appalling speed, shall, by the touch of God's hand, slip the band of present law, and slacken and stop. That is what will be the matter with the mountains. The chariots in which they ride shall halt so suddenly that the kings shall be thrown out. Star after star shall be carried out to burial amid funeral torches and burning worlds. Constellations shall throw ashes on their heads, and all up and down the highways of space there shall be mourning, mourning, mourning, because the worlds are dead. But the Christian workers shall never quit their thrones—they shall reign for ever and ever.

CONVERTED IN THE CATACOMBS.

IN an introduction to a lecture by Prof. de Launay, formerly Professor of ancient and modern languages in the State College of Louisiana, Canon Christopher recently gave an interesting account of the Professor's conversion from Roman Catholicism. It appears that M. de Launay, who is a native of Paris, after graduating at the University of Angers, was placed by his relatives under the care of the Vicar-General of the Jesuits, at Rome, as his spiritual adviser. He studied under Cardinal Mezzofanti, the most reputed linguist of his day. He was joined to the company of Jesus, and was sent to Fribourg. There, while preparing to enter as a novice, an attack of typhoid fever brought him to the verge of death. In his anguish of soul he sent for a priest to bring him the Viaticum, or last Communion. The priest, whilst lifting up the host, exclaimed in Latin, "Blessed are they who hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled"; "Come unto Me all ye who are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest." These words were a light in the darkness to his agonized soul, but the clear, bright sun of simple trust in Christ was not yet apparent.

After recovering he returned to Rome, and he frequently visited the catacombs. Among these tombs of the martyrs his troubled spirit found peace, joy, light, and repose, in beholding, reading, and sketching the pictorial records and inscriptions on these tombs. Here he learned how far Popery had wandered away from the truth and teachings of Christ. In the first three centuries of bloody persecution he found nowhere a prayer for the dead, nor to the dead; nowhere a crucifix, but the signs and symbols of the Resurrection; nowhere among the miles and miles of graves a prayer to the blessed mother of our Lord; she is not even named. Here there was no grovelling devotion to sculptured images of wood and stone. M. de Launay perceived that the religion of the early Christians and martyrs buried in the catacombs was what the New Testament taught, but not what the Church of Rome taught. He felt that he could not conscientiously remain a Roman Catholic. He came to America, and after laboring for some time in the College of Louisiana, went to Paris, where he is now laboring with much success as a Protestant missionary.

THE SPIRIT IN THE COMING AGE.

By Pastor E. P. Marvin.*

His Progressive Work—Pentecost to be Eclipsed in the Coming Outporing—At the Bringing in of the Fullness of the Gentiles—Bodies of the Saints Redeemed—The Brute Creation to Share—The Timely Watch-Cry—The Duty of Watchfulness.

THE Holy Spirit has been constantly at work in the world from the creation. He brooded over chaotic creation, Gen. 1 : 2, inspired prophets, II Pet. 1 : 21, filled them with power, Micah 3 : 8, and wrought wonders through Moses, Joshua, Samson, and Elijah. He co-operated continually with Christ on earth in all His wondrous works, Matt. 12 : 28. Christ was filled with the Holy Spirit, Luke 4 : 1. He was conceived, Matt. 1 : 20, anointed, Acts 10 : 28. and raised from the dead by the Holy Spirit, I Pet. 3 : 18. He breathed the Spirit on His disciples, John 20 : 22. The present is "the special dispensation of the Holy Spirit" only in its Progressive and Varied Work.

It is really a dispensation of the Trinity. All three persons were represented at the Baptism of Christ. The Holy Spirit, as the Executive of Divinity, applies the purchased Redemption, and calls out the Bride elect. Christ, the Prince of Life, imparts life through the Holy Spirit. The promise and potency of all regeneration and restitution resides in the Spirit of God—"As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, world without end, Amen." As the work of the Spirit has been progressive in power and permanence in ages past, we may expect the same divine progress in ages to come.

Many prophecies of the Spirit's power and work await a more complete fulfilment at and after the Coming of the Lord. The blessing at Pentecost and afterward, is repeatedly called an "earnest," that is a sample and pledge of more to follow, II Cor. 1 : 22, and 5 : 5; Eph. 1 : 14. The earnest is but a small portion of the promised abundance. A careful study of Joel 2 : 28-32 reveals that this prophecy does not find its complete and final fulfilment in Acts 2 : 15-20. Verses 12, 17, 18, 27, in Joel, interpret "afterward" in v. 28. After the repentance and restoration of God's ancient people, will come the Great Outpouring. Besides, the Spirit was not poured out on "all flesh" at Pentecost, but only on Jews in Jerusalem, and there were no celestial "signs." Every prophecy must find its mate, and Pentecost does not fully meet and complete this. Again, in Acts 3 : 19, 21, it is declared that when God's ancient people repent, refreshing shall come, Christ shall return, and be ushered in. We cannot separate these events widely, and they are all in the future. They are called times or seasons of refreshing, and they are directly related to the Coming of the Lord. We also read of these in James 5 : 7 as "the early and latter rain." Pentecost then was but an increase of blessing over the past, and an earnest of the future.

A more powerful, conspicuous, and wonderful outpouring of the Holy Spirit will come when the Fullness of the Gentiles is brought in, Christ returns, and the Jews are restored. The first work is to evangelize the world and gather in the "election of grace," the fullness of the Gentiles, the Bride of Christ. Then the Spirit will work with seven-fold power. There shall be showers and floods of blessing. Ps. 72 : 67; Isa. 44 : 3; Ezek. 34 : 46. A new heart will be given, and Israel shall come forth from the charnel house. Ezek. 36 : 4-28, and 37 : 1-13. Israel shall be honored among the nations, and wonders shall be wrought. Zech. 8 : 21-23; Acts 15 : 14-17; Rom. 11 : 15, 26. We have in the order of redemption : 1. An election of Jews. 2. An election of Gentiles. 3. The nation of Jews. 4. The nation of Gentiles.

God chose the Jew first to preserve and transmit His truth and grace. Upon his failure, is called. After this election of grace is complete, the Jew must come again upon the scene to be blest, and to bless the world. Gen. 12 : 3. The Jews were the first missionaries, and they will be the last, up to the "Coming Day." They are God's Mediatorial People, destined to fill the world with the knowledge of God. Pentecost must be repeated with seven-fold power before the millennium, acting upon the long-rejected people, and through them upon the nations.

A Gentile Remnant

Prophecy forecasts blended scenes of judgment and mercy, love and wrath, rewards and punishments. Ps. 2 : 8, 9; II Thess. 1 : 8; Jude 14. See the Book of Revelation. Until then we shall win no general and decisive victory. This is true divine evolution from age to age. The "good time is coming," not by human wisdom and worldly progress. Professor Guizot used often to speak in foreign tongue of "devil-upment," and this foreign-coined word fitly characterizes the general progress of the race for the whole 6,000 years.

Then will the Holy Spirit redeem the bodies of the saints from the grave, and transfigure those of the living saints. No one ever died in the presence of Christ on earth, and some were raised to life as an earnest of the future. Our bodies, fashioned like unto the glorious body of the Son of God, will be the everlasting temple of the life-giving Spirit. John 6 : 63; Rom. 8 : 11; I Cor. 15 : 42-53; I Thess. 4 : 16-18.

The Inferior Creation, cursed by sin and made subject to vanity, shall be regenerated and restored by the Holy Spirit. The Spirit will flood the earth, operating again on matter, eradicating the curse, renewing the face of the earth, and causing the desert to rejoice and blosson like the rose. Job 26 : 13; Ps. 104 : 30; Isa. 35 : 1; Rom. 8 : 10, 11.

This is the "regeneration," the bloom-time, when new life shall spring and beauty smile on every side. The earth is linked with man in both humiliation and glory. Soul, body, and earth are all redeemed. Man's original inheritance, usurped and damaged by the usurper. Satan, is then to be renovated and restored. Even the brute creation share in the restitution, Their savage nature is eradicated, and they dwell in peace with man and each other. Isa. 11 : 6-9. The Spirit can tame savage beasts as easily as savage men. Thus Satan's world becomes the Lord's again, and this is a prelude to the eternal state. Ps. 24. The Spirit, in co-operation with our Messianic King, erects and manifests the promised Kingdom, and becomes the centre of the world's peace. Isa. 32 : 1; Hag. 2 : 9. And we, as fellow-heirs, shall share in the glory and authority of the heavenly department of this kingdom. II Tim. 4 : 18. Israel on earth, as the head of nations and the source of blessing, shares the glory of the terrestrial. At the close of this millennial stage, we have the last judgment, and the complete renewal of the earth as the eternal home of the saints, underneath the new heavens, all plainly revealed. We may see, then, that Christ and the Holy Spirit do not make a failure, because the world is not all converted in this dispensation. Indeed, if the conquest of the world had been the dispensational promise and purpose, we might well call the last 1800 years a failure. But the true purpose (Acts 15 : 14) has been, and is being clearly fulfilled, and it is no failure that the spirit does not finish up all His work in our time. A glorious and final triumph is sure in ages to come.

Ministers of the Word who neglect the careful and prayerful study of Dispensational Truth, may well fear that a blight will come upon their spiritual life, and failure on their ministry. And especially must those who wilfully shut their eyes to the flood of light now poured upon their pathway concerning the present truth and blessed hope of the Lord's Coming, totally misunderstand "the signs of the times," blunder much in frujtless services, lack the supreme inspiration of revelation, and "be ashamed before Him at His Coming.' "Maranatha" is and this is more and more testing and assorting the hearts, lives, and labors of the professing Church. We are not following a forlorn hope because we do not now "take the world for Christ," but allow Him the glory of taking it for Himself, in co-operation with the blessed Holy Spirit. Constantine first conceived the unscriptural scheme of erecting the Church into a kingdom, taking the world, and reigning in the absence of its rejected sovereign, and he thus inaugurated the greatest apostacy the Church ever saw. The Post-millennial error, "My Lord delayeth His coming," causes no small part of the worldliness and apostacy of the Church to-day. We are cheered by a bright hope, stimulated by an ever-imminent triumph, and encouraged by a reward insured by fidelity. II Tim. 4 : 7, 8.

Corporate testimony in holy living, apart from the world, seems almost gone. The spiritual grace of wisdom and corporate soul-winning by the stated means of grace, has fearfully declined. As a pastor, I am compelled to confess that the Spirit seems to use the professing Church less and less, as if corporate fellowship service were ending. As pastors we seem to be gathering the few grape gleanings after the vintage is done! We are resolved into individual testimony and service. Rev. 3 : 20. Evangelists, who look for that Blessed Hope, seem to be doing most of the soul-winning. It is suppertime. We must go to the streets and lanes, the highways and hedges.

Finally, how frequently we should pray, and how eagerly we should watch for the speedy Coming of the Lord! Christ prayed for the Spirit to come, John 14 : 16, 17; and the Spirit prays for Christ to return, Rev. 22 : 17. Revelation closes with a promise from heaven, which is wafted back in a prayer. Rev. 22 : 20.

A NIGHT ON A MOUNTAIN.

A FAMILY on the brink of a precipice in the dark had a hairbreadth escape from death on June 9. That afternoon, a farmer living in Sullivan County, Penn., set out in a light spring wagon with two horses from Williamsport to go to Eagle's Mere. He was accompanied by his wife and his two small children. Just as it was growing dusk, and when within a few miles of their destination, the farmer in crossing the rough mountain path took a wrong turn. They travelled on without discovering the mistake for two hours. It grew very dark, and the overhanging branches of trees shut out even starlight. Yet they went on until suddenly the woman broke silence with, "I hear a noise like rushing waters." The farmer was loth to believe it, but lest there might be danger he stopped the horses. He then heard the ominous roar of a waterfall. The man was unnerved for a minute, when he lighted a piece of paper and to his horror discovered that they were on the brink of a precipice. Two more steps and the entire party would have been hurled down into a stream of water threading a sharp and rugged bed of rock two hundred feet below. Towering above them on the other side of the pathway was a straight wall of rock as high above them as the roaring falls beneath. It was a moment of awful suspense. As quickly as he could, the farmer had his wife and children out of the vehicle, and then, finding there was not room enough to turn, he unharnessed the horses and took out the pole. He reversed the wagon inch by inch, fearful every moment of its turning over the precipice; the horses were again hitched to, and they began to retrace their steps, the farmer walking at their heads. In this way they travelled over rough and dangerous roads, infested with bears and panthers, until the welcome dawn greeted their eyes. Not far off they heard the tinkle of cow bells and the barking of a dog. A loud shout brought a man to them who put them in the right road for Eagle's Mere. When they arrived the lady was so prostrated by the fearful experience of the night that for five hours she was unable to speak. Their peril was a fit type of the lives of thousands. Lost on the mountains of unbelief, in spiritual darkness, they are tending toward the precipice of death. But for all such God's Spirit waits to guide them to the path of peace and safety. (Ezek. 33: 11.)

HOW BISHOP PARKER DIED.

THE brief cablegram announcing the death of Bishop Parker, the successor of the martyred Bishop Hannington, which was all the intelligence we had of the sad event, when his portrait was published in this journal on June 7, has now been supplemented by a letter from Dr. Mackay. Writing from Usambiro, Eastern Equatorial Africa, Dr. Mackay says: "At our evening meal on March 26, the Bishop seemed fairly well, and was quite cheerful. His room was next to mine, and between two and three o'clock in the morning I heard him call his servant, Robert. I got up, thinking there was something wrong, and found him in bed shaking with a sharp attack of ague. He said that he had just taken a glass of quinine, but feared he had done so too late to ward off the attack. Ashe and I got him a hot bottle for his feet, and stayed with him a short time until the second or hot stage had begun to yield to slight perspiration. He begged us to retire, but bade his boy to sleep in the room by him, so as to be ready to call any of us should he feel worse. Soon after six o'clock on Monday morning, I went in to see him. He seemed to be in a very high fever, and completely jaundiced in appearance. Towards evening the fever passed off and coma set in. We arranged to divide the night in watching him, the hours till midnight falling to me. He seemed to sleep fairly quietly till about half-past nine, when breathing became irregular, and he began to groan. I sent for Ashe quickly, and just as he arrived breathing stopped, and our dear Bishop ceased to be with us. He died at 9: 45, just an hour of a fortnight since Blackburn expired. The loss to us is, indeed, great, but Africa has lost a true friend.

A FACT FOR STATESMEN.

THE uneasiness produced in all countries now by the anarchic tendencies of workingmen is on both sides of the Atlantic calling for the attention of statesmen. Not only in our own country, but in Germany, France, England, Belgium, and other lands, the governments are aware that the most difficult problem, but the most urgent is the Labor Question. As a rule, however, they overlook the fact that the most successful preventive of anarchy and social disorder is the gospel. Nowhere is the revolutionary spirit so active as among the artisans of France, among whom the Rev. R. W. McAll's mission is successfully laboring, and this is the testimony of one of its most prominent workers: "The result of the services of the mission halls is most hopeful. Restless, discouraged, desperate hearts are the very ones for whom it has a message, and, go where it will in France, it finds such hearts to-day. So much the greater, then, is the need of carrying the work forward into places where it has not yet penetrated. For while the Spirit of God is moving in the hearts of this people, discontented with their present lot, though not yet realizing their need of the gospel, the time is most propitious to present to them that which is their best and sufficient help. If any proof were needed that the gospel is a true panacea, even for the social woes under which the common people of France, as of all Europe, are suffering, it comes to us from the report of the Protestant pastors of Belgium, who have publicly stated that not one of the members of their churches (principally laboring men, whose poverty is deep, and whose outlook is dark and discouraging) took any part in the violent labor disturbances which a year or more ago agitated all Liege and the district of Charleroi; but conducted themselves throughout as Christians."

ONE BIBLE IN A CHILIAN HOME.

A DEEPLY encouraging incident is reported in a Bible Society's report. It states that a Bible in Spanish was given, some time ago, to a Chilian sailor serving on board a steamer. The donor was a passenger, who said it was of no use to him, and the sailor was welcome to it. The young Chilian was deeply interested in it, and without any human agency whatever he became a true Christian. On his return trip he brought the Bible home with him to Talcahuano, where his parents and brothers and sisters resided. His eldest sister commenced a study of the book, and in a short time she gave up the confessional and the mass, and became a true Christian. In the course of two years the whole family, including her parents, three sisters, two brothers, and a brother-in-law, all embraced the truth as it is in Christ Jesus, and gave up all connection with Rome. This great work of God was performed without any instrumentality except His own Word and Spirit. The Rev. Dr. Swaney, a missionary in Chili, on his arrival there, met this Christian family.

A VICIOUS RELIGIOUS FESTIVAL.

A NATIVE Christian missionary in India, sends to the Indian Witness a sickening account of the scenes at a mela as he witnessed them, and in the midst of which he preached the gospel. He says: "Last week, hoping to reach the masses of our benighted countrymen, I started in company with my two assistants to the Dhulian Mela (fair), held in honor of Krishna, eleven miles from our station. I think it will not be uninteresting to state why these melas are held. To avert calamity and to bring down blessings, an image of Krishna, who is called by the people a living Sham Chand (supposing him always ready to grant their wishes) is brought by the wealthy classes from its shrine on the payment of a large sum of money. The image comes, attended by a Mohanto, who is respected and dreaded more than the god himself. The people flock to all parts to beg his blessings. It is a painful sight to see the Mohanto surrounded on all sides by the superstitious devotees, who remain on their knees until the food which was given to the god is distributed to them. To meet the wants of the immense concourse of people, the shop-keepers come; to gratify the lusts of the dissolute, prostitutes flock; to please the senses of hearing and seeing, of the poor as well as the rich, the dancing men and women resort; to amuse the children, players get together; and to cheat the innocent, gamblers assemble. These are the constituent parts which compose a mela. Thus is the most sacred shrine of the Hindus turned into a den of wickedness.

A SINGULAR TESTIMONY IN INDIA.

A STRIKING testimony to the effect of gospel preaching is mentioned in a letter from the Rev. W. A. Moore, a missionary in India to Dr. Cullis, who publishes it in his Times of Refreshing. He says: "Yesterday Goolab Sing went to the small-cause court to preach to the persons who gather there. He met an old friend, who said, 'Wherever I go, I hear you Christians preach, and no matter what we may say against your doctrines, yet the truth sticks. Until recently I did not think anything about doing wrong, but lately, when I lie, the thought, "What will I do should death overtake me?" makes me tremble and makes me afraid to do wrong."' Mr. Moore goes on to say: "A few days ago I sent out Bhkum Sing with some vernacular books for sale. He went to the house of our old Marathi teacher and found him reading the Bible. This teacher takes three Christian papers, and seeing the Bible advertised in one of them, sent for one and is studying. The Christian papers taken by him are eagerly read by several educated Hindus. Last Sunday, while preaching in the bazaar, a brazier listened very attentively. After we finished preaching, I gave away a few Gospels. This brazier was very anxious to get one, but as a man from a distant village wanted one we gave it to him, and told the brazier he would get one if he went to Goolab Sing's next day. Next day he went to G. S's place, and brother Namajee had a long talk with him. The man is convinced of the truth, but does not know how to earn his livelihood if he became a Christian."

POLITICAL PROGRESS IN JAPAN.

THE interest excited throughout the civilized world in the condition of Japan, especially among Christians, who hear with gladness of the opportunities afforded in that country for the preaching of the gospel, is gratified by the publication in the New York Evening Post of a lengthy letter from Rev. T. S. Tyng, the Protestant Episcopal missionary at Osaka. The facts which he there gives show a remarkable advance in civil liberty, and indicate that in the matter of elections the Japanese are at least as far advanced as ourselves. He says: "Another straw, showing the movement of the current, is shown in a case now pending in the superior court of this city. An election to fill a vacancy in the assembly of a recent prefecture, was recently held. Party spirit ran high. The sub-prefect, who had the counting of the votes, was of the minority party, and, if report is true, threw out, on the ground of mistake in the writing of a name, votes enough to elect his candidate, and reported to the prefect accordingly. The prefect accepted his report, and declared his candidate elected. For this he has been indicted, at the instance of the opposite party, and, appointee of the central government though he is, must now stand his trial in the ordinary courts of law, for accepting and giving effect to the report of his subordinate. This is but one of many indications that the power of popular government as already established in Japan, is growing stronger day by day."

The impression of Japan, recently produced by the popular representation of the humorists, is also declared by Mr. Tyng to be erroneous. He says: "Assassination or beheading may be the Asiatic method of asking for the resignation of obnoxious cabinet officers, but it is certainly not the method now or lately in vogue in Japan. Of recent ministers of state, Kurofia, in 1882, or thereabouts, and Inouye, in 1887, were driven from office by popular opinion—the former for alleged corruption, the latter for too great concession to foreign powers in the negotiations for treaty revision; but neither has met with any tragical fate. Okuma, Itagaki, Tani, and Soyeshima are names of some who have quietly withdrawn because of disagreement with the party in power; Okuma and Itagaki becoming leaders respectively of the moderate and advanced liberals. There has been no instance of a cabinet minister beheaded since the revolution which established the Mikado's government in 1868, and no beheading of anybody since that form of punishment was abolished in 1873. Capital punishment in any form is now reserved for cases of high treason, murder, and sometimes arson, and can be inflicted in no case whatever, except by due process of law, through the agency of the courts, as in the case, also, with all punishment for felony. A good instance (one out of many) of the absence of bloodthirstiness in the treatment of political offenders, is Mr. Mutsu. He was convicted of complicity in Saigo's rebellion, condemned to five years' imprisonment, released at the end of two years and a half; in eighteen months more put into office, and now goes to represent his country as Minister at Washington."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Republican National Convention which assembled at Chicago on June 19, joined issue with the Democratic party, as was expected, on the Tariff question. It stands squarely, explicitly, and emphatically for Protection, with a tariff not for revenue, but for the nurture of American industries. If a large surplus continues to accumulate therefrom, the Convention was in favor of the abolition of the Internal Revenue, or large expenditures for the national welfare, in preference to any reduction of the tariff. As the plank of the platform adopted by the Convention on Thursday last is likely to become the subject of discussion in every city in the country, and as it is an unequivocal declaration of the political faith of the Republican party, it may be well to quote it in full. The Convention declared: "We are uncompromisingly in favor of the American system of protection. We protest against its destruction as proposed by the President and his party. They serve the interests of Europe; we will support the interests of America. We accept the issue, and confidently appeal to the people for their judgment. The protective system must be maintained. Its abandonment has always been followed by general disaster to all interests except those of the usurer and the sheriff. We denounce the Mills Bill as destructive to the general business, the labor and the farming interests of the country, and we heartily indorse the consistent and patriotic action of the Republican Representatives in Congress in opposing its passage. We condemn the proposition of the Democratic party to place wool on the free list, and we insist that the duties thereon shall be adjusted and maintained so as to furnish full and adequate protection to that industry. The Republican party would effect all needed reduction of the national revenue by repealing the tax upon tobacco, which are an annoyance and burden to agriculture, and the tax upon spirits used in the arts and for mechanical purposes; and by such revision of the tariff laws as will tend to check imports of such articles as are produced by our people, the production of which gives employment to our labor, and releases from import duties those articles of foreign production (except luxuries) the like of which cannot be produced at home. If there shall still remain a larger revenue than is requisite for the wants of the Government, we favor the entire repeal of internal taxes rather than the surrender of any part of our protective system, at the joint behest of the Whisky Trusts and the agents of foreign manufacturers." The platform also advocates the bi-metallic standard of money, the reduction of letter postage to one cent an ounce, and condemns the Fishery treaty.

The Balloting for Candidates for the Presidency was commenced by the Convention on Friday last. The number necessary to a choice was 417. In the first ballot the candidates and numbers stood as follows: Sherman 229; Gresham, 114; Depew, 99; Alger, 84; Harrison, 79; Allison, 72; Blaine, 31; Ingalls, 28—(These were 17 from Kansas, 10 from Arkansas, and 1 from South Carolina. The names of the men who thought Ingalls fit for the Presidency have not been published.) –Phelps, 25; Rusk, 25; Fitler, 24; Hawley, 13; Lincoln, 3; McKinley, 2. On the second ballot Sherman made a gain of twenty; Alger, of thirty-two; and Harrison, of sixteen. The third ballot, which was the last taken on Friday showed no material changes.

The Modification of the Order of the Indian Bureau, in regard to the use of native languages in the Indian schools has been so made as to be entirely satisfactory to the religious societies interested in the improvement of the Indians. The purpose of the Government in insisting upon the use of the English language in the Indian schools, was that young Indians might be brought up to the familiar use of the language which is necessary to them in adopting the arts and ways of civilization, and to their self-dependence and protection in their contact with white men. The President, however, perceives that the missionaries and religious teachers, who render great assistance to the Government in the work of making the Indians tractable and self-reliant, and preparing them for a better social and industrial condition, find it difficult to reach their understanding and feelings effectually by the use of any dialect except their own in their religious instruction. The order, therefore, remains in force, but exceptions are made in favor of religious teachers.

The General Conference on Foreign Missions in Exeter Hall, London, ended June 20. Among the speakers were Rev. Dr. Ellenwood and Rev. Dr. John Hall, both of New York. The following American ministers, among others, were seen in the audience: Dr. Pierson, Dr. Murdock, and Dr. Gordon, Boston; Dr. Dowkontt, F. Emerson, G. Post, D. Langford, Dr. Boardman, and Dr. Chambers. The speakers contended that mission work was one of the duties of a nation, and that the country that refused to obey the Lord's command to preach the gospel to all people would certainly have to look to the morals of its own inhabitants. A high tribute was paid by Dr. Murdoch, of Boston, to the King of the Belgians for his efforts to suppress the sale of liquor in the Congo State. A committee, including Mr. Murdoch, was appointed to present an appropriate address to King Leopold. Mr. Pierson, of Philadelphia, made the concluding address. He testified to the deep impression that the Conference had made on the delegates.

The New Kaiser has Issued his Proclamation to the German people. It lacks the ring of spontaneity which characterized his addresses to the army and navy. It probably indicates the effect recent public criticisms have had upon the young monarch. He cannot fail to have noticed that while his father was admired and beloved, he himself is regarded with distrust, and his accession to the throne as a ground for apprehension. He evidently makes an effort to disarm those feelings by his proclamation. After a glowing tribute to his father's memory, he says: "Called to the throne of my fathers, I have assumed the government, looking up to the King of kings, and have vowed to God that, after the example of my fathers, I will be a just and clement prince to my people; that I will foster piety and fear of God; that I will protect peace and promote the welfare of the country, and that I will be a helper of the poor and distressed and a true guardian of the right." The Emperor appears to have mistaken his century. Feudalism is dead. Such utterances on the part of his grandfather were pardonable in an aged king who had won distinction on the battle-field; but in a youth, they indicate notions which this century has outgrown.

The Burial of Emperor Frederick III. of Germany took place June 19, with impressive ceremonies and amid signs of sincere national grief. A spectator says: "Everyone seemed as if going to the funeral of one's own father or brother. The music was exquisite, and all the arrangements were in perfect taste and simplicity. The religious services were brief and went straight to the heart." Even Von Moltke, the venerable soldier, shed tears as he looked on the coffin of his soverign. A first semi-private service was held in Friedrickskron Castle, where the Emperor died, and a more public service in Friedenskirche. The new Emperor followed with the Prince of Wales and the King of Saxony. Prince Henri, the late Emperor's second son, the Prince of Saxe Meiningen, Prince Bismarck, Von Moltke, and many other distinguished personages were in the procession. Dr Mackenzie had, at the new Emperor's request made a formal report of the case, and the autopsy which the Emperor ordered to be made in defiance of the wishes of his widowed mother fully confirmed the surgeon's statement.

The Pope's Rescript on Irish Affairs ha produced so strong an antipathy to him among the Roman Catholic Nationalists in Ireland that Archbishop Walsh has made an attempt to allay it by an interview published in the Freeman's Journal last week. The archbishop said that nothing was further from the Pope's thoughts than to put any obstacle in the way of the success of the Nationalist Cause. On the contrary, it was the Pope's firm conviction that the rescript, by condemning those points of practical working which evoked hostile criticism, would be of most decided assistance in the advancement of the programme. It may be so but at present the Nationalists appear to think that a little more of such assistance would be fatal to their cause, and they are by no means grateful for the old gentleman's attempt to help them.

An Attempt to Reform the British House o Lords is being made by Lord Salisbury. He has prepared a bill for the purpose, which on June 1 he introduced in Parliament. The measure proposes that not more than three life peers shall be appointed yearly, these to be drawn from the judges of the superior courts, rear-admirals, major-generals, ambassadors, and privy councillors, the Queen also having the power to appoint two others yearly not so qualified. The changes are of a very feeble and ineffective character, but that any measure of the kind should be endorsed by a Conservative Government, is matter for astonishment.

Disquieting News of Mr. H. M. Stanley reached this country on Friday last. The cable brought a despatch from St. Paul de Loando which reported that several deserters from Stanley's expedition have reached Camp Yambunga. They state that after traversing the Upper Aruwhimi, Stanley struck into a rough, mountainous country, covered with dense forests. The natives, who were excited by reports spread by the Arabs, disputed the passage of the expedition and there was continuous fighting. Stanley was severely wounded by an arrow. He was compelled several times to construct camps in order to repel attacks, and was obliged to use the reserve provisions that were intended for Emin Pacha. The Soudanese attached to the force had all died or disappeared. The deserters estimate that the caravan had lost one-third of its men, and they say that many of those remaining were ill, including the Europeans. Stanley was encamped when the deserters left. He was surrounded by hostiles, and was unable to send news to Emin or directly to Yambunga. Letters from Emin Pacha, dated November 2, 1887, have been received, in which he says that up to that date he had received no news of Stanley. A powerful expedition, under Major Barttelot, had gone to the relief of the explorer early in May.

The Reception into the Protestant Episcopal Church of Mgr. Bouland, the converted Roman Catholic Bishop, whose portrait and life appeared in this journal last week, took place on June 17, at Grace Church, New York. Various slanderous reports affecting his moral character were put in circulation when his conversion was announced, but Mgr. Bouland invited the most thorough investigation. Two committees were therefore appointed to sift the charges to the bottom, and both, after searching inquiries, pronounced the charges false. The convert was formally welcomed by Bishop Potter. He and the Bishop sat in the chancel during the prayers, and at their conclusion Mgr. Bouland, in the presence of two presbyters, the Rev. Dr. Miel, of Philadelphia, and the Rev. J. McD. Bottome, of Grace parish, stood before the Bishop, who delivered an allocution declaring the reception and charging him to observe the duties of his new allegiance. Mgr. Bouland declared his faith and his reasons for leaving the Catholic Church. It is expected that he will labor in Paris, France, after a brief period of rest.

A Jewish Rabbi's Blessing on a Christian church is published in a St. Louis journal. The Jewish congregation of Temple Israel, in that city, has been rebuilt recently, and, during the time that the congregation was excluded from its home, it was hospitably received in the building of the First Christian Church, where it held its services every Saturday. Its Synagogue being now completed, the Rabbi, Dr. S. H. Sonneschein, has written a letter of thanks to the Christian pastor, expressing the gratitude of the congregation for Christian hospitality. It concludes with the following patriarchal benediction: "This, your kindness, was one more of those precious links in the golden chain of mutual recognition which, under the fostering arms of true American civilization, reconciles the disciples of Moses to the disciples of Jesus. May this Godly spirit of a free fraternization abide and increase as the years roll on! May the Eternal Lord of Hosts, the God of Israel, bless your church and all your hopes and plans! 'For my brethren's sake and friends' sake, I speak peace for thee. For the sake of our God's house I solicit thy weal.' (Psalm 122: 8–9.)" Surely, among the Church's hopes which the Rabbi prays God to bless, is one that every disciple of Moses may be led to see in his writings the Messiaship of Jesus of Nazareth.

A Disappointed Wife Who Carried her wrongs to the United States Supreme Court for redress, had her case decided on the last day of the recent term. She stated that while on a visit to Portland, Oregon, ten years ago, she met a man in society, who eventually asked her to marry him. He promised to convey to her, after marriage, two blocks of property in Portland. She consented to marry him, and her mother, who at first objected to the match, also agreed to it when she heard of the promised property. They were married, but the husband postponed, on one plea and another, making the formal conveyance. Finally, after some years of married life, he persuaded his wife to make a visit to Europe, taking their daughter with her to be educated. During her absence he had dealt with the property as his own, and had in fact settled it on another woman. The wife, thereupon, filed a bill of complaint, and carried her case to the Supreme Court. She was defeated, however, the Court holding that as she had never received a written agreement, nor received the rents of the property, nor exercised any of the rights and privileges of ownership, there was no evidence of transfer. Women who are about to marry for money will doubtless take warning from this case, and see to it that the property promised to them is legally conveyed, or in some way their ownership is acknowledged. The Christian, as part of the Bride of Christ, has exceeding great and precious promises, and he can have no fear that faith will not be kept with him; but his life would be happier and more useful if he availed himself of his privileges and took up the earnest of his possession. (Eph. 1: 14.)

A Narrow Escape from Death by Suffocation occurred at Saccarappa, Me., recently. The Lewiston Journal says that a lady from Boston who was visiting that town, after spending a pleasant evening with her friends retired for the night. In her home in Boston the electric light was used, and in a fit of absent-mindedness she went to the gas burner and turned the tap, as she did that of the electric light in her own chamber at home. Of course there was in this case no brilliant arc of light, and in her abstraction she concluded that there was something wrong for the moment with the dynamo, and it would be all right presently. She therefore left the tap turned and retired to rest. Happily for her the smell of the escaping gas aroused some of the other inmates of the house and her life was saved, but it was with difficulty that she was aroused from unconsciousness. It used to be supposed that the blunder of turning on the gas without lighting was limited to persons who had not kept up with the times. It appears, however, that familiarity with the very latest triumphs of civilization is just as effectual in leading to the same blunder. It is so in religion. Among those who will be lost, the learned sceptics will stand side by side with the ignorant and vicious. (1 Cor. 3: 18-20.)

The Suicide of an Eleven-Year Old Boy has overwhelmed a family in New York with grief. The boy was exceedingly bright and intelligent. His teacher in the public school states that he made more progress than any boy in her class. He had, however, an unconquerable dislike to the study of the German language, which his father, who is a native of Germany, insisted on his learning. The boy was sent in the evenings to a German institution in the city for special instruction in the language, but early this year he absented himself and spent the evenings in play. The father supposed that he was attending regularly, and was not notified of his absense, because the teachers supposed the family had moved away. But last week a teacher met him in the street, and at once wrote to the father about his truancy. The boy felt sure he would receive a severe whipping, and one of his companions says he was in terrible distress about it. He procured some rat-poison on June 21, took it, and died the same night. If the boy could only have believed it possible that his father would forgive him, his wicked act might not have been committed. That is the awakened sinner's case, and when once he sees that through the atonement of Christ pardon is secured, despair gives place to joy. (Rom. 5: 11.)

A Verdict for a Wedding Present has Made a young couple in South Carolina happy. Some time ago, a family comprising a mother, her son and two daughters fell into extreme poverty through the death of the husband and father. Eventually, driven to their last resources, they contracted to work for a citizen of Abbeville. The laws of South Carolina are strict about the fulfilment of these contracts, and laborers under contract are held to implicit observance of them. One of the girls, however, who was very beautiful, won the affections of a prosperous young farmer of the neighborhood, and at his earnest solicitation consented to marry him. The ceremony was performed, but as the bride was still under contract, the young farmer was prosecuted for enticing her off the place. A despatch from Columbia, S. C., says, "The case was fought hotly on both sides, but the jury could not be induced to decide against the young couple, and has given them a verdict of not guilty as a wedding present." The verdict, if the despatch correctly states the case, appears to have been prompted by mercy rather than justice, as in law the bride's services were due under her contract. This is not the only case of an engagement being broken by marriage. A more serious one, which too often occurs, is that of persons who have given themselves to Christ, but when they are married becoming so absorbed in their new relation as to do nothing more in His service. This is the more inexcusable, because work in the Saviour's cause exalts and sanctifies married life. (1 Peter 3: 1 and 7).

A Living Necklace Around the Throat of a lady nearly caused her death last week. A telegram from Seymour, Ind., to the New York Herald states that the principal of the public school in that town heard screams from the children in the playground during recess. She ran out to learn what the trouble was, and was horrified to see a black racer snake, four feet in length, in possession of the yard. Quick as thought the snake turned upon her, ran up her back, and twisted itself around her neck so tightly that she was almost strangled. She was unable to cry out, but the children screamed lustily and their cries were heard by a man who was passing. He responded promptly, and succeeded in killing the snake before it seriously injured the lady. The nervous shock, however, has prostrated her, and she has been unable to attend to her duties since. Though the bite of this variety of snake is said to be harmless, its attacks are so treacherously made, and the strength of its coil is so great, that the victims cannot liberate themselves. It is so with the treacherous attacks of man's great enemy, that old serpent, the devil. The only sure way of escape is in the help of Christ, who has overcome him by Almighty power. (Heb. 2: 14, 15.)

BRIEF NOTES.

A contemporary states that Mrs. Hastings, a missionary in Ceylon, is a sister of President Cleveland.

Thirty thousand rupees (about $15,000) have been promised by American Young Men's Christian Associations toward establishing a Young Men's Christian Association in each university town in India.

The Rev. A. B. Simpson, of the Gospel Tabernacle Church, New York, announces that the annual summer convention and school will be held at Old Orchard Beach, Me., from August 10 to 20, 1888.

Inquiries as to the formation of clubs of King's Daughters, which are doing so much good in connnection with the Evangelical churches, should be sent to Mrs. B. Whitman, Lawrence Avenue, Dorchester, Mass.

Pundita Ramabai joined the King's Daughters during her stay in this country. Ramabai goes to her Indian home ready to extend the welcome to her sisters there. She takes with her the silver cross for her daughter, and hopes to form a "ten" immediately on her return.

Dr. Geo. F. Pentecost's series of meetings in Atlanta, Ga., were chiefly directed to revival work in the strict acceptation of the term, namely, to members of churches; the meetings were large, and many of all denominations attended, though the union meetings were not held.

A series of evangelistic meetings for young men has been commenced in Association Hall, Fourth Avenue and Twenty-third Street, New York, and will continue for one month. They are under the leadership of J. W. Dean, the former Secretary of the Association of Iowa.

Rev. Jacob Freshman recently visited Toronto, and was warmly welcomed by his large circle of friends. He preached in the morning (June 3) in St. James Square Church (of which Dr. Kellogg is pastor), and in the evening in Elm Street Methodist Church. The encouragement he received, both there and in Montreal, leads him to believe that he will be able to locate a missionary to the Jews in each city.

The services conducted by Messrs. Crossley and Hunter, St. Thomas, Ontario, have been the means of a wonderful revival, extending for many miles around. Men and women came from long distances to attend the meetings, and going home with a blessing, told their neighbors, who came too. The evangelists took the names of more than nine hundred persons during the month who were anxiously seeking salvation.

Mr. "Ben" Hogan, well known throughout the United States as a converted prize-fighter, is now holding services in Mr. and Mrs. Naylor's Berachah Mission, in West Thirty-second Street, New York. He has recently made a successful evangelistic tour on the Pacific Coast. In Oregon, Washington Territory, California, Montana, Utah, New Mexico, and in fact nearly every State and Territory in the Far West, he has held meetings which God has blessed to the conversion of some notoriously immoral characters.

THE SLUGGARD'S FARM.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"I went by the field of the slothful, and by the vineyard of the man void of understanding; and, lo, it was all grown over with thorns, and nettles had covered the face thereof, and the stone wall thereof was broken down. Then I saw, and considered it well: I looked upon it, and received instruction."—Proverbs 24: 30-32.

A Wise Man Learning—Weeds as Teachers—I. A Definition of a Lazy Man—Not His Own Opinion—Antinomian Sluggards—Cultured Uselessness—The Sluggard's Neglected Opportunities—His Interests Trifled With—His Loss Incalculable—Reflections Upon Christ—II. His Land—Producing Weeds—Sure to Produce Something—The Soul's Natural Produce—The Thorns in the Sluggish Christian's Heart—In his Home—In the World—III. The Lesson of the Land.

No doubt Solomon was sometimes glad to lay aside the robes of state, escape from the forms of court, and go through the country unknown. On one occasion, when he was doing so, he looked over the broken wall of a little estate which belonged to a farmer of his country. This estate consisted of a piece of ploughed land and a vineyard. One glance showed him that it was owned by a sluggard, who neglected it; for the weeds had grown right plentifully, and covered all the face of the ground. From this, Solomon gathered instruction. Men generally learn wisdom if they have wisdom. The artist's eye sees the beauty of the landscape because he has beauty in his mind. "To him that hath shall be given," and he shall have abundance; for he shall reap a harvest even from a field that is covered with thorns and nettles.

We may find instruction everywhere. To a spiritual mind nettles have their use, and Weeds have Their Doctrine.

Are not all thorns and thistles meant to be teachers to sinful men? Are they not brought forth of the earth on purpose that they may show us what sin has done, and the kind of produce that will come when we sow the seed of rebellion against God? "I went by the field of the slothful, and by the vineyard of the man void of understanding," says Solomon; "I saw, and considered it well: I looked upon it, and received instruction."

1. First, think of Solomon's description of a slothful man. Solomon was a man whom none of us would contradict, for he knew as much as all of us put together; and besides that, he was under divine inspiration when he wrote this Book of Proverbs. Solomon says a sluggard is

"A Man Void of Understanding."

The slothful man does not think so; he puts his hands in his pockets, and you would think from his important air that he had all the Bank of England at his disposal. You can see that he is a very wise man in his own esteem, for he gives himself airs which are meant to impress you with a sense of his superior abilities. The proverb is not complimentary to him, but I am certain that Solomon was right when he called him "a man void of understanding." Solomon was rather rude, according to the dainty manners of the present times, because this gentleman had a field and a vineyard, and as Poor Richard saith, "When I have a horse and a cow every man biddeth me good morrow." How can a man be void of understanding who has a field and a vineyard? Is it not generally understood that you must measure a man's understanding by the amount of

His Ready Cash?

At all events, you shall soon be flattered for your attainments if you have attained unto wealth. Such is the way of the world, but such is not the way of Scripture. Whether he has a field and a vineyard or not, says Solomon, if he is a sluggard he is a fool, or if you would like to see his name written out a little larger, he is a man empty of understanding. Not only does he not understand anything, but he has no understanding to understand with.

I am glad to be told by Solomon so plainly that a slothful man is void of understanding, for it is useful information. I have met with persons who thought they perfectly understood the doctrines of grace, who could accurately set forth the election of the saints, the predestination of God, the firmness of the divine decree, the necessity of the Spirit's work, and all the glorious doctrines of grace which build up the fabric of our faith; but these gentlemen have inferred from these doctrines that they have to do nothing, and thus they have become sluggards. Do-nothingism is

Their Creed.

They will not urge other people to labor for the Lord, because, say they, "God will do His own work. Salvation is all of grace!" The notion of these sluggards is that a man is to wait, and do nothing; he is to sit still, and let the grass grow up to his ancles in the hope of heavenly help. How shall we survive the censures of this dogmatic person? How shall we escape from this very knowing and very captious sluggard? Solomon hastens to the rescue and extinguishes this gentleman by informing us that he is void of understanding. The sluggard, whether he is sluggish about his business or about his soul, is "a man void of understanding."

As a rule, we may measure a man's understanding by his useful activities; that is what the wise man very plainly tells us. Certain persons call themselves "cultured," and yet they cultivate nothing. True wisdom is practical: boastful culture vapors and theorizes. Wisdom ploughs its field, wisdom hoes its vineyard, wisdom tries to make the best of everything; and he who does not do so, whatever may be his knowledge of this, of that, or of the other, is "a man void of understanding." Why is he void of understanding? Is it not because he has opportunities which he does not use? His day has come, his day is going, and he lets the hours glide by to no purpose. Let me not press too hardly upon anyone, but let me ask you all to press as hardly as you can upon yourselves while you inquire each one of himself—Am I employing the minutes as they fly? This man had a vineyard, but he did not cultivate it; he had a field, but he did not till it. Do you, brethren, use all your opportunities? I know we each one have some power to serve God; do we use it? If we are His children He has not put one of us where we are of necessity useless.

You are not asked to do in the service of God that which is utterly beyond you, for it is expected of us according to what we have, and not according to what we have not. The man of two talents is not required to bring in the interest of five, but he is expected to bring in the interest of two. Solomon's slothful man was too idle to attempt tasks which were quite within his power. Many have a number of dormant faculties of which they are scarcely aware, and many more have abilities which they are using for themselves, and not for Him who created them. Dear friends, if God has given us power to do good, pray let us do it, for this is

A Wicked, Weary World.

As for a sluggard in soul matters, he is indeed void of understanding, for he trifles with matters which demand his most earnest heed. Man, hast thou never cultivated thy heart? Has the ploughshare never broken up the clods of thy soul? Has the seed of the Word never been sown in thee? or has it, taken no root? Hast thou never watered the young plants of desire? Hast thou never sought to pull up the weeds of sin that grow in thy heart? Art thou still a piece of the bare common or wild heath? Poor soul! Thou canst trim thy body, and spend many a minute at the glass; dost thou not care for thy soul? You take care of the worse part, and leave the better to perish through neglect. This is the height of folly! He that is a sluggard as to the vineyard of his heart, is "a man void of understanding." If I must be idle, let it be seen in my garden, but not in my soul.

Or are you a Christian? Are you really saved, and are you negligent in the Lord's work? Then, indeed, whatever you may be, I cannot help saying you have too little understanding; for surely, when a man is saved himself, and understands the danger of other men's souls, he must be in earnest in trying to pluck the firebrands from the flame.

A Christian Sluggard!

Is there such a being? A Christian man on hal time? A Christian man working not at all fo his Lord; how shall I speak of him? Surely w must be void of understanding if, after bein saved by the infinite love of God, we do nc spend and be spent in His service. The eterna fitness of things demands that a saved ma should be an earnest man.

The Christian who is slothful in his Master service has no idea what he is losing; for th very cream of religion lies in holy consecratio to God. Some people have just enough relig ion to make it questionable whether they hav any or not. They have enough godliness t make them uneasy in their ungodliness. Th have washed enough of their face to show the du upon the rest of it. "I am glad," said a servan "that my mistress takes the sacrament, fc otherwise I should not know she had any reli ion at all." You smile, and well you may. wish some professors would do Christ the ju tice to say, "No, I am not one of His disciple do not think so badly of Him as to imagine th I can be one of them." We ought to be refle tions of Christ; but I fear many are reflectio upon Christ. When we see a lot of lazy servant we are apt to think that their master must be very idle person himself, or he would never pu up with them. Oh, let not the world think th Christ is indifferent to human woe, that Chri has lost His zeal, that Christ has lost His ene gy! yet I fear they will say it, or think it, if th see those who profess to be laborers in the vin yard of Christ, nothing better that mere sluggard

II. Now, secondly, let us look at the slu gard's land: "I went by the field of the slot ful, and by the vineyard of the man void of u derstanding; and, lo, it was all grown over wi thorns, and nettles had covered the face ther of." Note, first, that land will produce son thing. Soil which is good enough to be ma into a field and a vineyard must and will yie some fruit or other; and so you and I, in o hearts, and in the sphere God gives us to occ py, will be Sure to Produce Something.

We cannot live in this world as entire blank we shall either do good or do evil, as sure as are alive. If you are idle in Christ's work, y are active in the devil's work. The sluggard sleeping was doing more for the cultivation thorns and nettles than he could have done any other means. If it be not farmed for Gc the soul will yield its natural produce; a what is the natural produce of land if left to self? What but thorns and nettles, or sor other useless weeds? What is the natu produce of your heart and mine? What b sin and misery? What is the natural produ of your children if you leave them untrained God? What but unholiness and vice? Wh is the natural produce of this great city if leave its streets and lanes and alleys withc the gospel? What but crime and infamy? So harvest there will be, and the sheaves will the natural produce of the soil, which is s death, and corruption.

In many instances there will be a great d of this evil produce; for a field and a vineyz will yield more thistles and nettles than a pie of ground that has not been reclaimed. Negl is all that is needed to produce evil. If you sire to bring forth a harvest unto God, I n need long to instruct you in ploughing, sowi and watering; but if you wish your mind to covered with Satan's hemlock, you have o to leave the furrows of nature to themselves

While we look upon the lazy man's vineya let us also peep into the ungodly sluggar heart. He does not care about repentance a faith. To think about his soul, to be in earn about eternity, is too much for him. He wa to take things easy, and have a little more fo

ing of the arms to sleep. What is growing in his mind and character? In some of the spiritual sluggards you can see drunkenness, uncleanness, covetousness, anger, and pride, and all sorts of thistles and nettles; or where these ranker weeds do not appear, by reason of the restraint of pious connections, you find other sorts of sin. The heart cannot be altogether empty; either Christ or the devil will possess it.

Friend, if you believe in Christ, I want to peep over the hedge into your heart also, if you are a sluggish Christian; for I fear that nettles and thistles are threatening you also. Some have sadly morbid forebodings; they are discontented, fretful, selfish, murmuring, and all because they are idle. There are n sluggards' gardens. I have known the slothful become so peevish that nothing could please them; the most earnest Christian could not do right for them; the most loving Christian could not be affectionate enough; the most active church could not be energetic enough; they detected all sorts of wrong where God Himself saw much of the fruit of His Spirit. This censoriousness is one of the nettles that are quite sure to grow in men's gardens when they fold their arms in sinful ease. If your heart does not yield fruit to God it will certainly bring forth that which is mischievous in itself, painful to you, and injurious to your fellow-men.

May I next ask you to look into your own house and home? It is a dreadful thing when a man does not cultivate the field of his own family. What is the use of zeal abroad if there is neglect at home? How sad to say, "My own vineyard have I not kept!" Have you never heard of one who said he did not teach his children the ways of God, because he thought they were so young that it was very wrong to prejudice them, and he had rather leave them to choose their own religion

When They Grow Older?

One of his boys broke his arm, and while the surgeon was setting it the boy was swearing all the time. "Ah!" said the good doctor, "I told you what would happen. You were afraid to prejudice your boy in the right way, but the devil had no such qualms; he has prejudiced him the other way, and pretty strongly too." It is our duty to prejudice our field in favor of corn, or it will soon be covered with thistles. Cultivate a child's heart for good, or it will go wrong of itself, for it is already depraved by nature.

As it is with homes, so it is with schools. You Sunday-school teachers can make your classes so tiresome to the children that they will hate Sunday. You can fritter away time in school without bringing the lads and lasses to Christ, and so you may do more hurt than good. I have known Christian fathers who by their severity and want of tenderness have sown their family field with the thorns and thistles of hatred to religion, instead of scattering the good seed of love in it. Oh, that we may so live among our children that they may not only love us, but love our Father who is in heaven! May fathers and mothers set such an example of cheerful piety that sons and daughters shall say, "Let us tread in our father's footsteps, for he was a happy and a holy man. Let us follow our mother's ways, for she was sweetness itself."

I beg you once more to look at

The Great Field of the World.

Do you see how it is overgrown with thorns and nettles? If an angel could take a survey of the whole race, what tears he would shed, if angels could weep! What a tangled mass of weeds the whole earth is! Yonder the field is scarlet with the poppy of popery, and over the hedge it is yellow with the wild mustard of Mahometanism. Vast regions are smothered with the thistles of infidelity and idolatry. The world is full of cruelty, oppression, drunkenness, rebellion, uncleanness, misery. What the moon sees! What God's sun sees! What scenes of horror! How far is all this to be attributed to a neglectful church? Nearly nineteen hundred years are gone, and the sluggard's vineyard is but little improved! What has the church been doing all these years? She ceased after a few centuries to be a missionary church, and from that hour she almost ceased to be a living church.

However, instead of asking what the church has been doing for these nineteen hundred years, let us ask ourselves what are we going to do now? Are the missions of the churches always to be such poor, feeble things as they are? Are the best of our Christian young men always going to stay at home? We go on ploughing the home field a hundred times over, while millions of acres abroad are left to the thorn and the nettle. Shall it always be so? God send us more spiritual life, and wake us up from our sluggishness, or else when the holy watcher gives in his report he will say, "I went by the field of the sluggish church, and it was all grown over with thorns and nettles, and the stone wall was broken down, so that one could scarcely tell which was the church and which was the world; yet still she slept, and slept, and slept, and nothing could waken her."

III. I conclude by remarking that there must be some lesson in all this. I cannot teach it as I would, but I want to learn it myself. I will speak it as though I were talking to myself. The first lesson is, that always will produce thorns and nettles, and nothing else. My soul, if it were not for grace, this is all thou wouldst have produced. Beloved, are you producing anything else? Then it is not nature, but the grace of God that makes you produce it. Those lips that now most charmingly sing the praises of God would have been delighted with an idle ballad if the grace of God had not sanctified them. Your heart, that now cleaves to Christ, would have continued to cling to your idols—you know what they were—if it had not been for grace divine. And why should grace have visited you or me—why? Echo answers, why? What answer can we give? "'Tis even so, Father, for so it seemed good in Thy sight." Let the recollection of what grace has done move us to manifest the result of that grace in our lives.

We see here, next, the little value of natural good intentions; for this man, who left his field and vineyard to be overgrown, always meant to work hard one of these fine days. To do him justice, we must admit that he did not mean to sleep much longer, for he said—"Yet a little sleep, a little slumber, a little folding of the hands to sleep."

Only a Little Doze,

and then tuck up his sleeves and show his muscle. Probably the worst people in the world are those who have the best intentions, but never carry them out. In that way Satan lulls many to sleep. They hear an earnest sermon; but they do not arise and go to their Father; they only get as far as saying: "Yes, yes, the far country is not a fit place for me; I will not stay here long. I mean to go home by-and-by." They said that forty years ago, but nothing came of it. When they were quite youths they had serious impressions, they were almost persuaded to be Christians, and yet they are not Christians even now. They have been slumbering forty years! Surely that is a liberal share of sleep! They never intended to dream so long, and now they do not mean to lie in bed much longer. They will not turn to Christ at once, but they are resolved to do so one day. When are you going to do it, friend? "Before I die." Going to put it off to the last hour or two, are you? And so, when unconscious, and drugged to relieve your pain, you will begin to think of your soul? Is this wise? Surely you are "void of understanding."

"Surely you do not object to my having a little more sleep?" says the sluggard. "You have waked me to soon. I only ask another little nap." "My dear man, it is far into the morning." He answers, "It is rather late, I know; but it will not be much later if I take just another doze." You wake him again, and tell him it is noon. He says, "It is the hottest part of the day: I dare say if I had been up I should have gone to the sofa and taken a little rest from the hot sun." You knock at his door when it is almost evening, and then he cries, "It is of no use to get up now, for the day is almost over." To-morrow is only to be found in the calendar of fools; to-day is the time of the wise man, the chosen season of our gracious God. Oh that the Holy Spirit may lead you to seize the present hour, that you may at once give yourselves to the Lord by faith in Christ Jesus, and then from His vineyard—

"Quick uproot
The noisome weeds that without profit suck
The soil's fertility from wholesome plants"!

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

A NEEDLEWOMAN'S GIFT.*

ORGANIZATIONS of women for the relief of sick and wounded soldiers, and for the care of soldiers' families, were formed with great spontaneity at the very beginning of the war. There were a dozen or more of them in Chicago in less than a month after Cairo was occupied by Northern troops. They raised money, prepared and forwarded supplies of whatever was demanded, every shipment being accompanied by some one who was held responsible for the proper disbursement of the stores. Sometimes these local societies affiliated with, or became parts of, more comprehensive organizations.

A poor girl, who called herself a "tailoress," came one day to the rooms of the Commission.

"I do not feel right," she said, "that I am doing nothing for our soldiers in the hospitals. I must do something immediately. Which do you prefer—that I should give money, or buy material and manufacture it into hospital clothing?"

"You must be governed by your circumstances," was the answer made her. "We need both money and supplies, and you must do that which is most convenient for you."

"I prefer to give money, if it will do as much good."

"Very well, then give money. We need it badly, and without it cannot do what is most necessary for our brave men."

"I will give the Commission my net earnings for the next two weeks. I would give more, but my mother is an invalid, and I help support her. Usually I make but one vest a day, as I do 'custom work,' and am well paid for it. But these next two weeks, which belong to the soldiers, I shall work earlier and later."

In two weeks she came again, the poor sewing-girl, with a radiant face. Opening her portemonnaie, she counted out nineteen dollars and seven cents. She had stitched into the hours of midnight on every one of the working days of those two weeks.

A Five-Dollar Gold Piece.

A little girl, not nine years old, with sweet and timid grace, entered one afternoon, and laid a five-dollar gold piece on my desk. Half frightened, she told its story. "My uncle gave me that before the war, and I was going to keep it always; but he's got killed in the army, and now mother says I may give it to the soldiers, if I want to—and I'd like to. Will it buy much for them?"

I led the child into the storeroom, and pointed out to her how much it would buy—so many cans of condensed milk, or so many bottles of ale, or so many pounds of tea or codfish, etc. Her face brightened with pleasure; but when I explained that her five-dollar gold piece was equal then to seven and a half dollars in greenbacks, and told her how much comfort could be carried into a hospital with the amount of stores it would purchase, she fairly danced for joy. "Why, my five dollars will do lots of good, won't it?"

"Matches! matches!" had stood a little apart, watching the girl, and listening to the conversation. As she disappeared, he fumbled in his pockets and drew out a small handful of crumpled fractional currency, such as was then in use. "Here," said he, "I'll give yer suthin' for them sick fellers!" and he put fifty-five cents in my hand, all in five-cent currency. I was surprised, and hesitated.

"No, my boy, don't give it; I'm afraid you cannot afford it. You're a noble little fellow; but that is more than you ought to give; you keep it, and I'll give fifty-five cents for you—or somebody else will." "Git eaut," was his disgusted commentary on my proposal; "yer take it, now; p'haps I ain't so poor as yer think, My father, he saws wood, an' my mother, she takes in washin', an' I sells matches, an' Tom, he sells paper, an' p'haps we've got more money than yer think. Our Bob, he'd gone to the war hisself, but he got his leg cut off on the railroad, in a smash-up. He was a brakeman, yer see. Yer take this, now."

I took the crumpled currency. I forgot the boy's dirty face and tattered cap; I forgot that I had called the little tatterdemalion a "nuisance" every day, for months, when he had caused me to jump from my seat with his shrill, unexpected cry of "Matches!" and I actually stooped down to kiss him.

He divined my intention, and darted out on the sidewalk, as if he had been shot.

"No yer don't!" he said, shaking his tangled head at me, and looking as if he had escaped a great danger. "I ain't one o' the kissin' sort!"

Ever after, when he met me, he gave me a wide berth, and walked off the sidewalk into the gutter, eyeing me with a suspicious, sidelong glance, as though he suspected I still thought of kissing him. If I spoke to him he made no reply; but if I passed him without speaking, he challenged me with a hearty "Hullo, yer!" That brought me to an instant halt.

THE HEROIC WALDENSES.

(See Illustration.)

THE European religious press is chronicling the earnest, consecrated effort now being made by the Waldenses to evangelize the city of Rome. There is a deep significance in this movement, to every student of history, for it is a striking evidence of the extent to which the teaching of the Saviour has permeated the hearts of this wonderful people. They are now rendering to Rome the highest service in returning the grandest good for the bitterest evil.

The Waldenses were among the earliest sufferers for the gospel in Europe when the fierce rage of papal persecution burst upon those who would not acknowledge the supremacy of the Pope, and chief among the foremost of the earnest propagandists of the pure religion of Christ. The illustration on this page represents a preaching service among their native rocks and valleys when they were denied the privilege of meeting in a sanctury, under threat of imprisonment and death.

The country of Waldensia, which thus became a cradle for the truth, is but twenty miles in length, and some eighteen broad. It is situated among the mountains between France and Italy, in the valleys called Lucerna, San Martino, and Perosa, the streams of which ultimately gather themselves into the river Po. The sufferings of this venerable Church are written in blood. On the way to La Tour, the little capital of the Waldensian valleys, as their wooded mountains rise to view, the traveller approaches "consecrated ground." "Almost every rock is a monument, and every meadow witnessed executions, and every village had its roll of martyrs." They recount thirty-six distinct persecutions, some designed actually to exterminate them from the face of the earth.

Every visitor to La Tour must be struck by the picturesque rock that rises behind the little town. This is the Monte Castelluzzo, with the Waldensian temple in the foreground. We look on it as on the old tower in Paris, where the bell hung that signalled the massacre of St. Bartholomew. Their valleys have had many "St. Bartholomews," and it was from Castelluzzo that, on April 27, 1655, the signal was given to execute the orders of Christina, regent of Savoy, who, acting for her son Charles Emanual II., and under her holy father the Pope, sent 15,000 soldiers to massacre every Protestant the valleys contained. "Children," says Leger, an eye-witness, "torn from their mothers' breasts, were seized by the feet and dashed in pieces against the rocks or walls, while their tender bodies were cast on the common heaps. The sick, the aged, both men and women, were either burnt in their houses or literally cut in pieces, or were rolled over the rocks."

It is the descendants of those martyrs wh are now carrying to Rome the precious news o salvation through Christ alone.

"ROSA, Rosa, here is a letter from papa, cried two childish voices at the foot of the parsonage stairs. A tall, slender girl came quickl from her room, and hurried down to join he brother and sister in the breakfast-room.

Rosa Erndale was mother and sister, both, t the two children, who were respectively seve and nine years her junior. The natura mother of the family had been dead now fiv years, and Rosa had done her utmost to fill he place to her father and little Effie and Herbert in fulfilment of the promise she gave to he mother when she was dying. It had been severe trial to the girl, for Mr. Erndale wa overwhelmed with grief at his wife's death, an he did not conceal from Rosa how far she wa from performing her mother's duties with he mother's skill. Yet she had not been unsuccessful. Kind friends in her father's church gav her advice and help; she was diligent an thoughtful; and after the first year of be reavement, the parsonage was as well manage as under the reign of its dead mistress. Sh won the affection of the two children, wh obeyed her cheerfully, and she had the satisfac tion of seeing that her father less and less fr quently compared her management to her di advantage with that of his dead wife.

Mr. Erndale was absent now on his annu vacation, an opportunity that Rosa had seize for a thorough house-cleaning and general renc vation. The last touches were put to it nov and if, as was probable, the letter in the hand of the children announced her father's almos immediate return, Rosa would be ready for hin every carpet down, the furniture again in i place, and the new paint all dry and odorles

The letter was a long one, which was contrar to Mr. Erndale's habit. Rosa sat down to rea it while breakfast waited, and the two childre climbed on the back of her chair to read over her shoulder. But suddenly she crushe the paper between her hands and rose to he feet. The weight of the two children was to much for the chair after Rosa's weight was o it, and they went backward with it with a crash They had to be comforted, their bruised heac ibbed, and the tears dried first of l, and then Rosa insisted on breakst before any further attention was ven to the letter.

"What for you crying, Rosa?" ked little Herbert, presently. "You dn't hurt your head."

"And you have not eaten a morsel, osa," put in Effie. "What is in ıpa's letter; is not he well?"

Oh, yes, papa is well, and he is ›ming home soon. I will tell you l about it by and bye."

"Tell us what makes you cry, osa?" persisted the boy.

"Yes, yes, I will tell you all about presently. I have not read all ıpa's letter yet."

As soon as the meal was finishe osa sought her own room, and ıere, in quiet and with many tears, ıe read the paternal epistle through. r. Erndale, with some circumlocu›n, informed his daughter that he ›ntemplated marrying again. In ct, he had already proposed and ›en accepted by a lady of suitable ge. Finally he told his daughter the ıme of the lady, a member of his vn church, and one to whom, as he as aware, Rosa did not entertain ıe kindliest feelings. In fact, Rosa ıd been subjected to her criticism, ıd she had at last been goaded into timating to her, politely and delitely, but explicitly, that she pro›sed managing the domestic affairs the parsonage without outside terference. This rebuff had not ›en pleasant for either party; and osa's aversion had been increased the suspicion that the lady pired to succeed her dear mother. r. Erndale probably understood mething of the trouble, for he ›ok pains, in many words, to culcate on his daughter her duty the new circumstances.

"If she would only make him happy," moaned ›or Rosa, as she read the letter, "I should not ind. But I am sure he will be miserable. Why, ıe will want to write his sermons, I believe; ıe will want to manage everything. And the ıildren! Oh, my poor children! If it were ›t for them I could go away; but I cannot de›rt them."

She sat and wept for some time, but at length ıe rose and wandered disconsolately through e house. She went into her father's study, ıd there a fresh burst of weeping overcame ›r, for standing by the minister's desk in the ace it had occupied ever since the bereave›ent was her mother's portrait. The gentle, ving face in the picture seemed now to have ken on an expression of reproach or of mute otest against what seemed to Rosa a profana›n; but it also reminded her of her mother's vice, which in this bitter sorrow she had for›tten, to go to God for help in trouble. She se and opened the minister's Bible, which was ng on his desk. The first words that met her e were, "If any man will come after Me, let m deny himself and take up his cross and fol› Me." (Matt. 16: 24.) Rosa did not need y one to make the application for her. She w ner duty, and she knelt down and asked ›d to give her strength to do it.

When she rose from her knees her heart was ›htened of its heavy load. The children were tonished, when she told them the unwelcome ›ws, that Rosa was not angry about it, so ıeerfully did she speak and so calmly did she › about her ordinary duties. But the sweetest y she had came from a friendly visitor who id, "Why, child, how like your mother you e growing! You have just her sweet spiritual ›pression. I never noticed it before to-day."

Rosa's cross proved a heavy one; but so conıually did she go to God for strength, and so constantly was it given to her, as it is to all who ask in faith, that she was enabled to bear it with joy until it was graciously removed.

Rosa Learns How to Bear Her Cross.

THE EPOCHS OF A LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. L. S. Keyser.

A Meeting in the Woods.

THE lady in whose house the young men had taken lodgings was an old resident of the town, and as it was evident that the strange girl in question was also a resident of the place, they concluded that their hostess might be able to give them information concerning her. Before the day was passed, the woman was adroitly catechised and some interesting information was elicited. The young lady's name was Belle Havelock. She was the daughter of one of the prominent bankers of the town, a man who had accumulated considerable wealth, and who, as they knew, took a great interest in the college. They were already aware of the last fact, but had never taken the trouble to ascertain where Mr. Havelock lived.

Belle, his only daughter, was a young lady of versatile talents, and the reason the young men had never met her was because she had been attending a young ladies' seminary in the State of New York, for a number of years, and, of course, while she was at home during the summer vacations, they were absent from town enjoying their rest from college work. However, she had graduated from the seminary in the previous June, and had now come home to stay. All who knew her admitted that she was a bright, clever girl, although her naturally haughty mien had made her slightly unpopular among the young women of the town.

"I took her to be a rather unique girl," remarked Hadley, when they had gained this cue to her character. "I am determined to secure an introduction to her and cultivate her acquaintance."

"You can do as you like," replied George, "but as for me, I believe that I shall steer my frail bark clear of this remarkable female. I am a little afraid of her."

"Pooh! you are a timid youth, destined to die an old bachelor. Be careful that you don't turn into a paleozoic fossil. We have been living like a couple of anchorites since we have been in college, and have neglected the amenities of social life. Yes, I am persuaded that we have, and so I propose to allow myself some of the pleasures of society, even if you do carry off the honors of the class. A little brightening up in our manners wouldn't come amiss if we intend to become public reformers, and would free us from the charge of boorishness."

"And get us into a labyrinth of trouble, without an Ariadne's thread to help us out," said George. "However, if you have a mind to start out on a 'flirting' expedition, I shall not object; only don't hold me responsible for the consequences."

"Ah, you are too cowardly for your own good," declared Hadley, with an impatient gesticulation. "No good of that kind is ever gained except at some risk. Every young fellow must have his love-troubles sooner or later. I believe that I shall choose to have mine sooner."

Hadley was bent on obtaining an introduction to Miss Havelock as soon as possible. But he did not find it so easy to compass his wish as he supposed it would be; for she had been away from town so many years that she was a stranger to nearly all the students of the college, and Hadley was unable to make her acquaintance for several weeks. In the meantime he had seen her several times at one of the churches of the town, and observed that she listened to the sermons with ill-concealed impatience, a shadow of disgust passing over her features when the divine claims of Christianity were presented. She was obviously not a Christian. Perhaps she was an unbeliever. Somehow, bitter as he was against religion himself, the thought that this girl might be animated by like sentiments did not please Hadley. He would have thought better of her if she had been more devout, and less hostile.

"It is impossible for me to stay indoors on a day like this," said Hadley, early one Saturday morning. "I am going out on an ornithological jaunt. Your company will be acceptable, Dane, if you have a mind to go with me."

"I cannot go to-day," George answered. "I have promised to speak next Saturday morning, and this will be my only opportunity to prepare. I know I cannot do any great things, but I must do the best I can. I am going to get a few facts together and arrange them in order. If it were not for that I should enjoy an excursion immensely."

"Then I must go alone, for I feel the outdoor mood coming on. Hark! I can hear the birds trilling in the groves yonder, 'calling me away, calling me away,'" said Hadley, humming the last words of a familiar chorus.

And seizing his hat, and putting a small blank-book with a pencil-case into his pocket, he was off to the woods. He wandered east the town for several miles, exploring the hedges, forests, meadows, and deep rocky valleys with their rippling streams, in search of feathered songsters. True, there was not the abundance of woodland music that characterizes the season of spring, but on the whole, he was amply repaid for his efforts.

In the afternoon he took a circuitous course homeward, continuing his observations. By the time he reached the woods into which he had first entered, half a mile from town, he had taken a large number of notes on "bird-ways," and had almost decided to go to his study without delay. At that moment his mind was suddenly changed by the whistle of a cardinal-grossbeak in a dense thicket near the edge of the woods, on a rocky slope. His faculties were instantly on the alert, as is always the case with a bird-lover when his ears are greeted by a song from the throat of a feathered favorite.

He stole slyly to the edge of the copse, so as not to disturb the cardinal-plumed piper, and then, quietly pushing aside the bushes, he peered into the thicket, determined to gain a sight of the bird and watch him in his singing attitudes. After considerable effort, and at the cost of a few scratches from the sharp briers, he pressed his way into the midst of the underbrush, and at last descried the cardinal bird-form perched on a twig, and at intervals piping his lively tune. It was a beautiful specimen.

Presently the crested vocalist shifted his position, and Hadley in pursuit pushed his way through the thicket almost to the other side. While he was peering sharply in every direction to catch another view of the bird, he stopped suddenly in embarrassed surprise; for as he glanced toward a small opening among the bushes, his sharp sight detected a pair of blue eyes peering at him with curious interest, while a laughing face was photographed in the aperture. He started up in astonishment, and as he did so his hat was caught by some "pesky" briers and lifted from his head, while a thorny branch came into uncomfortable proximity with his scalp. It was an embarrassing situation, making him conscious of a flow of blood along the arteries of his face, giving it the hue of the cardinal-bird which he had just been watching.

Who was the owner of that pair of blue eyes? Were they the property of a male or female spy? He would investigate. Obeying the first impulse that seized him, he scrambled through the tangled mass of bushes and briers, to the edge of the thicket, determined to solve the mystery of the blue orbs that had been watching him.

What was his consternation when he came out into the clear space to find himself face to face with a young lady, and to make the situation more perplexing, his first glance at her face told him that she was the girl in whom he was interested and whose name he had learned was Belle Havelock!

The young man was disconcerted. He had made his exit from the underbrush in an impetuous style and rather the worse for contact with the briers, only a few paces from the spot where the girl was standing; and he stood looking at her in a dazed and helpless way. He was ashamed to beat an unceremonious retreat. It would have been the quintessence of ludicrousness to turn his back on the young lady and walk away without a word. Evidently she was sharing his embarrassment to some extent, as was indicated by the rosy color that mounted to her cheeks. To Hadley's unspeakable relief, her lips parted and she burst into a ringing, merry laugh. The droll nature of the situation and the girl's ebullition touched Hadley's sense of the ridiculous, and he joined spontaneously in the merriment. There was no other alternative but to speak. The girl obviously felt that an apolgy was due the young man for watching him.

"Mr. Madelling," she said, with a slight courtesy.

Hadley lifted his hat and bowed to her, as he said: "I believe I have the pleasure of making the acquaintance of Miss Havelock."

"Ah! you know me, I suppose, as I know you," she said, with a smile. "You will wonder how I learned your name. Well, 'an honest confession is good'—you know the rest. I saw you on your way to college several times and noticed you in church, and I had the curiosity to inquire what your name was. You perhaps ascertained mine in the same way."

"I plead guilty," he answered, "though I hope neither of us is so finical as to think it a very grave offence."

"Oh, no, there is no need of being so conventional," laughed Miss Havelock. "But I do owe you an apology for watching you just now. You will think me a veritable Paul Pry. But it came about in this wise. You see, I am troubled, like yourself, with an occasional outdoor furor, and that is what brought me out here to-day. While I was sitting under the trees reading, I heard the whistle of the cardinal-bird in the thicket, and I was seized with a desire to reconnoitre. As I was peering about, for the bird, I heard a crackling in the bushes, and begun to wonder if I had been tracked by a bear. I waited, however, and saw you."

"Ah! well I was a less alarming sight, I trust. At all events you will not be afraid of my making a meal of you."

"No, not exactly that, though from something I heard of you the other day, I should fancy you must have some of the bear element in your nature."

"I suppose all men have a little of it; I think I know what you refer to, and if you have heard the whole story you must be aware that I had severe provocation."

"Oh! do not apologize to me, Mr. Madelling; I assure you I was not hurt. Your antagonist is able to take care of himself, I have no doubt. Believers are generally ready for fight against unbelievers, though they do not always win. I have just been watching an encounter with a good deal of interest" and she held up a volume of Huxley's Essays which she had been reading.

They were standing by a shady bank, and at Hadley's suggestion they seated themselves and he took the book from her hand.

"Rather an abstruse companion for a summer day in the woods, is it not, Miss Havelock? he said. "I should have expected if I met a young lady out here, to find a novel in her hands, if she had a book at all."

"I do not read much fiction," she replied. "Once in a while I read a novel when I hear it strongly recommended, and when I am in a special mood for it."

"Conscientious scruples?" asked the young man.

"Oh no, not at all. I do not care for novels. They weary me. The characters are so seldom natural. They are either utterly bad or so saintly that we doubt if they can be human. The men and women we know have all natures in which good and evil is mixed, but the majority of novelists are so clumsy that they cannot paint them so. They must make them either angels or fiends."

"And so you give such works a wide range and turn to the scientists and philosophers for recreation," said Hadley. "There is Huxley, for instance," pointing to the volume in her hand. "Do you find him interesting?"

"Intensely."

"Is that so? Well, at one place he speaks of the immortality of the soul. Is it in that collection of his Essays?"

She turned the leaves of the book rapidly. "Yes, here it is," she said presently. "I have marked it as one of his most striking paragraphs."

"Would you read it? My memory is not retentive enough to enable me to quote it verbatim."

For answer she read as follows: "If a man tells me that the soul is immortal, I would say to him, How do you know it? And if he were to say to me, The soul is not immortal, I should be still obliged to repeat the question: How do you know that?"

"Yes, that is the paragraph I referred to," said Hadley. "That is agnosticism pure and simple."

"But it is entirely honest," returned the girl, with a gleam in her eye.

"Ah! but does he not leave you in the sam mist-land in which certain writers of fictio leave you?" questioned Hadley, looking at h smilingly, but intently.

Her eye dropped, and a flutter of embarras ment was perceptible in her manner for a m ment, but her discomposure did not last lon "Let us have definiteness where definiteness possible; but where the truth is not yet di covered, it is better to acknowledge our igno ance than to assert error or blindly accept figment of the brain as truth. But, Mr. Made ling," she added, smiling, "these are rath abstruse questions for a hungry man to discu Perhaps you had better try to secure somethi a little more substantial."

The young man could not find it in his hea to leave her yet, so congenial did he find h society.

"In my debilitated state perhaps it would n be wise for me to venture to town alone," he h the temerity to say, with a peculiar circumfl upon the last word.

"That is a hint, is it?" laughed the gi "Well—I might return with you, if you thi that you are in a serious state of weakness," s said, a little hesitantly, but there was a pleas smile on her lips. "The sun will soon be dow any way. Yes, it is my duty to go with you —to—take care of you. Perhaps you rememb what Wordsworth says in his 'Ode to Dut apostrophizing that virtue, which he calls 'ste daughter of the voice of God.'

"'I myself commend
Unto thy guidance from this hour;
O, let my weakness have an end!
Give unto me, made lowly wise,
The spirit of self-sacrifice;
The confidence of reason give;
And in the light of truth thy bondman let me live.'

As she concluded she rose.

"It would be so much pleasanter if you we with me because you—you like to, than becau you feel it your duty," he ventured to s audaciously.

A bright vermillion went to her cheeks a clung there as she replied: "We ought alwa to like to do our duty."

On their way to town Hadley encouraged M Havelock to talk of herself. He found that t report of her having been educated in an ea ern seminary was correct. He could not h but admire her easy self-possession and lig and gay manner. And yet on her forehead we a few lines that indicated an active and seric mind, and her dark-blue eyes at times seem very deep and thoughtful. No doubt she wa girl of moods, gay and serious by turns. At a rate, notwithstanding her light badinage, Ha ley was convinced that she was not a lay figu but a girl of real color and force of character.

As they walked up the street toward l home, she looked up at him with a naïve sm and said: "It was rather queer—I mean the w in which we became acquainted."

"Do you think that we are now on speaki terms?" he asked, with some show of anxiet

"Oh, yes; I do not see any use in being co ventional."

"No use at all."

"Then you will call and see—us, will you she said, as she put her hand into his at t gate, adding: "My parents will be glad to ma your acquaintance. They are warm friends the students, and always welcome them into o home. Toward the college boys," with a rogui emphasis on "boys," "they throw off all prudi formality."

"I shall call with pleasure," was Hadley ready rejoinder, as he lifted his hat, and ba her good evening.

THE GOLDEN CALF.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. Lesson for July 8, Exodus 32: 15-26. Golden Text 1 John 5: 21.

Lengthened Absence Provided for—Moses Thought to be Dead—The Sin of Impatience—Aaron's Weak Submission to Popular Clamor—The Sin Repeated in These Days—God's Offer to Moses—A Man Regardless of Self-Interest—His Success—His Indignation at Sight of the Calf—Aaron's Unmanliness—The Massacre—Moses Returns to the Lord—A Self-Immolatory Prayer.

WHEN Moses had gone up into the mountain God's command, he had made provision for absence: "He said unto the elders, 'Tarry here for us, until we come again unto you; and, behold, Aaron and Hur are with you; if any man have any matters to do, let him come to them.'" (Ex. 24: 14.) Forty days and forty nights was a long time to wait, and human reasoning would, no doubt, suggest that Moses must long ago have died in the mountain; he must have fallen over some precipice, or have succumbed to the pangs of hunger. But such surmises were nothing short of sin in the people from God had taken under His immediate care and protection. God had sent Moses to their leader, He had manifested His power through Moses as He never had done before through any mortal man, and He was responsible alike for Moses and for them. Oh, how much we lose through

The Sin of Impatience.

"Blessed are all they that wait for Him." (Isa. 30: 13.) There is perhaps no one with whom we are so impatient as God. How often we hear it said, "I have asked God to direct me, and I have no answer, and I am obliged to decide." Who obliges you? Is not God your Master? Surely He will not make you wait, and can blame you for waiting. The children of Israel had received the command, "Tarry ye here for us until we come again unto you;" but they took upon themselves the responsibility of disobeying. "When they saw that Moses delayed to come down out of the mount, the people gathered themselves together unto Aaron, and said unto him, Up, make us gods which shall go before us; for as for this Moses, the man that brought us up out of the land of Egypt, we wot not what is become of him." No doubt they had imagined that his intercourse with God would consume only a few hours, and when day after day passed and they were disappointed, it seemed never to occur to them to inquire of the Lord, or to ask Aaron to inquire of Him—they acted on human reasoning and turned their backs on God. Oh, how we understand that are of more moment, and are worth more time, than any amount of preaching and outward activity for God! But Aaron! Surely he who was called to be the High Priest, the type of Jesus, the man nearest to God in the worship which God was teaching Moses—surely he would not take part with the people against God? Yes, the weak Aaron who when under Moses' influence was so true to God, now fell under the influence of popular feeling, and was led away so far as to make a graven image for the people to worship! The material of the golden calf was the golden offerings which God was willing to accept as offerings for the tabernacle. Whatever we keep to ourselves becomes a snare to us; as long as we hold ourselves, and all we are and have as the Lord's, and unquestionably submit to His disposal of them, it is no snare to us. If those useless earrings had been given to the Lord, the golden calf would not have been made. Imagine Aaron presiding at the dedication of the image, and saying, "These be thy gods, O, Israel, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt!" and then Aaron proclaimed a feast to the Lord (mixing up his service with idolatry), in which no offering except the sin and trespass offering were offered. When men sin most they are the farthest off from any confession of sin, the conscience loses its sensitiveness. We wonder at the idolatry of the children of Israel, and that they should have desired any graven image of a God who had made His power so manifest among them, but is not England sinning the same sin, in those idols which are being placed in St. Paul's Cathedral? What have we Protestants to do with crucifixes and images of the Virgin Mary? Is it not our glory that God Himself is with us, and that He dwells and walks in us? What have we to do with idols?

While the scene of revelry was transpiring below, God was acquainting Moses with the matter up in the Mount Sinai. "Go get thee down, for thy people, which thou broughtest out of the land of Egypt, have corrupted themselves." "Thy people?" Were they not the Lord's? They were not acting as such just now, and God puts Moses to a severe test, He says, "I have seen this people, and behold, it is a stiffnecked people. Now, therefore, let Me alone, that My wrath may wax hot against them; and I will make of thee a great nation." The choice was given him by God Himself, whether he would be a great man in himself, or a living sacrifice! Thank God, the Spirit of Christ was beforehand in some of these saints of old (1 Pet. 1: 11, 12), and signally so in Moses. Utterly he argued the matter with God, "Why doth Thy wrath wax hot against Thy people whom Thou hast brought forth out of the land of Egypt? .... Wherefore should the Egyptian speak and say, For mischief did He bring them out?" Oh, this self-ignoring spirit, how rare it is! "Turn from Thy fierce wrath," he says, "and repent of this evil against Thy people." God had prayed Moses, "Let Me alone." But Moses refused, and prevailed with God! What a lesson of intercessory prayer! Was not he doing in the mountain with the Lord more than he could do in the plain? Moses reminded the Lord of His promises, and "the Lord repented of the evil which He had thought to do unto His people."

Until Moses had settled the matter with God, he was not prepared to meet the people. And when he went down from the mount he held in his hand the two tables of the testimony, "written on both sides, on the one side and on the other were they written. And the tables were the work of God, and the writing was the writing of God, graven upon the tables." Joshua accompanied Moses. Where he had been during the time of Moses' communing with God in the mount we know not, or what had become of the seventy elders; but, in any case, Moses found Joshua waiting for him. What we see makes more impression on us than what we hear. Moses saw the calf and the dancing (probably resembling the licentious orgies observed in heathen festivals to this day), and Moses' anger waxed hot, and he cast the tables out of his hands, and brake them beneath the mount. He had been occupied forty days and forty nights, without eating or drinking, and perhaps without sleeping, in ascertaining the mind of God, that he might teach the people the will of the God whom they had three times promised to obey. And now that he had brought them the very writing of God Himself, he finds them, with Aaron at their head, worshipping an idol! He had obtained God's mercy for them, but his own indignation was stirred up. He gave their sin no quarter, but "took the calf which they had made, and burnt it in the fire, and ground it to powder, and strewed it upon the water, and made the children of Israel drink." Then he called Aaron to account: "What did this people unto thee, that thou hast brought so great a sin upon them?" Priest, and brother to Moses, just as Adam was when he cast the blame of his sin upon Eve. Instead of making a clean breast of it, Aaron excused himself by casting all the blame upon the people. It is very probable that Aaron may have acceded to their request from the best of motives, thinking to retain his influence over them until Moses should return, and so mixing up the worship of God with idolatrous rites. But why did he not inquire of the Lord?

Moses did not argue the matter; he saved all his reasonings for God; and, when dealing with man, his actions went further than his words. He "stood in the gate of the camp, and said, who is on the Lord's side? let him come unto me." The whole tribe of Levi, with, no doubt, Aaron at their head, ranged themselves on Moses' side, and then the command to slay went forth, and three thousand perished. The law has no mercy. "the soul that sinneth, it shall die" (Ezek. 18: 4). Now that sin was recognized as sin, and punished with death, Moses called on the people for a general consecration of themselves to the Lord, "that He may bestow upon you a blessing this day." Probably there was little sleep in the camp of Israel that night, and on the morrow Moses said to the people: "Ye have sinned a great sin; and now I will go up unto the Lord; peradventure, I shall make an atonement for your sin." What, must Moses leave them again? Yes; their very sin necessitated it. How unwise, how mad it is to lose patience with God! He is a better economist of time than we are. "And Moses returned unto the Lord," entering within the veil. He pleaded, "Oh, these people have sinned a great sin, and have made them gods of gold. Yet now, if Thou wilt, forgive their sin; and if not, blot me, I pray Thee, out of Thy book which Thou hast written." Another such prayer is hardly anywhere on record, except it be that of Paul, "I say the truth in Christ. I lie not; my conscience also bearing me witness in the Holy Ghost, that I have great heaviness and continual sorrow in my heart. For I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh." (Rom. 9: 1-3.) Moses and Paul did not live for themselves in any sense; soul and body, will and desire, reputation, and all else, was sacrificed for others. God gives every Christian the privilege of so following Him. "None of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself." (Rom, 14: 7.) "If any man will come after Me, let him deny himself." (Matt. 16: 24.) "And the Lord said unto Moses, whosoever hath sinned against Me, him will I blot out of My book." God will not do unrighteously. There is a very general making light of the heinousness of sin in our day. The gospel has been very fully preached, and the way of salvation made very easy. But many who profess to find peace, have never seen their sinfulness in the light of God, and groaned under the consciousness that they deserved nothing but God's wrath. Sure, He can convert a soul as rapidly as the jailer at Philippi, but it is the real sinner whom God saves from real sin and real condemnation. It is no simple thing of the feelings or imagination. A soul which has been consciously a lost soul, undone, and justly condemned by a righteous God, can never forget the first smile of God, or the horror of the horrible pit, and the miry clay from which he has been rescued. God is a Holy God; no man can break His law with impunity. He hates sin, He is of purer eyes than to behold evil, and yet He forgives, and blots out our sins by the blood of Jesus Christ, His beloved Son.

A Wonderful Type of Jesus,

MY THREEFOLD REST.

I.

"Come unto Me, all ye that labor, and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."—Matt. xi., 28.

From sin and sins, dear Lord I rest—
Altar and Priest and Sacrifice Thou art;
By law and sin no more opprest,
I share in Thy beatitude a part.
My yesterdays are covered by Thy blood;
To-day my only shelter is Thy power;
To-morrow Thou will be as strong and good
As in the past most gracious hour.

II.

"Take My yoke upon you, and learn of Me; for I am meek and lowly in heart; and ye shall find rest unto your souls."—Matt. xi. 29.

I rest by serving at Thy will—
Thy yoke is easy and Thy burden light;
And peace grows deep and deeper still,
As my obedience proves Thy might.
I hold my powers alone for Thee—
Use them in loving errands of Thy grace;
And calm me, though I may not see
Thy methods, as before Thy face.

III.

"There remaineth, therefore, a rest to the people of God."—Heb. iv., 9.

And yet the noblest rest remains
In sweet reserve for hope and love;
It hath no place for sighs or pains,
'Tis kept a glad surprise above.
Oh, rest untroubled and serene,
In Thy bright presence, spotless Lamb!
Fit me each day, by every scene,
For robe and harp, for crown and palm.

Christian Work in Mexico.

Through the reading of the Holy Scriptures translated into Spanish some earnest souls in Mexico have, by God's blessing, been led to a clear knowledge of the Gospel. From their numbers able preachers of the Christian faith in its primitive purity have been raised up, around whom congregations have been gathered from among the humble poor, who have been the first to publicly welcome and defend the pure Gospel in Mexico. The members of these congregations, rich in faith, have worked earnestly and bravely for Christ and His truth among their fellow countrymen in that beautiful Southern portion of North America called Mexico. Schools have been established by them, in which large numbers of bright boys and girls have received a good secular education and have been carefully taught the Christian faith. From the children thus educated faithful Christian workers have been raised up. A Mexican Branch of the Church of Christ, that maintains the faith in its purity and integrity, has been organized among these native Christians in the Republic of Mexico. The members of this Mexican Church of Christ, though gathered mostly from among the poor, are yet doing a most important Christian work. To continue that work, we need to pay a few leading workers small monthly salaries, and also to defray some current expenses. To raise the needed funds we have formed a society with an office at 43 Bible House, New York, U. S., and should be pleased to have many of our fellow Christians join this society by becoming regular contributors to its treasury. We are trying to secure monthly or quarterly contributions to meet the regular monthly expenses of the work. In order to continue and extend the work, we wish to raise four hundred dollars a month, by endeavoring to have four hundred persons each give on an average one dollar every month to this object, leaving the donors to give less or more as they may be able and willing.

We earnestly invite all who will, to join us in this systematic effort in behalf of the cause of Christ in Mexico, by becoming monthly subscribers to this fund. We have already regular subscribers whose gifts amount monthly to over eighty dollars, and a growing circle of friends who are forwarding us occasional donations.

This Mexican Church of Christ is a very effective instrumentality through which to do Christian work among the many millions on this Western Hemisphere who speak the Spanish language, comparatively few of whom have ever had a Bible in their hands. A beautiful church building has been secured in the City of Mexico as the centre of the activities of this Mexican Church of Christ. Through the workers connected with that centre more than forty congregations have been gathered from among the poor in different parts of the Republic of Mexico. We have some faithful and able preachers now in the field, but more young men need to be trained for the ministry. Multitudes of Protestant children in Mexico, some of them orphans, need to be educated. We make three requests of you, Christian reader: first, that you will, if possible, become a monthly or quarterly subscriber in behalf of this Christian work; second, that you will try and induce your friends also to contribute to it; third, that you will remember this precious work in Mexico in your prayers.

We most sincerely thank all who are already generously contributing to this Christian work for their timely and generous gifts, and we earnestly invite many others, to unite with us in aiding it by also becoming monthly subscribers in its behalf. Those who may not feel that they can give as much as a dollar a month are earnestly asked to give what they can, whenever they are able—EVERY LITTLE HELPS. Fellow Christian, if you will generously consent to contribute a dollar a month or more or less to the work, will you kindly inform me of the fact? Contributions either large or small can be mailed directly to my address as follows:

SIR JAMES KING, Lord Provost of Glasgow—THE GLASGOW INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION.

THE LORD PROVOST OF GLASGOW.

THE International Exhibition, recently opened in the great Scottish city is a matter of interest in the United States, inasmuch as this country is well represented among the exhibits, and travelling Americans in large numbers are visiting it. Besides this, a large number of our citizens are of Scottish birth or descent, and though Scotchmen of energy and grit are apt to leave their country for more promising fields, they never lose their love for their native land. In their voluntary exile their thoughts turn with affectionate interest to Scotland, and their dearest and most intimate friends are their fellow-countrymen. Thrifty, energetic, honest, and reliable, as a rule, they have been among the best of our transatlantic settlers; and some of our best statesmen, generals, lawyers, and clergymen owe their success here to the Scottish strain in their blood. The picture of the Exhibition on the first page, and the portrait of the Lord Provost, will be of interest therefore to a large class of the readers of this journal.

Practically the office of Lord Provost is equivalent to that of mayor. The title, which comes from the Latin term præpositus (set over), is usually of ecclesiastical or academical association, but in Scotland the duties of the Provost are only civic. He presides as chief magistrate in the police courts, as the mayors of English towns do, and he occupies the chair of the city council. In Glasgow, Edinburgh, Aberdeen, and Perth the Provost is entitled to the prefix of "Lord," though the title is retained only during his term of office.

Sir James King, the present Lord Provost of Glasgow, is one of the Jubilee Knights raised in common with other mayors of important cities to knighthood in honor of the year of the Queen's Jubilee. He is a native of the city which he now rules, and is extremely popular there in spite of the fact that he is a Conservative in politics, and an Episcopalian in religion—two characteristics which are apt to create a prejudice against a man in Scotland. Sir James was educated in the High School of the city, and subsequently graduated from the University of Glasgow. He then entered the office of his father, who was chief of an alum company, and has now been succeeded by his son. Sir James became a member of the city council in the spring of 1886, and in November of that year he had the honor of being elected Lord Provost without a dissentient voice. In returning thanks for this honor he remarked that: "To one who is proud of being a native of Glasgow, who knows well its varied interests and industries, who has during his whole life watched the rapid strides it has made in population and in material prosperity, there can be no distinction so great as to be chosen its civic head." The highest hopes held regarding his occupancy of the Chief Magistrate's chair have been more than realized—whether in his conduct of the Council conclaves or in social courtesies and entertainments.

The office of Lord Provost is not the only honor which has been conferred upon Sir James King. In 1875 the members of the Merchants' House elected him Dean of the Guild, and, in 1877, the Chamber of Commerce elected him Chairman. In 1879 he was made Dean of the Faculties of the University of Glasgow, and some six years later the Senatus honored him with the degree of LL. D. Sir James has been a Justice of the Peace of the counties of Lanark, Renfrew, and Stirling for close upon a quarter of a century, and in 1879 he was created Deputy Lieutenant of Stirling County.

The city over which he rules has a population of more than half a million, and is the second city of the empire. Its claims to antiquity are well established. There is a tradition that a bishopric was founded there by St. Mungo in 560, and it is known that the foundations of its cathedral were laid in 1115. During the next five hundred years the progress made by the town did not keep pace with its rivals, but in the early days of American colonization, it made rapid strides. It was the chief emporium for the Virginia tobacco trade, and subsequently dealt largely in cotton and sugar. It has held an important place in the annals of British history. Probably few of those who witnessed the other day the entry of the Prince and Princess of Wales into the city to open the exhibition, remembered anything of another Royal entry into Glasgow—that of the last hope of the Stuart kings, 143 years ago. A very different aspect the city wore on December 25, 1745, when it received Prince Charles Edward, the last of the despicable royal Stuarts, an unwelcome guest, no friend to the men of trade, and already a waning star. When he left his lodging at the foot of Glassford Street, on January 3, 1746, and marched eastward on his way to Falkirk and Culloden, he carried with him $50,000 of the honest burghers' money; the remembrance of which may lend greater interest in the eyes of these burghers' descendants to the relics of the Prince which have been brought together in the Glasgow Exhibition.

The citizens of Glasgow, however, do not much concern themselves with historical associations. More do they glory in the sight of the great ocean fleets coming up to their wharves laden with the wealth of East and West. And little do they care for the smoke-cloud that overhangs their roofs while they know that their furnace blasts are forging the navies, the iron walls, of half the world. Sheltered within her college walls from his rivals, the instrument-makers of Glasgow, James Watt, like the magicians of the "Arabian Nights," evoked from his kettle the white genius Steam. Since then, Electricity, another of the Titan brood, has been born upon earth. Like too many of the Arab genii, these mighty powers have made slaves of their discoverers, and as "he who increaseth knowledge, increaseth sorrow" (Eccles. 1:18), it has turned out that the increase of labor-saving appliances has increased labor.

THE GLASGOW INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION.

THE citizens of Glasgow have made great efforts to produce an exhibition worthy of the position of their city as the largest in Scotland, and as the second city of the Empire, and they have been successful. Their exhibition is the largest organized within the British dominions since that of London in 1862. They have raised the largest guarantee-fund yet subscribed for such a purpose. They have which are convenient and commodious, covering an area of nearly sixteen acres. They secured for these buildings a magnificent site in the midst of the most beautiful natural surroundings. They are much more picturesquely treated than is usual with such edifices, the style chosen being Saracenic. The dome and minarets have a striking appearance, and form a very pleasing group, especially when seen in combination with the spire of the University, or the tall tower of a neighboring church.

The General Design

resembles that of the first International Exhibition in London in 1851, as it has a great central avenue or nave, sixty feet in width, with a transept of equal width intersecting it at the centre. Right and left of the main avenue the various courts, thirty-seven in number, are ranged. They have a uniform width of 50 feet, and vary in length from 50 feet to 135 feet. The Grand Hall is an imposing structure, capable of accommodating 3,000 persons. The section of the building allotted to the fine arts has been designed and constructed with a view to its being retained as a temporary home for the fine-art collection belonging to the corporation. There are in all seven picture-galleries, also a sculpture-gallery, and two upper corridors for architecture and photography. The machinery department is a conspicuous feature of the Exhibition. It is laid out in parallel courts, nine in number. Among the outside buildings the most important is the "Bishop's Palace." It is an exact reproduction of the old Bishop's Castle, which formerly stood near the Glasgow Cathedral, and the ruins of which were removed a century ago. The building is erected on the slope below the University, and is used for the exhibits of the archæological and historical section. It is surmounted by a gallery and promenade, which commands a view of the grounds.

The structure is, for the most part, of wood, with an iron and glass roof covering. The main feature is a central dome, which rises to a height of 150 feet, and is flanked by lofty minarets and towers of Oriental form. It is internally richly decorated in the style of the Alhambra. The principal entrance is in the centre of the building, and opens into the great central dome. In front is a statue of the Queen, who thus, in effigy at least, seems to preside over the Exhibition. She looks toward the Kelvin, and over the beautiful grounds, with kiosks, trees, and the sloping banks, surmounted on one side by the University, and on the other by the houses of the West End Park. In front of the main entrance are two bridges, communicating with the grounds on the right bank of the Kelvin.

The Foreign Section comprises articles of various kinds from New York, Chicago, and other cities of the United States, Paris, Lyons, Vienna, Bohemia, Bremen, Berlin, Hamburg, Leipsic, Cologne, Milan, Florence, Turin, Amsterdam, Denmark, Norway, Russia, Turkey, the West Indies, and Australia. The Artisan Section consists mainly of models and specimens of work by individual working-men in Glasgow and the neighboring towns. Three courts are allotted to the Women's Arts and Industries of the United Kingdom. The Dominion of Canada occupies a special Court; India fills three Courts, and Ceylon one Court. The Grand Hall is decorated with a collection of national flags. The Queen's Jubilee presents, numbering 799 articles, are exhibited in the Museum.

One very interesting section of the Exhibition is that of specimens of woman's arts and industries. The ladies by whom the arrangement was superintended worked with a will and have made one of the most successful collections of the kind ever seen. Among them are conspicuous several exhibits from the Queen's daughters. The Empress of Germany exhibits a cushion and table-cover; and at her request the Duchess of Albany has forwarded for exhibition in this section a water-color drawing done by the Empress as a present to her brother, the late Duke of Albany. Princess Christian sends a chair in curious burnt leather and embroidery.

Interesting Archæological Exhibits

in large numbers have been sent in and are exhibited in the Bishop's Palace. Mr. Matthew Brownlie, of Strathaven, sends a flag which was carried by the Covenanters at Drumclog. The Duke of Montrose lends two portraits of his ancestor, "The Great Marquis"; also a portrait of Viscount Dundee, otherwise Graham of Claverhouse. Many will gaze with interest upon the sword which he wielded at the battle of Killiecrankie, where he met his death. Mrs Erskine sends miniatures in Limoges enamel of Queen Mary and her first husband, King Francis II. of France. Further, two rat-tail tablespoons, dated 1686, which belonged to the Earl of Mar, who raised the Jacobite "standard on the Braes o' Mar" in 1715. The Earl of Mar and Kellie has lent the cradle of King James VI., a substantial article of carved oak with inlaid panels. The high chair in which the King sat when a child is a solid piece of oak furniture. The Earl also sends a fine miniature of Mary Queen of Scots, a leaden badge of a King's bedesman, dated 1725; the lock and key of Kirkcudbright Tolbooth; Mr. Greenshields sends a collection of weapons which belonged to the Covenanters; and various exhibitors have sent remarkable specimens of silver coins—the whole making an exhibition of extraordinary interest.

THE OPENING CEREMONY.

IN order that nothing might be wanting to the success of the Exhibition that patronage could give, the Prince and Princess of Wales were induced to take part in the inaugural ceremony. The city was elaborately decorated to receive them. The streets traversed by the official procession were fenced on both sides with strong barricades, and were decorated with Venetian Masts from which hung festoons and streamers. The length of streets treated in this way for the journey to the Exhibition and back by a different route extended to five miles. Over the whole distance private houses and public buildings were tastefully decorated with draperies, flags, shields, and heraldic devices. In many cases balconies were thrown out and areas were covered over with extemporized platforms, while on the wide vacant spaces in Sauchiehall Street several grand stands had been erected for the accommodation of spectators, and were largely taken advantage of. At every opening in the main street were lorries, carts, and omnibuses covered with people, while the steep streets sloping northwards were used as natural galleries, and were filled, as far as the eye could reach, with eager crowds.

The Prince and Princess were received at the Glasgow Central Railway Station by the Lord Provost, Sir James King, and Lady King, who conducted them to the Corporation Chambers. There a large company was assembled. The royal visitors then went to the residence of the Lord Provost in Claremont Terrace, passing under a triumphal arch as their carriage approached the house. Sir James and Lady King entertained them with luncheon, after which they went to the Exhibition. Sir Archibald Campbell, President of the Executive Committee, there handed to the Prince of remarkable workmanship, specially devised by Mr. John C. Chubb. The wards in the lower part of the key are so arranged as to form the letters "G. E.," for Glasgow Exhibition. The stem is a Gothic arrangement of four clustered columns, above which, on a shield, is the Scottish Lion, and on the reverse the arms of the Prince of Wales, in enamel; from this springs a thistle-bloom, while the two large leaves of the national plant rise and form the bow of the key; an inner border is formed by tracery work, with fleur-de-lys finials at intervals, rising in the centre to the Maltese cross at the top. The bow of the key bears the crest of St. Mungo and the arms and fish supporters of the City of Glasgow in full heraldic colors. The reverse has a fac-simile of the badge of the Exhibition, showing an emblematic figure of Glasgow, and an inscription recording the presentation of the key to the Prince of Wales. It was inclosed in a handsome velvet case with gold monogram. On receiving the key, the Prince, amid cheers, opened the east door of the vestibule, and entered the Exhibition. The Prince and Princess walked to the front of the platform of the Grand Hall, the Glasgow Choral Union singing the national anthem, and the artillery on the neighboring heights firing a salute of twenty-one guns.

After their Royal Highnesses were seated, and prayers had been read by the Rev. Dr. Donald M'Leod, Sir Archibald Campbell presented an address, as shown in our picture, to which the Prince made a graceful reply.

When the inaugural ode had been sung, the Prince declared the Exhibition open amid much enthusiasm. The choir gave the "Hallelujah Chorus." The royal party entered the Picture-galleries and Women's Industries Section, where the Princess was presented with a handsome piece of sewed work by Lady Campbell. After the royal party had partaken of tea in the reception-room, the Prince visited the Indian Court, and then, with the Princess, re-entered the carriage and drove to the Central Station, where he took train for Hamilton.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Stimulating the Soldiers.—Mr. McCaul says: "It is said of Napoleon I. that before he led his soldiers into any action that was more than usually hazardous, he would mount his white charger, and galloping up and down the ranks, cheerily shout, as he made his sword ring in its sheath, 'Come on, men, and I will lead you to victory!' This greatly encouraged the men, who, when under the eye of their general, or as they humorously called him, 'The Little Corporal,' felt that they could accomplish almost anything. Similarly, Christ, our great Captain, calls to the Church Militant, 'Come on, men, and I will lead you to victory!' Nothing withstands the Great Conqueror of sin and death and hell, our Leader; 'For he must reign till He hath put all enemies under His feet.'"

"Old Mortality" and the Covenanters' Tombs.—The Rev. J. S. Balmer observed: "Sir Walter Scott, in his story of 'Old Mortality,' tells how that worthy showed his veneration and love for the Covenanters of Scotland. He went from graveyard to graveyard in the old country, seeking the resting-places of the heroes and heroines of the Covenant. When he found a grave without a stone, he placed one upon it, and chiselled an inscription there, that the name of the Covenanter who fell in the cause of truth might not be forgotten. When he found a stone where the inscription was wearing away, he restored it with hammer and chisel, and from graveyard to graveyard went forth seeking to make the names of the Covenanters known in the coming days. It has often seemed to me that an occasion like this brings before us work something of the same kind—only our work is not upon gravestones, for the missionary cause is not dead; there never was in it more vitality than there is to-day—our work is not upon gravestones, but upon living minds and living hearts."

A Bottle of Whisky under the Pillow.—An evangelist relates: "I was taking tea with an ex-saloon-keeper the other day, and in course of conversation I remarked, 'Surely a spirit merchant's business must be a money-making one when you were enabled to retire from it so young.' 'Oh,' he replied, 'I did not leave it because I was rich, but because I was afraid to remain in it. There was a time I never went to bed without a bottle of whisky under my pillow. My conscience often kept me awake at night, for I knew I was ruining my own soul, and all those who came into my shop, and,' he continued, 'when in bed, I could see around me the spectres of people who had come to my shop for drink, and whom I knew to have died as drunkards—some in delirium tremens, some from want, some from accidents, but the death of all occasioned by drink; and I was heartily glad to get out of the business.' That man was not converted until after he left the business, and ever since he has been unfailing in his efforts to win other liquor-dealers to Christ."

Smitten on Both Cheeks.—An Evangelist said: "When I was preaching on an English racecourse one day, a man standing by said, 'Look here, if you say I'm a sinner, I'll give you a blow.' 'Very well,' I said, 'if it will do you any good, do so.' He struck the blow, but he did not seem to benefit by it. Again, at Liverpool, when one of our gospel sandwich-men was walking along with texts of Scripture upon his boards, a big, burly fellow, also a betting-man, walked up to him. I saw there was going to be trouble, so I stepped between them. 'What are you?' he angrily inquired. 'A sinner saved by grace,' 'And what am I?' he inquired. 'A sinner not yet saved by grace,' was my answer. 'Oh, you are a saint; now the Bible says, "If any man smite you on the one cheek, turn the other." Now I am going to try you,' and he struck me on the cheek. What was I to do? I had often had that cheek struck in the devil's service; should I not bear to have it smitten for Christ's cause? I turned the other, which he treated as he had done the first. 'Now it is my turn,' I said, and I dropped on my knees, and prayed to God to save that man. He stood beside me, and I could hear him mutter, 'Ah, that is a true Christian prayer.' When I rose to my feet he offered me five shillings, but, of course, I refused the money. He did not know what to do, that he might in some way atone for his conduct. He stood by us as we preached all day, and, whenever men of his own class threatened to molest us, he stepped forward in our defence. That is God's way; He kills all His enemies by converting them into friends."

Testing the Quality of the Iron.—Mr. Berry said: "We had an exhibition two or three years ago of iron products in Wolverhampton, and one of the most interesting of the exhibits was a large bar of iron, ten feet long and six inches thick, twisted as you have seen iron twisted into a series of crescent ribs. But the curious thing about the piece of iron was that it had been twisted cold, gripped at one end by a vice, at the other by a revolving engine, and twisted cold. I found upon inquiry that the poorest iron made was capable of being twisted and kneaded and done anything with, according to the worker's will, when it is hot fresh out of the furnace, but that only the best iron will twist cold. Therefore, as a test of the quality of the iron they twist it cold, and if it will stand that test it is sterling metal. Now, our churches were hot enough fifty years ago, and though they have lost that early heat of excitement, they are showing the quality of the metal which is in them by going on with the work, promoting all its branches and interests now, though it has lost its novelty."

The Spartan's Wreath of Triumph.—"There was an old law among the ancient Spartans that forbade any but one who had been crowned at the athletic games to stand beside their king in front rank in the day of battle. A youth entered at the games one day, and was disciplining himself carefully for the struggle. Large sums were offered him if he would withdraw, but he scorned them all. The day of trial came, and to him it was a day of triumph, as he anticipated. His perseverance was rewarded, and the crown of victory was his. When he received it, it was only a wreath of green parsley and bay-leaves. A friend near him remarked that, and asked him what he thought of it. 'I look not on it,' was the reply, 'but because of it I can stand by my king in the van!' That is one of the greatest honors and rewards that Christ, the King of glory, gives to His servants, that they may stand by Him in the van during the fight with sin and Satan; and is it not a high position to occupy, honorable to ourselves and helpful to our fellows?

Bad Choice of a Young Lady.—"A servant of Christ concerned about the spiritual welfare of the youth of his congregation, met a young lady about whose soul he was specially interested. He urged upon her the necessity of coming to Christ and giving up the world and its pleasures. But the young lady frivolously replied, 'I mean to have both Christ and the world.' 'Impossible,' said the minister, solemnly; 'you cannot serve God and mammon,' and he redoubled his efforts to induce her to choose between Christ and the world. At length the young lady deliberately replied, 'Well, if I must have my choice, I choose the world.' With a sorrowful heart, the aged minister left her, saying, 'Well, if you choose the world, go and make the best of it. But, oh, remember this world is only for time. What will you do in eternity?' The young lady followed up her choice. One night as she was singing the well-known song based on the parable of the Ten Virgins, and was rendering the words, 'Too late, too late! ye cannot enter now,' her slumbering conscience suddenly awoke. She vividly saw she was like one of the foolish virgins, and there was no more rest for her; days of sorrow succeeded nights of darkness, until at length light broke in upon her mind, and she saw that there was still time to repent and accept Christ. This she did, and found in Him a ready and loving Saviour.

NONE LIKE JESUS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached Sunday Morning, July 1, 1888.

"Unto you therefore which believe, He is precious." 1 Pet. 2: 7.

WE had for many years in this country commercial depression. What was the matter with the stores? With the harvests? With the people? Lack of faith! Money enough, goods enough, skilful brains enough, industrious hands enough, but no faith. Now what damages the commercial world, damages the spiritual.

Our Great Lack

is faith. That is the hinge on which eternity turns. The Bible says we are saved by faith. "O," says some one in the audience, "I have faith. I believe that Christ came down to save the world." I reply that in worldly matters, when you have faith you always act upon it. For instance, if I could show you a business operation by which you could make five thousand dollars, you would immediately go into it. You would prove your faith in what I tell you by your prompt and immediate action. Now, if what you call faith in Christ has led you to surrender your entire nature to Jesus and to corresponding action in your life, it is genuine faith, and if it has not, it is not faith at all.

There are some things which I believe with the head. Then there are other things which I believe with the heart. And then there are other things which I believe both with the head and heart. I believe, for instance, that Cromwell lived. That is a matter of the head. Then there are other things which I believe with the heart and not with the head. That is, I have no especial reason for believing them, and yet I want to believe them, and the wish is the father to the expectation. But there is a very great difference between that which we believe about ourselves, and that which we believe about others. For instance, you remember not a great while ago there was amid the mines; there was an explosion amid the damps, and many lives were lost. In the morning you picked up your newspaper, and saw that there had been a great disaster in Pennsylvania. You said: "Ah, what a sad thing this is; how many lives lost! O, what sorrow!" Then you read a little further on. There had been an almost miraculous effort to get those men out, and a few had been saved. "O," you said, "what a brave thing, what a grand thing that was! How well it was done!" Then you folded the paper up, and sat down to your morning repast. Your appetite had not been interfered with, and during that day, perhaps, you thought only two or three times of the disaster.

But suppose you and I had been in the mine, and the dying had been all around us, and we had heard the pickaxes just above us as they were trying to work their way down, and after a while we saw the light, and then the life-bucket let down through the shaft, and, suffocated and half dead, we had just strength enough to throw ourselves over into it, and had been hauled out into the light. Then what an appreciation we would have had of the agony and the darkness beneath, and the joy of deliverance. That is the difference between believing a thing about others and believing it about ourselves.

We take up the Bible and read that Christ came to save the world. "That was beautiful," you say; "a fine specimen of self-denial. That was very grand indeed." But suppose it is found that we ourselves were down and in the darkness, and Christ stretched down His arm of mercy through the gloom and lifted us out of the pit, and set our feet on the Rock of Ages, and put a new song into our mouth: O, then it is a matter of handclapping; it is a matter of congratulation; it is a matter of deep emotions. Which kind of faith have you, my brother?

It is faith that makes a Christian, and it is the proportion of faith that makes the difference between Christians. What was it that lifted Paul and Luther and Payson and Doddridge above the ordinary level of Christian character? It was the simplicity, the brilliancy, the power, and the splendor of their faith. O, that we had more of it! God give us more faith to preach and more faith to hear. "Lord, we believe; help Thou our unbelief!" "To you which believe, He is precious."

First: I remark Christ is precious to the believer,

As a Saviour from Sin.

A man says: "To whom are you talking? I am one of the most respectable men in this neighborhood; do you call me a sinner?" Yes! "The heart is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked." You say: "How do you know anything about my heart?" I know that about it, for God announces it in His Word; and what God says is always right. When a man becomes a Christian, people say: "That man sets himself above us." O, no! Instead of setting himself up, he throws himself down. He cries out: "I was lost once, but now I am found. I was blind once, but now I see. I prostrate myself at the foot of the cross of the Saviour's mercy."

What a grand thing it is to feel that all the bad words I have ever uttered, and all the bad deeds I have ever done, and all the bad thoughts that have gone through my mind, are as though they had never been, for the sake of what Christ has done. You know there is a difference in stains. Some can be washed out by water, but others require a chemical preparation. The sin of the heart is so black and indelible a mark that no human application can cleanse it, while the blood of Jesus Christ can wash it out for ever. O, the infinite, the

of this glorious gospel! Some man says: "I believe all that. I believe God has forgiven the most of my sins, but there is one sin I cannot forget." What is it? I do not want to know what it is, but I take the responsibility of saying that God will forgive it as willingly as any other sin.

"O'er sins like mountains for their size,
The seas of sovereign grace expand,
The seas of sovereign grace arise."

There was a very good man, about seventy-five years of age, that once said: "I believe God has forgiven me, but there was one sin which I committed when I was about twenty years of age that for, and I can't feel happy when I think of it." He said that one sin sometimes came over his heart, and blotted out all his hope of heaven. Why, he lacked in faith. The grace that can forgive a small sin can forgive a large sin. Mighty to save! Mighty to save! Who is the God like unto our God, that pardoneth iniquity? O, what Jesus is to the soul that believes in him! The soul looks up into Christ's face, and says: "To what extent wilt Thou forgive me?" And Jesus looks back into his face, and says: "To the uttermost." The soul says: "Will it never be brought up again?" "Never," says Christ. "Won't it be brought up again in Judgment Day?" "No," says Christ, "never in the Judgment Day." What bread is to the hungry, what harbor is to the bestormed, what light is to the blind, what liberty is to the captive, that, and more than that, is Christ to the man who trusts Him.

Just try to get Christ away from that Chr tian. Put on that man the thumb-scre Twist it until the bones crack. Put that fo into the iron boot of persecution until it mashed to a pulp. Stretch that man on th rack of the inquisition, and, louder than all th uproar of the persecutors, you will hear h voice like the voice of Alexander Le Cro above the crackling faggots as he cried out: "(Jesus! O, my blessed Jesus! O, divine Jesu who would not die for Thee?"

Again: I remark that Christ is precious t the believer,

As a Friend.

You have commercial friends and you have fa ily friends. To the commercial friend you when you have business troubles. You can loo back to some day—it may have been ten twenty years ago—when, if you had not had th friend, you would have been entirely overthro in business. But I want to tell you this mor ing of Jesus, the best business friend a man ev had. He can pull you out of the worst perplexitie There are people in this audience who have g in the habit of putting down all their world troubles at the feet of Jesus. Why, Christ mee the business man on the street and says: "(business man, I know all thy troubles. I will t with thee. I will see thee through." Look o how you try to corner or trample on a man wh is backed up by the Lord God Almighty! Loo out how you trample on him!

O, there is a financier that many of our bus ness men have not found out. Christ owns a the boards of trade, all the insurance comp nies, and all the banking houses. They say th the Vanderbilts own the railroads; but Chri owns the Vanderbilts and the railroads, and a the plottings of stock gamblers shall be put t confusion, and God with His little finger sha wipe out their infamous projects. How ofte it has been that we have seen men gather u riches by fraud, in a pyramid of strength an beauty, and the Lord came and blew on it an it was gone; while there are those here to-da who, if they could speak out in this assemblag or dared to speak out, would say: "The be friend I had in 1837; the best friend I had i 1857; the best friend I had at the opening c the war; the best friend I ever had—has been th Lord Jesus Christ. I would rather give up a other friends than this one." But we have als

Family Friends.

They come in when we have sickness in th household. Perhaps they say nothing; bu they sit down and they weep as the light goe out from the bright eyes, and the white petal of the lily are scattered in the blast of death They watch through the long night by the dy ing couch, and then, when the spirit has gone soothe you with great comfort. They say "Don't cry. Jesus pities you. All is well. Yo will meet the lost one again." Then, when you son went off, breaking your heart, did they no come and put the story in the very best shape and prophesy the return of the prodigal? Wer they not in your house when the birth ange flapped its wings over your dwelling? An they have been there at the baptisms and at th weddings. Family friends! But I have to tel you that Christ is the best family friend. O blessed is that cradle over which Jesus bends Blessed is that nursery where Jesus walks Blessed is that sick brow from which Jesus wipes the dampness! Blessed is that table where Jesus breaks the bread! Blessed is that grave where Jesus stands with His scarred feet on the upturned sod, saying: "I am the Resurrection and the Life; he that believeth in Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live"! Have you a babe in the house? put it into the arms of

The Great Child-Lover.

Is there a sick one in the house? Think of Him who said, "Damsel, arise." Are you afraid you will come to want? Think of Him who fed the five thousand. Is there a little one in your house that you are afraid will be blind or deaf or lame? Think of Him who touched the blinded eye, and snatched back the boy from pileptic convulsion. Oh, He is the best friend. ook over your family friends to-day, and find nother that can be compared to Him. When e want our friends, they are sometimes out of wn. Christ is always in town. We find that me will stick to us in prosperity who will not adversity. But Christ comes through dark- t night, and amid ghastliest sorrow, and across ughest sea to comfort you.

There are men and women here who would ve been dead twenty years ago but for Jesus. hey have gone through trial enough to exhaust n times their physical strength. Their prop- ty went, their health went, their families were attered. God only knows what they suffered. hey are an amazement to themselves that they ve been able to stand it. They look at their ce happy home, surrounded by all comfort. one! They think of the time when they used rise strong in the morning, and walk vigor- sly down the street, and had experienced a alth they thought inexhaustible. Gone! verything gone but Jesus.

He Has Pitied Them.

is eye has watched them. His omnipotence s defended them. Yes. He has been with em. They have gone through disaster, and e was a pillar of fire by night. They have ne across stormy Galilee, but Christ had His ot on the neck of the storm. They felt the ves of trouble coming up around them grad- lly, and they began to climb into the strong ck of God's defence, and then they sang, as ey looked over the waters, "God is our refuge d strength, an ever-present help in time of uble; therefore we will not fear though the rth be removed, though the mountains be rried into the midst of the sea, though the ters thereof roar and be troubled, though the untains shake with the swelling thereof.

The other day there was a sailor who came to the Bethel in New York, and said: "My ds (he was standing among sailors), I don't ow what's the matter of me. I used to ar a good deal about religion, and about Jesus rist. I don't know that I have any religion, that I know anything much about Christ; t when I was in mid-Atlantic I looked up one y through the rigging, and there seemed to me light through my soul. I have felt differ- t ever since, and I love those that I once ted, and I feel a joy I can't tell you. I really n't know what is the matter of me." A gh sailor got up, and said, "My lad, I know at's the matter of you. You have found sus. It is enough to make any man happy."

"His worth if all the nations knew,
Sure the whole earth would love Him too."

I remark again: Christ is precious to the liever, as u and I must after awhile get out of this rld. Here and there one perhaps may come to eighty, to ninety years of age, but your mmon sense tells you that the next twenty- e years will land the majority of this audience eternity. The next ten years will thin out great many of these family circles. This day y do the work for some of us. Now why do ay this? To scare you? No; but just as I uld stand in your office, if I were a business n, and you were a business man, and talk r risks. You do not consider it cowardly to k in your store over temporal risks. Is it se in us this morning to talk a little while r the risks of the soul, that are for eternity? n every congregation Death has the last year en doing a great deal of work. Where is ur father? Where is your mother? Your ild? Your brother? Your sister? O, cruel es Death seem to be! Will he pluck every wer? Will he poison every fountain? Will put black on every door-knob? Will he p every heart-string? Can I keep nothing? e there no charmed weapons with which to out and contend against him? Give me ne keen sword, sharpened in God's armory, h which I may stab him through. Give me ne battle-axe that I may clutch it, and hew him from helmet to sandal. Thank God, thank God, that he that rideth on the pale horse hath more than a match in Him who rideth on the white horse. St. John heard the contest, the pawing of the steeds, the rush, the battle-cry, the onset, until the pale horse came down on his haunches, and his rider bit the dust, while Christ, the conqueror, with uplifted voice declared it: "O death, I will be thy plague; O grave, I will be thy destruction." The sepulchre is on the shore of heavenly seas, and sentinel angels walk up and down at the door to guard it. The dust and the dampness of the grave are only the spray of the white surf of celestial seas, and the long breathing of the dying Christian, that you call his gasping, is only the long inhalation of the air of heaven. O, bless God for what Christ is to the Christian soul, here and hereafter!

I heard a man say, some time ago, that they never laugh in heaven. I do not know where he got his authority for that. I think they do laugh in heaven. When victors come home, do we not laugh? When fortunes are won in a day, do we not laugh? After we have been ten or fifteen years away from our friends, and we greet them again, do we not laugh? Yes,

We will Laugh in Heaven.

Not hollow laughter nor meaningless laughter, but a full, round, clear, deep, resonant outbreak of eternal gladness. Oh, the glee of that moment when we first see Jesus! I think we will take the first two or three years in heaven to look at Jesus; and if, in ten thousand years, there should be a moment when the doxology paused, ten thousand souls would cry out: "Sing! Sing!" and when the cry was, "What shall we sing?" the answer would be, "Jesus! Jesus!" Oh, you may have all the crowns in heaven! I do not care so much about them. You may have all the robes in heaven; I do not care so much about them. You may have all the sceptres in heaven; I do not care so much about them. You may have all the thrones in heaven; I do not care so much about them. But give me Jesus—that is enough heaven for me. Oh, Jesus! I long to see Thee, thou "chief among ten thousand, the One altogether lovely."

There may be some here who have come, hardly knowing why they come. Perhaps it was as in Paul's time—you have come to hear what this babbler sayeth; but I am glad to meet you face to face, and to strike hands with you in one earnest talk about your deathless spirit. Do you know, my friend that this world is not good enough for you? It cheats. It fades. It dies. You are immortal. I see it in the deathless spirit looking out from your eye. It is a mighty spirit. It is an immortal spirit. It beats against the window of the cage. I come out to feed it. During the past week the world has been trying to feed it with husks. I come out this morning to feed it with that bread of which if a man eat he will never hunger.

What has the World Done

for you? Has it not bruised you? Has it not betrayed you? Has it not maltreated you? Look me in the eye, immortal man, and tell me if that is not so. And yet, will you trust it? Oh, I wish that you could forget me, the weak and sinful man—that I might vanish from your sight this morning, and that Jesus might come in! Aye, He comes here this morning to plead for your soul—comes in all covered with the wounds of Calvary. He says, "O, immortal man! I died for thee. I pity thee. I come to save thee. With these hands, torn and crushed, I will lift thee up into pleasures that never die." Who will reject—who will drive Him back?

When Christ was slain on the cross, they had a cross, and they had nails, and they had hammers. You crucify by your sin, O impenitent soul! the Lord Jesus Christ. Here is a cross; but where are the nails? Where are the hammers? "Ah," says some one rejecting Christ, some one standing a long way off, "I will furnish the nails. I don't believe in that Jesus. I will furnish the nails." Now we have the nails, who will furnish the hammers? "Ah," says some hard heart, "I will furnish the hammers." Now we have the nails and the hammers. We have no spears; who will furnish the spears? "Ah," says some one long in the habit of sin and rejection of Christ's mercy, "I will furnish them." Now we have all the instruments: the cross, the nails, the hammers, the spears: and the crucifixion goes on. Oh, the darkness! Oh, the pang! Oh, the tears! Oh, the death! "Behold the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the world!" Lord Jesus

Help that Man.

He sits far back to-day. He does not like to come forward. He feels strange in a religious assemblage. He thinks perhaps we do not want him. O Jesus, take that trembling hand. Put thine ear to that agitated heart, and hear how it beats. O, lift the iron gate of that prison-house, and let that man go free.

Lord Jesus, help that woman. She is a wanderer. No tears can she weep. See, Lord Jesus, that polluted soul, see that blistered foot! No church for her. No good cheer for her. No hope for her. Lord Jesus, go to that soul. Thou wilt not stone her. Let the red-hot chain, that burns to the bone till the bloody ichor hisses in the heat, snap at Thy touch. O, have mercy on Mary Magdalene!

Lord Jesus, help that young man! He took money out of his employer's till. Didst Thou see it? The clerks were all gone. The lights were down. The shutters were up. Didst Thou see it? O, let him not fall into the pit. Rememberest Thou not his mother's prayers? She can pray for him no more. Lord Jesus, touch him on the shoulder. Touch him on the heart. Lord, save that young man! There are many young men here.

I Got a Letter from one of them who is probably here to-day, and I shall have no other opportunity of answering that letter. You say you believe in me. O, do you believe in Jesus? I cannot save you, my dear brother. Christ can. He wants and waits to save you, and He comes to-day to save you. Will you have Him? I do not know what our young men do without Christ—how they get on amid all the temptations and trials to which they are subjected. O, young men, come to Christ to-day, and put your soul and your interest for this life, and for the next, into His keeping. In olden times, you know, a cup-bearer would bring wine or water to the king, who would drink it, first tasting it himself, showing that there was no poison in it, then passing it to the king, who would drink it. The highest honor I ask is that I may be cup-bearer to-day to your soul. I bring you this water of everlasting life. I have been drinking of it. There is no poison in it. It has never done me any harm. It will do you no harm. O, drink it, and live forever. And let that aged man put his head down on the staff, and let that poor widowed soul bury her worried face in her handkerchief, and these little children fold their hands in prayer, while we commend you to Him who was wounded for our transgressions, and bruised for our iniquities; for to you which believe, He is precious.

THE LITERAL RETURN OF THE JEWS.

By Rev. Samuel H. Kellegg, D. D.*

Temporal and Spiritual Blessings Foretold by the Same Prophets—Not the Return Under Ezra—Reasons for Believing it Still Future—I. To be in the Latter Days—II. To Include all the Twelve Tribes—III. To be Final—IV. Complete—V. In National Independence—VI. Two Restorations Predicted, of Which One Only Has Taken Place.

THE same prophets who predict a future reversal of the spiritual curse of hardening which has for ages rested on the Jew, no less plainly and explicitly predict the reversal of all temporal curses which were denounced, and have so literally fallen upon the nation, the land, and the Holy City. Thus, for example, we read in Jer. 30:3: "Lo, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will bring again the captivity of my people Israel and Judah, and I will cause them to return to the land that I gave unto their fathers, and they shall possess it." So we read again in Ezek. 37:21: "Say unto them, thus saith the Lord God, 'Behold, I will take the children of Israel from among the heathen, whither they be gone, and will gather them on every side and bring them into their own land!'" Such examples, as every Bible reader knows, might be multiplied indefinitely.

It is utterly impossible to apply all such predictions of return to the land, as some have sought to do, to the return under Ezra from the Babylonian exile. Whatever they mean, it is absolutely certain that they refer to an event which is yet in the future. This will be perfectly clear from the following considerations:

1. The Scriptures undoubtedly predict a return which is to take place

"In The Latter Days."

To "the latter days" is expressly referred, e. g., the prophecy of Jeremiah, in chapter 30. What this expression means, every Bible student knows. It is never used with reference to any period before the first advent of our Lord. Least of all is it ever used in any of those prophecies which by common consent refer to the restoration from Babylon. The return of "the latter days," therefore, whatever it be, cannot be understood of the restoration from Babylon, nor of any event before the first coming of our Lord. Hence, as nothing since the first advent has occurred which could be so understood, it is plain that the promised return is an event yet in the future.

2. Another proof that the Babylonian restoration cannot be intended in all these predictions of a regathering of Israel in the land, is found in the fact that the restoration of under the names of Ephraim, Israel, etc., as well as that of the two tribes of Judah and Benjamin, is distinctly predicted. Thus, for example, in the prophecy of restoration in Jer. 30: 31, the restoration of the house of Israel or Ephraim, as distinguished from that of Judah, is as specifically the subject of chapter 31 as is the restoration of Judah the subject of the chapter preceding. Very explicit is the language of the prophet Ezekiel in this matter: "Say unto them, thus saith the Lord, God, Behold, I will take the stick of Joseph, which is in the hand of Ephraim, and the tribes of Israel his fellows, and will put them with him, even with the stick of Judah, and they shall be one in mine hand. . . . And I will make them one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel, and one king shall be king to them all, and they shall no more be two nations, neither shall they be divided into two nations any more at all." (Ezek. 37: 19-22). It is very plain, again, that, whatever these words mean, they were not fulfilled in the restoration from Babylon, nor have been at any time since. They must refer to an event yet in the future.

3. In the third place, whereas the restoration from Babylon, and the rebuilding at that time of the city of Jerusalem, was followed again and again by dispersion and by a yet more complete overthrow of the city, this restoration of the latter days is uniformly represented as being absolutely final. Thus we read of

after which "it shall not be plucked up, nor thrown down, any more forever." (Jer. 31: 40.) So also, by Amos, the Lord says, "I will plant them upon their land, and they shall no more be pulled up out of their land which I have given them." (Amos 9: 15.)

These words assuredly cannot be referred to the restoration from Babylon, after which they were again pulled up out of their land, and scattered more widely and fearfully by the armies of the Romans than they ever were by the power of Nebuchadnezzar.

Final and Complete.

4. Again, we read of a restoration which shall not only be final, but complete. Thus, the Lord said by the prophet Ezekiel, "O mountains of Israel! . . . . I will multiply men upon you, all the house of Israel, even all of it." (Ezek. 36: 8-10.) So also by Isaiah the Lord promised, "Ye shall be gathered one by one, O ye children of Israel." (Isa. 27: 12.) Surely no one will insist that the restoration from Babylon satisfies such language as this. So far from all returning at that time, we are told that only 42,360 of the captives ever returned. (Ezra 2: 1, 64.) Anything approaching to a universal restoration of Israel to their own land the world has never yet seen. So, again, it is plain that whatever these predictions mean they cannot refer to the return from Babylon, but to an event which is yet in the future.

5. This is, if possible, made still more clear by what we are told of the condition of Israel thus restored. As regards they are to be in a state of independence. "Strangers shall no more serve themselves of Jacob." (Jer. 30: 8.) But since the Babylonian restoration the Jews have had to wear the yoke of the Gentiles almost without interruption. The brief quasi independence of the Jews, under the Asmonean kings, was soon followed by the beginning of a more complete subjection than ever, from which they have never yet recovered. And then, in the second place, it is always added that after that future restoration to the land the long history of Israel's apostasies shall end. Thus we read in the prophecy of Ezekiel that after the final reunion of Ephraim and Judah on the mountains of Judah, they shall not "defile themselves any more with any of their transgressions." From that time on the sanctuary of God "shall be in the midst of them forevermore." It is needless to say that such words as these cannot be applied to a restoration which, if it cleansed them from idolatry, only brought them for a while into their own land, there to commit after a time the greatest crime of their whole history, in the crucifixion of the Son of God.

6. Finally, the prophets themselves recognize the fact that there shall be

Two Restorations.

In the book of Isaiah this is said in so many words, thus: "It shall come to pass in that day that the Lord shall set his hand again the second time to recover the remnant of his people, which shall be left, from Assyria, and from Egypt, and from Pathros, and from Cush, and from Elam, and from Shinar, and from Hamath, and from the islands of the sea. . . . And He . . . shall assemble the outcasts of Israel, and gather together the dispersed of Judah from the four corners of the earth." (Isa. 11: 11, 12.)

But the Babylonian restoration was the first, and not the second; and as there has certainly been no restoration since, it follows, according to the explicit teaching of the prophet, a second restoration of Israel is yet in the future.

Here then we have no less than six independent proofs that the Scriptures do predict a regathering of the Jews into their own land, such as the world has never yet seen. Do the words of Scripture which foretell that this shall be, mean what they undoubtedly say, or are they, one and all, to be understood as merely figurative descriptions of the prosperity of the church in the latter days, or, at most, as poetic amplifications of the prophecies of Israel's conversion?

Strange, indeed, that such a question should ever have been raised! If such words as those which we have cited do not teach that Israel, the

Literal, Historical, National

Israel, shall yet be gathered into their own land, to be rooted out no more forever, we ask, with all earnestness, what words could possibly have been substituted which should have taught this? The very same terms are used in Jer. 29: 10, in predicting the return of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity, which are elsewhere employed to predict the return of the latter days. As every one knows, the event proved that these words were to be taken in their plain and evident literal sense; they meant precisely what they said, nothing more and nothing less. How, then, on any sound principles of exegesis, can any one be justified in denying that the self-same words in the same prophets, foretelling a "second" restoration, also mean exactly what they meant in the former case, namely, a literal return of the Jewish nation to their own land? We insist, on principles of interpretation which seem to us little less than axiomatic, that the the presumption in this case, for the literal interpretation of these temporal promises to Israel, is wellnigh irresistible.

TWENTY YEARS IN EGYPT.

THE Rev. A. Crombie says: "There are cases where individual mission work has been successful. I especially refer to the work of Miss Whately among the Mohammedans of Egypt for the last twenty years. She went there to recruit her health, and to return after the winter months; but the ignorance and degradation of the females aroused her sympathy, and made her wishful to do something for their enlightenment. Finding no schools for Mohammedan girls, she set herself the difficult task of establishing them. She commenced to teach them to read and sew in her own sitting-room, and the number soon rose to over twenty. Quietly and steadily the work advanced. In 1862 Miss Whately returned to England, and the work was placed in other hands; but failure of health and many discouragements caused it to be abandoned. On hearing that, Miss Whateley resolved to return. On reaching Cairo she proceeded to the deserted school-room, and, finding a well-known teacher at the door, she was sent to tell former scholars 'School is open.' Soon there was a rush of scholars on the stairs shouting the cheering words, 'Welcome, welcome, teacher! Our teacher is come back! God be praised!' By patient labor Miss Whately achieved success. She has labored, also, much among the women, visiting them in the lanes of the city, and in the fields while at work in connection with the maize, sugar-cane, and other products of the country, and testifies that she found them eager to listen to the gospel message when delivered in a kindly spirit."

THE LAST MAN ON THE WRECK.

A FEW years ago a homeward bound vessel was wrecked on the southwest coast of England. The lifeboat was lauuched, and away the men went, and were a long while at sea. Darkness set in, but the people on the coast lighted great fires so that the lifeboat might be guided on its return to shore. After awhile they saw it returning, and a great strong man, of the name of John Holden, who was on the coast, cried aloud to the captain of the lifeboat, 'Hi! hi! have you saved the men?' The captain answered, 'Ay, ay. I have saved the men'; and all hearts were filled with gladness. But when they reached the coast it was found that one man was left clinging to the mast. 'Why did not you save him?' said Holden—'why did you not save him?' 'Because we were exhaust-l,' said the captain, 'and we should all have erished if we had remained another five min-tes attempting to save one man.' 'But you ill go back—you will go back to the rescue?' hey said they had not the strength, the storm as so fierce. Holden threw himself on the shin-e, and lifted up a prayer to God louder than ne storm, that God would put it into the hearts some of those people to go to the rescue of is one man, just as Jesus Christ came to res-ue one lost world. When he had ceased pray-g six men volunteered to accompany him, and ohn Holden, with six men, were prepared to o and rescue that one man. They were pre-aring to start, when the good old mother of ohn Holden threw her arms around his neck nd said, 'John, you must not go. What can I o if you perish? You know your father was rowned at sea, and it is just two years since our brother William left; we have never heard word of him since. No doubt he, too, has erished. John, what shall I do if you per-h?' John said, 'Mother, God has put it nto my heart to go, and if I perish He will take are of you.' And away he went; and after while the lifeboat returned, and when he near-d the coast a loud voice was raised, 'Hi! hi! ohn, have you saved the man?' John answer-d, in a trumpet voice, 'Yes, we have saved the an; and tell my mother it is my brother Will-am we have saved.' Now, there is your bro-er man the wide world over; haste to the escue even if you perish in the attempt."

THE McALL MISSION IN CORSICA.

ONE of Mr. McAll's mission workers, who has one to Corsica to carry on the work so won-erfully blessed in Paris, gives a sad account of ne deplorable ignorance existing on the island. he says: "In order to reach those who never ome to meetings I generally take my meals in estaurants, where I enter into conversation ith all sorts of educated men. It would sur-rise you to hear their questions about Protest-nts, as they are utterly ignorant of the fact hat seven countries of Europe had shaken off ne yoke of the Pope, acknowledging the Scrip-ures as their only standard.

"A country schoolmaster, who for years had een wishing to know the truth, came up to me ne day at luncheon time, and most cautiously pproached the subject of salvation. The Lord sed my testimony, and saved that hungry soul. You have, indeed, opened heaven to me,' he aid in one of his letters, 'and it is now my appy privilege to influence my pupils, in order o lead them to Jesus, that they may grow up, nd not only be good citizens, but faithful hristians.' This schoolmaster lives now in a illage near Sartène, where vengeance and mur-er bring about great distress.

"At the Government Training College I was sked last year to give courses of modern lan-uages. As these normal schools are non-profes-onal, I take advantage of this liberty to intro-uce the gospel.

"Last summer, when spending my vacation at artène, I found an open door in many rich fam-ies, where prejudice had hitherto prevented all ntercourse with evangelical Christians. Even oldiers came up to my room to get gospels, and anted to hear about the finished work of our ord."

FEMALE BEER DRINKERS.

AN alarming sign of the times is mentioned the National Temperance Advocate. It quotes om a Chicago journal the statement of a res-urant keeper in that city that many women in hicago are becoming great beer-drinkers. He ys: "Ten years ago the spectacle of a woman rinking beer while lunching was so rare as to use comment. Now they come in droves, and der with the familiarity of veterans their fav-rite brands, and many of them have so far cul-vated the failing of their masculine brethren hat they are not happy unless they also have a ate of limburger. Wines and stronger drinks e little called for, but the growth of the beer-drinking habit is astonishing, and although I am in the business, to me it is really alarming." The beer propagandism of the present period, especally among women, as in Chicago, and among the young of both sexes, is the greatest obstacle the temperance reform now has to contend with. The doctrine enunciated by the Supreme Court of the United States, that the brewery and the beer-saloon are nuisances which the people of any State may cause to be abated and destroyed, should be everywhere and unceasingly proclaimed and enforced.

A CENTENARIAN'S COMFORT.

IN a volume of reminiscences, recently published, the Rev. Joseph Emery, who has been thirty-five years a city missionary in Cincinnati, Ohio, describes a visit which he paid to a Christian centenarian. He says: One of the happiest men I ever visited was old Father Cox. He lived in his own house on Elm Street, near Liberty. During my first visits, some thirty years ago, his wife was living; she was over eighty years of age, very infirm. Nothing pleased this aged pair more than to hear the Word of God and prayer, with singing. They were a happy couple, and for many years belonged to a Methodist church. After a brief illness, Mrs. Cox died, leaving her aged husband to mourn his loss. He preferred to live in his own house, and so remained for some years, lonesome, but always happy. Concerning all temporal things his memory failed, but never on spiritual things. He would forget the names of his long-tried and true friends, but he never forgot that name which is above every name. The name of Jesus was written on his heart; it could not be erased. His Book of Psalms, and Testament, and Hymn-book, were always on the table. These he would read every day.

Entering his room one day I said, cheerily: "Well, Father Cox, how are you to-day?" "Thank God, I'm as well as usual; nothing to complain of." "Don't you at times feel lonesome?" "Not very; I've always my Bible and Hymn-book, and I can draw nigh to God in prayer. The neighbors come in now and then." "Suppose death should come in some day, what would you say?" Without a moment's hesitation the aged man replied: "I'd say, Come, welcome death, I'll gladly go with thee!" "Then you feel ready to die?" "Yes, indeed; any day the Lord sees fit, I'm ready to meet Him." "You seem to be a happy man?" "Indeed I am; why shouldn't I be? I have Jesus here every day, and I love to pray to Him. I know He's forgiven all my sins, and I shall soon be with Him."

This venerable man continued in this happy frame of mind to the end of his life.

THE MARTYRDOM IN MEXICO.

IT will be remembered that last August three Protestant teachers in Guerrero, Mexico, were assassinated in a riot stirred up by a Roman Catholic priest, named Vergara. The Rev. J. Milton Greene, D. D., has recently visited the scene of martyrdom, and sends an account of his journey to the Church. In the course of it, he says: "Passing the cemetery where the precious dust of the three martyrs reposes, we were met at the entrance to the town by several brethren, who, with open arms and tearful eyes, welcomed us with a hearty Mexican embrace, and accompanied us to the residence of the widow Zaragoza, where Abraham and Felipe were murdered. Touching as was my reception, it did not absorb my attention, which was rather fixed upon the battered and broken doors, and the blood-stained walls, which remained as most impressive reminders of the awful tragedy which had occurred seven months before. There on the wall hung the book-shelves from which his murderers snatched one of the largest volumes, tore off the covers, seated himself on the helpless form, and beat it with the book, which he afterward placed in mockery under the bleeding head as a pillow. then left his poor victim, still in the agony of death, to rush with his comrades to the house of Miguel Cipriano, and complete the bloody, sickening task. Oh! as I looked at the mutilated book, which I preserve as a sacred relic still stained with that consecrated blood, and as I lay down at night on that bed where the summons to a martyr's death reached my poor boy, I realized as never before what martyrdom is in all its hideous reality, not as we paint it to ourselves afar from all shadow of danger, not as we sing of it in our moments of Christian ecstacy, not as we imagine to ourselves the white-robed blessed ones around the throne, but as it came to our dear brethren, mocking at the love of life and blasting the hopes of continued existence and usefulness in the world, breaking the hearts of loving wife and children, accompanied by physical agony and blood, nervous torture and bodily dissolution, the shrieks and groans of the dying mingling with the heart-piercing lamentations of wife and children, and the pitiless, diabolical butchery of demonized, infuriated religious fanaticism. I have never seen elsewhere such a pall of desolation as rests on the village. Scarcely a house exists, apart from those occupied by our brethren, from which the husband or the sons, or both, are not absent. Twenty-two of those who took part in the massacre have been consigned to the army and sent to Yucatan—most of them to die on its burning sands; fifteen are in the district jail at Teloloapan, one league away, of whom 'four at least,' says Governor Arce, 'will be shot,' while another fifteen are fugitives from justice. and among them the priest, Vergara, whose photographs, a hundred in number, with a circular urging his arrest, have been sent all over the republic."

A MADURA WOMAN'S EMOTION.

ALL the missionary reports dwell on the wonderful results of women's work among the heathen. One of the most remarkable comes from Madura, in the Indian Archipelago, and is published in the Missionary Herald. It appears that a Bible-woman gathered a little class of native women together, and used to speak to them about Jesus, reading to them, and explaining His life of love. One day a woman who had been a most attentive listener interrupted her with: "Are all the things you read and tell us about Jesus written in that book?" "Yes, and much more than I have yet told you." "I want a book like it; will you bring me one to-morrow?" "Yes, I will bring one, but of what use will it be to you? You cannot read it." "But I must have the book that tells about Jesus." The next day when the book was given to her, she clasped it eagerly with both hands, and touched it lovingly with her lips. Then opening the book she said, "Show me the place where Jesus' name is." As soon as it had been pointed out to her she kissed the sacred page reverently. Before the Bible-woman left the house the happy owner of the book asked that the place might be marked so that she would always find the name of Jesus.

Another woman, who has only been under instruction a few months, has been much impressed with the thought that it is her duty to go from house to house, like the Bible readers, teaching and telling of the love of Jesus. She is very anxious to read in the New Testament, and has persuaded her husband to help her, so that she may learn more rapidly. Not long since she came early in the morning, and entreated the Bible-woman to go with her to a neighboring village to preach, saying she wished to begin to tell what she had learned about Jesus, but was afraid to teach in her own village, where she was well known, for the people would laugh at her because she knew so little. Surely God has blessed this branch of the work in answer to many earnest prayers.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Candidate of the Republican Party for the Presidency, as stated in part of our edition last week, is General Benjamin Harrison, of Indiana. This result was reached on Monday, June 25, on the eighth ballot. The inside history of the operations which led to the Convention's choice, is probably known to very few. It appears probable, however, that it was due mainly to an urgent cablegram from Mr. Blaine, requesting his friends to cease voting for him. The tactics of the Blaine men were devoted to the maintenance of the deadlock, in the hope that the candidates, despairing of a nomination, would withdraw and leave the way open for the nomination of Mr. Blaine by acclamation. Mr. Sherman, however, had clung too long to the hope of being the candidate to withdraw while a chance remained, and as Mr. Blaine would accept nothing short of a unanimous and uncontested nomination, Mr. Sherman's persistence rendered such a nomination impossible. Realizing the fact, Mr. Blaine sent his cablegram, and his friends, perfectly understanding who was responsible for their defeat, went over to Harrison rather than Sherman. Gen. Harrison's record, both as a soldier and a statesman, is clean, and we may therefore hope that the campaign will be free from the odious personalities which disgraced the campaign of 1884. He is a grandson of William Henry Harrison, who was elected ninth President of the United States in 1840, and died one month after his inauguration. He is fifty-five years of age, and has served one term in the United States Senate. He is a member of the Presbyterian Church, and has for many years conducted a large Bible class in the Sunday-school of the First Presbyterian Church in Indianapolis.

Mr. Levi P. Morton, the Republican Candidate for the Vice-Presidency, was chosen on the first ballot. The importance of carrying New York State, and the difficulty of doing so with a Western man at the head of the ticket, in the face of a Democratic ticket headed by a New York candidate, doubtless led to this choice. He is a native of Vermont and is sixty-four years of age. His father was a Congregational minister, and his mother's brother was the Rev. Levi Parsons, the first American Missionary to Palestine. From the latter, the candidate derives his first names. Until 1863 Mr. Morton was in the dry-goods business, but in that year he established a bank in New York in partnership with Mr. George Bliss. Five years later, in partnership with Sir John Rose, for some time Finance Minister in Canada, he opened a bank in London under the name of Morton, Rose & Co. In 1878 he was elected to Congress and took a prominent part in financial discussions. President Garfield appointed him Minister to France, where he became exceedingly popular. He has made several large charitable gifts, one of the best known being a quarter share in the freight of the ship Constellation, which in 1880 was sent laden with food for the starving people of Ireland. Like Gen. Harrison, Mr. Morton is a strong Protectionist.

President Cleveland was Formally Notified of his nomination on June 26, by the Committee appointed by the St. Louis Convention. In the course of his reply, accepting the nomination, he said: "Familiarity with the great office which I hold has but added to my apprehension of its sacred character, and the consecration demanded of him who assumes its immense responsibilities. It is the repository of the people's will and power. Within its vision should be the protection and welfare of the humblest citizen, and, with quick ear, it should catch from the remotest corner of the land, the plea of the people for justice and for right. For the sake of the people, he who holds this office of theirs, should resist every encroachment upon its legitimate functions, and for the sake of the integrity and usefulness of the office it should be kept near to the people, and be administered in full sympathy with their wants and needs." Republicans will probably disagree with the President as to the other parts of his speech, but this passage is one that will commend itself to patriots of both parties. Whether Mr. Cleveland is re-elected or General Harrison succeeds him, this conception of the President's responsibilities and duties is that which the American people will like to see dominant in the White House.

Judge Kelley's Suggestion in the House on June 27, that the Mills Tariff Bill be dropped, produced more amusement than was reasonable. No one imagines that it can be enacted, as, if it should pass the House, it would be thrown out by the Senate. Mr. Kelley contended that as the Democratic National Convention had endorsed the bill, and the Republican National Convention had explicitly condemned it, the issue between the parties was fairly joined and might await the national verdict at the polls in November. His suggestion, however, was not accepted, and the Democratic leaders stated that they were determined to proceed with the bill even if it involved sitting until March 4. There are probably more amendments to come from the Democratic side yet, and it is possible that some of the Republican amendments may be accepted. In any case the Republicans wish to go on record in the details of the bill, and neither party is justified in casting on the people the responsibility of deciding a question which lies within the jurisdiction of Congress.

The Formation of an Indian Territory With Indians in the principal offices, is the logical outcome of the recent Indian Council at Fort Gibson. Important steps were taken to unite the five civilized tribes. The main difficulty, however, arises in their own opposition to the holding of lands in severalty. So long as the tribes hold the lands in common, the chief men will be rich in comparison with others, and will exercise an influence which must repress individual effort, and retard civilization. If the projected union of the tribes is realized, a partition of the lands and individual ownership will become a necessity, and in that result lies the one hope of settling the vexed Indian problem.

The New Emperor of Germany Delivered two important speeches last week. On Monday he opened the Reichstag with imposing ceremonies, and his speech on that occasion somewhat relieved the apprehensions of war excited in other lands by his accession to the throne. He said: "In foreign politics I am resolved to maintain peace with every one, so far as it lies in my power. My love for the German army, and my position in it, would never induce me to attempt to endanger for the country the benefits of peace unless the necessity for war is forced upon us by a hostile attempt on the Empire or one of its allies. Our army will assure us peace, or if peace be broken it will enable us to fight for it with honor. That, with God's help, will be possible for it to do by reason of the strength it has derived from the army laws you recently unanimously voted." The assurance is welcome, though it is extremely guarded, and bears marks of having been revised, if not dictated, by Bismarck. Unhappily, monarchs who have large armies at their disposal are apt to think that "war is forced upon them," and history shows that both parties to all wars have made that their plea. Therefore, though the statement that the Emperor desires to maintain peace is reassuring, the general tone of his remarks does not inspire strong confidence in his pacific intentions. A second speech which he made on Thursday, at the opening of the Landtag, has caused considerable uneasiness among German liberals at home. He plainly intimated that his policy would be on the lines of that of his grandfather, between whom and the Landtag there were numerous disputes. He also hinted that constitutional government was an experiment, which might be abandoned if found irksome. The impression his remarks produced was that he would hold tenaciously to all his prerogatives, and that constitutional liberty in Prussia would be a very precarious and exceedingly limited privilege.

Reports of Disastrous Floods Along the Line of the Mexican Central Railroad have been published. It is possible that the loss of life is exaggerated, but the estimates range from 700 to 1,500, and from El Paso comes the statement that 1,000 bodies have been recovered. The adobe houses at Silao and Leon were easily undermined, and swept into ruins, and the water rose so rapidly that many of the occupants were overwhelmed without realizing their danger. The Mexican Central Railroad has suffered much, and 100 miles of it is said to be under water. Thousands of people have been rendered homeless, and much property has been destroyed. The National and State Governments are rendering aid to the sufferers.

A Parliamentary Defeat has Befallen the followers of Mr. Gladstone, in the House of Commons. On June 25, Mr. John Morley, who was Secretary for Ireland in the Gladstone administration, directly challenged the Government's procedure in Ireland. He moved a vote of censure on the Government for its administration of the Irish Crimes act, as calculated to undermine respect for the law, estrange the people of Ireland, and prove injurious to the interests of the Empire. In the course of the debate on the proposal, Mr. Chaplin, a conservative member, had the bad taste to taunt Mr. Gladstone with his advanced age in making a vigorous personal onslaught on the venerable Liberal leader. Mr. Gladstone's retort must have convinced his assailant that age had not diminished his powers as a ready speaker. Mr. Gladstone said that undoubtedly he felt in some respects the encroachment of age, but added, amid loud cheering, "I shall be able for a little while, I hope, to cope with antagonists of the calibre of the right honorable gentleman." Apart from this personality the debate was adverse to the Liberals, and Mr. Balfour, the present Irish Secretary, evoked great enthusiasm by declaring that the Government had succeeded beyond their expectations in suppressing lawlessness in Ireland. Whether they would be allowed to proceed, he did not know, but he did know that the future of Ireland could only safely rest on foundations of honesty, liberty, and law. When the vote of the House was taken the vote of censure was rejected by a majority of ninety-three, showing that the alliance between the Unionists and the Tories was still in full force.

Young Ladies Driving Horses and Phaetons in which young men were being conveyed to the polls was the novel sight witnessed at Independence, Mo., on Monday of last week. The question at issue was the sale of liquor for four years in Jackson County, of which Independence is the county-seat. A despatch from that city states that women were the most active among the workers on the Prohibition side. On the voting day they were everywhere at the polls, at the lunch-stands, and on the street corners, wearing silk badges and with "dry" ballots in their hands. Girls stood at the polls, and at every voting place was a banner on which was inscribed: "Temperance beaus or no beaus at all." Hundreds of children carried banners through the streets, and about the voting precincts. Some of these were inscribed: "Sow whisky ballots and reap drunken boys." The legend, "We can't vote, but we can suffer," was carried by the women in a parade, and occupied a prominent place in each ward precinct. Many of the best people of the town were interested in the contest, and it was no infrequent sight to see young girls with horse and phaeton covered with streamers, bringing in young gentlemen to vote for local option. It was mainly due to this activity that the prohibition of the sale of liquor in Jackson County for the ensuing four years was carried by over 200 majority.

A Mother's Strange Bequest Came Before the Surrogate of New York, last week, on the protest of her brother-in-law, who contended that it was invalid. The woman, who died recently in a charity hospital in New York, made and executed her will in due form a few weeks before her death. She had no lands or houses or money to give away; no stock or securities of any kind; no jewelry or silver plate, or books or pictures or heirlooms to leave to surviving kindred. She had but one bequest to make—her little nine-year-old daughter Harriet, who would be left an orphan at her death, her father having died six years before. Her bequest was the gift of this child to the Society of St. John—and till she became of age. She appointed the society as her executor and trustee. The child's uncle, with whom she is living, is strongly attached to her, and is disputing the will in the hope of retaining her in his family. It is said that the uncle's objection caused some surprise in court. If it had been the will of a millionaire that was disputed there would have been no surprise, but that any one should contend over a legacy so valueless as a child, astonished the officials. That is the fault of this mammon-worshipping age. Money is held in higher esteem than souls. We have only to think of the cross to realize what is the true value of one soul. (John 3: 16.)

Red Fire on the Mountain Peaks of Oregon. an illumination in celebration of the Fourth July was a project under discussion at Portland, Ore., last week. It was decided, on June 9, to raise a subscription to illuminate the whole chain of snow-covered peaks stretching from northern California nearly to the British Columbia line, a distance of seven hundred miles, with red fire. The Portland committee in charge of the celebration undertook the task of illuminating Mounts Hood, St. Helen's, and Adams. A party from Eugene promised to illuminate the Three Sisters, near the head of the Willamette Valley, about 120 miles south, and a party from Ashland to illuminate Mount Pitt, a peak forty miles north of California. Arrangements were made with the citizens of Lassons, Cal., to burn red fire on the summit of Shasta, the grandest of Pacific coast snow-peaks. The citizens of Seattle, W. T., agreed to illuminate Mount Rainier, and the Port Townsend people to take care of Mount Baker. It was stated that if the night proved cloudless every person on any of the hills back of Portland would be able to see the fire burning on five mountains, namely, Rainier, St. Helen's, Adams, Hood, and the Three Sisters. Each illuminating party would be able to see the work of at least one of the others. From Rainier to see Hood, Hood to see the Three Sisters, and so on down to Shasta. As more than one of these peaks are over twelve thousand feet high, the illumination, if carried out yesterday, must have been a wonderful spectacle. It reminds us of that more awful scene which is yet to take place in the days of the final convulsion, which many now living will witness. (Rev. 8: 8.)

A Tailor's Broken Promise Led to a Suicide in Boston, Mass., last week. A young couple were to have been married in that city on June 27. The bride was ready at the appointed time, the minister was at the house, and the guests assembled, but the bridegroom did not come. After waiting two hours, a messenger was sent to his home to ascertain the cause of his delay. It was found that the young man had ordered his wedding suit from his tailor, who had failed to send it at the time appointed. The young man fumed and fretted over the delay, and at last, being of a very excitable temperament, the thought of the wedding party waiting for him, of his bride's vexation, and the disgrace which he imagined would fall upon him, overthrew his reason, and he shot himself. He was taken to the hospital, where he received skilful treatment, but he died the next day. That disappointment over the non-arrival of the clothes at such a time should have caused chagrin is not surprising, but to have caused it to a degree prompting self-destruction argues a mind without stability. Had the young man been a follower of Christ his faith would have raised him above the power of the tempter. The trials and vexations of life cannot unbalance the mind of one who trusts in God, for he has the promise that he will be kept in perfect peace. (Isa. 26: 3.)

A Boston Philanthropist's Blunder has Defeated his benevolent intentions, Mr. T. W. Higginson, the historian, in describing the Harvard University in the columns of a contemporary, last week, calls attention to a serious decrease in the income it derives from a philanthropist's bequest. Some twenty years ago a Boston merchant left about half a million dollars to the University for special purposes. He did not wish the principal to be touched, but to be invested, and the income applied to the support of professors, and the maintenance of students. To avoid the risk of loss he eventually decided to invest it himself. In his will he stated that having long observed the fluctuations of real estate in Boston he had taken pains to invest this property in a manner approaching absolute certainty, i. e., in improved real estate in the very heart of Boston. This was all that could be done for safety, it then seemed, by the most experienced investor. For a time the result was all that the testator wished; but then came the fire, which destroyed the very property which he had chosen as the one absolutely safe investment. The structures were rebuilt, but the cost has so depleted the original bequest that the income derived from it is now less than one-fourth of the amount needed to carry out the testator's designs. Thus the effort to attain absolute certainty, though conducted with skill, experience, and purity of motive, has failed, and becomes another warning to all who are making this world's wealth their trust. (Matt. 6: 19, 20.)

A Train was Attacked by a Bull on Staten Island, N. Y., on June 25. For some time past, a bull, belonging to a farmer there, has been the terror of women and children. During the recent hot spell the temper of the animal has become worse, and it was difficult to confine him to his pasture. On Monday he broke loose and strayed on the railroad track, and resisted all attempts to drive him off. Soon a train came along, and the engineer, on seeing the valuable beast on the line, blew a shrill whistle, to scare him out of the way. The bull faced the engine, and answered with a resounding bellow. The engineer slowed up, but saw that he could not bring his train to a standstill before reaching the animal. He blew a second whistle, but it only seemed to excite the bull, who lowered his head, pawed the ground, and replied by another defiant bellow. The locomotive struck him, and rolled him about sixty feet, the train slowing all the time. With the agility of a cat he regained his feet, and furiously charged the engine. This time he was crushed under the wheels, and half the train passed over his body. Charging a train was a very different business from that of scaring women and children. The notion that led the bull to his destruction is dangerous for men as well as animals. Previous successful exploits over weak opponents is apt to engender the belief that the victor is invincible. Then his downfall is near. An awful illustration of that fact will be witnessed in the near future when Antichrist, grown arrogant and blasphemous by conquest, falls beneath that Stone which grinds those on whom it falls to powder. (Luke 20: 17, 18.)

AN APOSTOLIC PRAYER.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And the Lord direct your hearts into the love of God, and into the patient waiting for Christ." II Thess. 3 : 5.

A Difficult Voyage Proposed—To the Innermost Recesses of the Sacred Fatherland—Paul Prays God to Direct Them—A Parallel Translation—I. Two Precious Things—The Love of God—A Gateway into Paradise—Its Central Importance—Its Infallible Constancy—The Patience of Christ—II. Two Eminent Virtues—What Characters will be Produced—Patience in Waiting for the Lord's Coming.

FOR the moment, Paul in spirit is coasting the purple shores of the celestial country. With his Thessalonian friends he is making a joyful voyage within hail of Emmanuel's land. The sail is bright with the sunlight, and the keel is marking a silver track behind it. The apostle's happy soul has left far in the stern the deceivableness of unrighteousness and the rocks of error. It comes into his heart that he would gladly steer his friends into certain of those lovely creeks which run up far into the inner recesses of the sacred fatherland. Shall he turn the helm that way? He pauses; for the navigation is difficult. One must be greatly expert to thread the streams which descend from the sunny fountains. It is not given even to all saints to follow all the windings of the rivers of delight.

Paul had been with his brethren at sea in the place where the Lord sank all their transgressions in the depths, and he had been with them in sore affliction, when neither sun nor moon appeared, and in all such seafaring he was in his element; but, brave pilot as he was, he could not pretend to penetrate all the richer and rarer experiences which bring elect souls nearest to the heart of the great Father; and therefore, instead of offering to be their pilot, he bowed his head, and prayed, "The Lord direct your hearts into the love of God, and into the patient waiting for Christ."

into the goodly land, which the apostle desired for his friends, was one which mere insight, wit, knowledge, or instruction could never give them. If so, he would have directed their minds that way at once. But the perception of the heavenlies is only given to heavenly faculties. The attainments which Paul desired for his friends were not beliefs of the head, but indwellings of the heart. To return to our figure of sailing up the creeks and rivers into the centre of the glorious country—that delicious voyage was only possible to the more refined and spiritual powers of the soul. Those sweet waters could only be navigated by the heart, and the heart itself would need divine direction before it could find the entrance to them.

Paul could give his converts external directions, he could guide his more advanced brethren in the work, walk, and warfare of life; and he did so with all simplicity and earnestness. He urged them to abound in this grace, and to avoid that folly; but he felt that his exhortation would be inefficient unless their hearts were touched. Here he felt and so he cast the grand matter of heart-work upon the Lord Himself. As the heart naturally baffles all physicians, so spiritually it is far beyond our knowledge. Who among ministers can guide you? Therefore may "the Lord direct your hearts." God alone knows the heart, and God alone can rule it; for this ruling Paul makes request. "The Lord direct your hearts." Let us borrow his prayer, and turn it to our own personal use: "Domine dirige nos."

But here we must do a little translating or interpreting. Observe in the Revised Version a difference of translation. There we read "into the patience of Christ." This is a great improvement upon our former translation; but, although it is accurate, it is not complete: it does not take up the whole of the meaning. In our Authorized Version we have "the patient waiting for Christ"; but in its margin we find "into the patience of Christ"; showing that the earlier translators felt that "the patience of Christ" would be a good translation; and yet, after considering it in all its bearings, they thought that Paul did not quite mean the patience of Christ, but that he meant a patience which we exert towards Christ. It there not weight in this? Does not the context support it? As the love into which we are to be directed is love to God, so the patience into which we are to be directed must be towards Christ.

I. To begin, then, here are

Two Precious Things

for us to enter into. The first precious thing which we are to enter, is the love of God. Beloved, we know the love of God in various ways. Many know it by having heard of it, even as a blind man may thus know the charms of an Alpine landscape. Poor knowledge this! Others of us have tasted of the love of God, have talked about the love of God, have prayed and have sung concerning the love of God. All very well, but Paul meant a dove of a brighter feather. To be directed into the love of God is quite another thing from all that we can be told of it. A fair garden is before us. We look over the wall, and are even allowed to stand at the door, while one handeth out to us baskets of golden apples. This is very delightful. Who would not be glad to come so near as this to the garden of heavenly delights? Yet it is something more to be shown the door, to have the latch lifted, to see the gateway opened, and to be gently directed into the Paradise of God. This is what is wanted—that we may be directed into the love of God. Oh, that we may feel something of it while we meditate upon it!

Beloved, we come, when we are taught of the Spirit, to enter into the love of God by seeing

Its Central Importance.

The love of God is the source, centre, fountain and foundation, of all our salvation, and of all else that we receive from God. At the first we are much taken up with pardoning grace. We are largely engrossed with those royal robes of righteousness with which our nakedness is covered. We are delighted with the viands of the marriage banquet: we eat the fat and we drink the sweet. What else would you expect from starving souls admitted to the abundant supplies of heavenly grace? Afterwards we begin more distinctly to think of the love that spread the feast, the love that provided the raiment, the love that invited us to the banquet, and gently led us to take our place in it. This does not always come at first; but I pray that none of us may be long receiving the gifts of love without kissing the hand of love; that none of us may be content to have had much forgiven without coming and washing the feet of our forgiving Lord with our tears, and declaring our deep and true love to Him.

Again, I pray that we may be directed into the love of God as to its infallible constancy. The unchangeable Jehovah never ceases to love his people. It would be to be directed into the love of God only to find it a thing of the past. Oh, believing soul, thou hast not to deal with things which once were gems of the mine, but now are dreams of the night. Oh, no! the love of God abides for ever the same. When thou wast without strength, "in due time Christ died for the ungodly." Since thou hast known Him He has never varied in His love. When thou hast grown cold, He has loved thee; when thou hast grown cruel, He has loved thee. Thou hast grievously provoked Him till He has taken down His rod and made thee smart; but He has loved thee in the smiting. With God there is as much love in chastening as in caressing. He never abates in fervor towards His ancient friends. Has He not said, "I am the Lord; I change not; therefore ye sons of Jacob are not consumed"?

This love we ought to know, and if the Lord will lead us into it we shall know that it is omnipresent. I mean by this, that whatever condition we may be in, the Lord is still active in love towards us. Thou hast come out alone: time was when thou didst come to the house of God in company; but it may be that graves and desertions furnish sad reasons for thy present solitude. Still, thou art not alone; thy Father's love is with thee. Thou art, to-night, perhaps, in a very strange part of thy spiritual experience: thou hast not gone this way heretofore.

The Road is Not New

to eternal love. Go where thou mayest, the air is still about thee; go where thou mayest, thy Father's love is all around thee. Higher than thy soarings, deeper than thy sinkings, is all surrounding love. Thou art going home, perhaps, to a bed from which thou shalt not rise for months. Thou hast no apprehension, just now, of what lies before thee in the immediate future. It is as well thou shouldst not know. I should be slow to lift the curtain of merciful concealment, even if it were in my power to do so. There is no necessity to know details when one or two grand facts provide for all contingencies. Trouble not thyself about the morrow. If thou art to be sick, or if thou art to die, thy Father's love will be with thee still. Therefore go on, and fear not.

I have thus spoken a little upon a vast theme. I fear it will seem to you mere surface-work; and yet I pray that it may lead you to deep knowledge of divine things, so that you may apprehend God's love as yours, and then may feel the power, the unction, the savor, which comes out of His love, making all your heart as sweet and aromatic as a chamber in which a box of precious ointment has been broken. Oh, that you might be led into the innermost secret of the Lord's love till it shall saturate you, take possession of you, carry you right away! The Lord direct you into the love of God.

The second part of the prayer upon which we shall have to dwell is, "The Lord direct your hearts into the patience of Christ." Now, beloved, I have another great sea before me, and who am I that I should act as your convoy over this main ocean? Here I am lost. I cannot take my bearings. I am a lone speck upon the infinite. I will imitate the wise apostle, and pray, "The Lord direct your hearts into the patience of Christ."

What a patience that was which Jesus exhibited for us in our redemption! To come from heaven to earth, to dwell in poverty and neglect, and find no room even in the inn! Admire the patience of Bethlehem. To hold His tongue for thirty years—who shall estimate

The Patience of the Carpenter's Shop?

When He spoke, to be despised and rejected of men, what patience for Him whom Cherubim obey! Oh, the patience of the Christ to be tempted by the devil! One can hardly tell what patience Christ must have had to let the devil come within ten thousand miles of Him! There is not much in a patience which cannot help itself; but you well know that all the while Christ could have conquered all foes, chased away all suffering, and kept off all temptation; but for our sakes, as Captain of our salvation, that He might be made perfect through suffering, His patience had its perfect work, right on to Gethsemane. Do you need that I tell you this? Golgotha, with all its woes, its "lama sabachthani," its abyssmal griefs, do I need remind you of the patience of Christ for us when the Lord laid on Him the iniquity of us all?

Oh, the patience within Christ Himself! God never seems so like a God as when He divinely rules Himself. I can understand His shaking earth and heaven with His word; but that He should possess His own soul in patience is far more incomprehensible. Marvel that omnipotent love should restrain omnipotence itself. In the life and death of our Lord Jesus we see almighty patience. He was very sensitive—very sensitive of sin, very sensitive of unkindness, and yet, with all that sensitiveness, He showed no petulance, but bore Himself in all the calm grandeur of Godhead. He was not quick to resent an ill, but he was patient to the uttermost. He spoke burning words sometimes: His mouth could be like the red lips of a volcano as He poured out the burning lava of denunciation upon "scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites"; but the resentment was never aroused by any injury done to Himself. When He looked that way it was always gentleness: He cried, "Father, forgive them; they know not what they do." Oh, the wondrous patience of Christ!

Elevating Not Sensuous.

Now, beloved, what is wanted is, that we be directed into this patience of Christ. The choicest saints in different ages of the world have studied most the passion of our Lord; and although nowadays we hear from the wise men that it is sensuous to talk about the cross and the five wounds, and so forth, for my part I feel that no contemplation ever does me so much real benefit as that which brings me very near my bleeding Lord. The cross for me! The cross for me! Here is doctrine humbling, softening, melting, elevating, sanctifying. Here is truth that is of heaven, and yet comes down to earth: love that lifts me away from earth, even to the seventh heaven.

O friends, I can wish you no greater blessing than to be directed into these two things—the love of God, and the patience of your Saviour. May the Lord lead us into both of them at this hour, and continue upon us the heavenly process all the rest of our lives, in all experiences of sorrow and of rapture, and in all moods and growths of our spirit!

II. But now I must ask your attention, for the few minutes that remain to me, to what is, perhaps, still the real gist of the text: Here are to be acquired. "The Lord direct your hearts into the love of God." Beloved, let the love of God to you flow into your hearts, and abide there till it settles down and bears on its surface the cream of love to God, yielded by your own heart. The only way to love God is to let God's love to you dwell in your soul till it transforms your soul into itself. Love to God grows out of the love of God.

Well, now, concerning love to God: if you receive it fully into your souls it will nourish the contemplative life. You will want to be alone. You will prefer to sit silently at Jesus' feet, while others wrangle over the little politics of the house. You will give up being busy-bodies, talking in six peoples' houses in an hour: quietude will charm you. You will love no company so much as the society of Him who is the Best and the Most. It will also animate the active life if you love God. You will feel that you must yield fruit unto your Lord. Your soul, when full of the love of God, will cry, "I must go after the wanderer; I must care for the poor; I must teach the ignorant." You cannot love God and be lazy.

Love to God will also arouse enthusiasm. We want more persons in the church who will be a little daring—rash men and women who will do things which nobody else would think of doing, such as will make their prudent friends hold up their hands and say, "How could you? If you had consulted with me, I could have given you as to how it ought to have been done." This has been my lot of late. I have been surfeited with notions as to how I should have acted. Yes, my friend, I know you of old. You have wisdom at your fingers' ends. But let me quietly whisper that you would have done nothing at all; you would have been too anxious to save yourself from trouble. There was never a child that was near drowning but what the man that plunged in and drew him out of the river ought to have done it in a better way. He wetted himself too much; he waited too long, or he handled the drowning one too roughly. Alas, for silly criticisms of gracious deeds! If you come to love God with all-consuming zeal you will not be hindered by criticisms.

And this love, better still, will transform the character. It is wonderful what a difference love makes in the person that is possessed with it. A poor timid hen that will fly away from every passer-by loves its offspring, and when it has its chicks about it, it will fight like a very griffin for its young. And when the love of Christ comes into a timid believer, how it changes him! It takes the love of sin away, and implants a sublime nature. God only knows what a mortal man can yet become. Of women sunken in sin, what saints the Lord has made when He filled them with His love!

When the sun shines on a bit of glass bottle far away, it flashes like a diamond. A little fleecy vapor in the sky rivals an angel's wing when the sun pours itself upon it. Our Lord can put so much of Himself, by means of His love, into the hearts of His people, that they may be mistaken for Himself.

in heaven, when he fell at the feet of one of his brethren, the prophets; for he had come to be so much like his Lord, that John could hardly tell the one from the other. Had he forgotten that word, "We shall be like Him; for we shall see Him as He is"? It doth not yet appear what we shall be, but love is the transfiguring power in the hand of the Holy Spirit. If the heart be directed into the love of Christ, it is on the highway to holiness.

Lastly—I am sorry that time will fly so fast just now—we want our hearts to be directed into patience towards Christ. What a subject is this! Beloved, if our hearts are directed into patience towards Christ we shall suffer in patience for our Lord's sake, and we shall not complain. Those about us will say, "It is wonderful how resigned he seems"; or, "How gladly she bears grief for love of Christ!" And if it be the suffering of reproach and scorn for Jesus' sake, if we are directed into the patience of Christ, it will not seem to be any trouble at all. We shall bear it calmly, and in our hearts we shall laugh at those who laugh at us.

Yet it is not all patience of suffering that we want. We want

The Patience of Forbearing.

We must learn not to answer those who blaspheme. "Bear, and forbear, and silent be." Chew the cud in peace. Put up with much, When reviled, revile not again. The Lord direct your hearts into the patience of Christ. We shall also want the patience of working—working on when nothing comes of it—pleading on with souls that are not converted—preaching when preaching seems to have no effect—teaching when the children do not care to learn. We need the patience of Christ, who set his face like a flint, and would accomplish his work, cost what it may. He never turned aside from it for a moment. The Lord direct our hearts into patient working!

Then there is the patience of watching in prayer—not giving it up because you have not received an answer. What? Did a friend say she had prayed for seventeen years for a certain mercy, and now meant to ask it no more? Sister, make it eighteen years, and when you have got to the end of eighteen, make it nineteen. May the Lord direct our hearts into the patience of Christ in prayer! We long kept Him waiting; we need not complain if He makes us tarry His leisure. Still believe, still hope, still wrestle, until the break of day.

We want to be directed into patience towards Christ, and especially in patience in Waiting for His Coming.

That, no doubt, is very justly inferred, and so it is put in our translation very prominently: "Patient waiting for Christ." He will come, brothers; He will come, sisters; He will come at the appointed hour. To the jots and tittles God's word will stand. He will come to the tick of the clock. We know not when; we need not ask; but let us wait.

I am sorry, very sorry, that there are persons here to whom all this must seem a strange lot of talk. They know nothing about it. Dear souls, you cannot at present know anything about it. You must first be born again. A total change of heart must come over you before you can enter into the love of God or the patience of Christ. May that change take place to-day, before you go to sleep! If the Lord shall lead you to seek his face, this is the way to seek it: trust His dear Son. Lifted on the cross is Jesus Christ, the great Propitiation for sin. Look to Him, and looking alone to Him you shall be saved. He will give you the new heart and the right spirit with which you shall be enabled to enter into the love of God and the patience of Christ. The Lord direct you at this very hour, for Jesus' sake! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

A THREE DAYS' BRIDE.*

A YOUNG captain in the officers' ward interested me greatly, and I went daily to visit him. A refined and delicate fellow, with a very sensitive nervous organization, he had suffered severely. He had endured two amputations of the arm, which still refused to heal, and a third was ordered. He had become so reduced that the surgeon feared the result, and so informed the patient. Then the young officer telegraphed the girl who was to be his wife, and who had only delayed coming to him because of his earnest entreaty that she would not encounter the horrors of a hospital, unless he sent for her. She came as fast as the lightning express could bring her, and, at her own desire, before he submitted to another operation, they were married by the chaplain. The arm was removed to the shoulder. For a day or two there was hope of him, and then he sank rapidly.

I entered the ward about two hours before his death, and found his three days' bride ministering to him with inexpressible tenderness. There were no tears on her cheek, no lamentations on her lip, but her face shone with unnatural brightness, and she seemed to be lifted above the depressions of her surroundings. Mrs. —— and myself were about to pass them by, not thinking best to intrude on their privacy or sorrow, but the look in the husband's eyes invited us, and we moved softly toward the couch of death. He was conscious, and understood, but could only speak in occasional whispers.

"You are ready to go?" asked Mrs. ——, my hostess, who had seen much of him.

For answer, he looked at his young wife, who was gazing in his face. She understood him, and answered:

"Yes, we are both ready—he to go, and I to stay." And turning to us, she added, "When he enlisted I gave him to God and the country. I expected this, and am prepared for it."

And next morning I met her embarking for home, with the body of her beloved. Her own relatives were a married sister, and a brother in the Army of the Potomac. She was taking the coffined remains to the widowed mother of the dead man, who lived near Centralia, Ill., and who had two other sons in the army, and a son-in-law. The exaltation of her spirit still upbore her, and I saw that nature would not assert itself till her duties to the dead were over.

A Methodist Backslider.

I had nearly completed the tour of this ward, making memoranda for letters which the men desired written, or of some want to be gratified, or some errand done—every bed being occupied by a very severely wounded man—when I halted beside one on whose handsome face the unmistakable look of death was settling. He labored painfully for breath, and large drops of perspiration stood out on his forehead.

"You are suffering a great deal," I said.

"Oh, yes! oh, yes!" he gasped, "I am! I am! But not in the body; I can bear that; I don't mind pain, I can bear anything, but I can't die! I can't die!"

"But perhaps you may not die; it is not certain but you may recover. While there is life there is hope, you know."

"Oh, no, I can't live—I know it—there's no chance for me. I've got to die—and I can't die! I am afraid to die!"

I drew a camp-stool to his bedside, and, sitting down, I told him of Christ's mission on earth, and assured him that however great had been his sins, they would be forgiven of God, since he was penitent, and sought forgiveness.

"Can't you get a Methodist minister?" he asked. "I used to belong to the Methodist church, but I fell away.

One of the attendants remembered that the hospital steward was also a Methodist minister, and hastened to find him. To him I communicated the particulars of the case, and besought him to assist in allaying the anguish of the dying man, which was distressing to witness.

The announcement that the steward was a Methodist minister was beneficial to the sufferer. To him he listened eagerly. "The love of Christ," was the chaplain's theme. "He had only to trust in the Saviour, only to ask for forgiveness, and God, who was always ready to pardon, would grant his prayer. Christ had died to save just such conscience-smitten, stricken, penitent souls as he"—thus ran the chaplain's talk.

"Can't you sing, chaplain?" I inquired.

Immediately, in a rich, full, clear tenor, whose melody floated through the ward, and charmed every groan and wail into silence, he sang hymn after hymn. All of them hymns so well known to his dying auditor that I saw he followed the singer, verse after verse. The music affected him, as I had hoped. The burden rolled from the poor boy's heart, and in feeble, tender tones he said, "It's all right with me, chaplain! I will trust in Christ. I can die now!"

"Sing on, Chaplain!" I suggested, as he was about to pause to make reply.

Patients, attendants, surgeons, all in the ward, glowed under the soaring melody, and the dying man's face grew rapturous. Then the chaplain was summoned away by a call from his office. It was getting late in the afternoon, for I had tarried a couple of hours at this bedside, when my friends came from the other wards of the hospital to say that it was time to return.

"Don't go! stay!" whispered the fast sinking man. The words rushed to my memory, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto Me," and I promised to remain with him to the end. The end came sooner than any one thought. Before the sun went down, he had drifted to the immortal shore.

THE TWO SCHOOL-FRIENDS.

THE vows of life-long friendship interchanged between school-girls when they separate at the end of school life, the promises to write every week to each other without fail, and the interest they are to take in each other's doings as long as they live, are apt to pass into forgetfulness in less than a year. New associations and relations in life drift them apart, and though the kindly recollection remains, communications become rare, until they cease altogether. With Helen Dysart and Amy Morton it seemed probable that there would be an exception, for between them the bond was more than one of mere personal regard. They were both converted about a year before leaving the seminary, and happened to be the only girls there who made a profession of religion. This tended to isolate them from the others, though they grieved that it should be so, and strenuously endeavored to draw the other girls, not only into their friendship, but to lead them into the joy and peace of the gospel. They failed, and their failure drew them closer to each other, as there was a tendency in the seminary to ridicule their religion. When they separated, a regular correspondence began, and was kept up for some months.

It was a letter from Amy Morton that brought a sudden ending to the correspondence. "Do not, I entreat you, dear Helen," she wrote, "make the engagement you are thinking of. You admit that your lover has no sympathy with your religious life; how, then, can you hope for happiness? Though, as you say, he pledges himself never to interfere with your church-going and your religious duties, you will naturally feel a constraint in all that. He may be as exemplary in his life as you think, and as devoted to you as he professes, but as he cannot enter into the highest and best of your thoughts and hopes, he will inevitably draw you aside into worldliness, or he will become estranged from you. I solemnly warn you that this match, brilliant as it is, will be a misery to you, and I beg of you for you own sake to break the engagement if you have pledged yourself."

Amy received no answer to this letter, and rightly concluded that Helen Dysart was offended by her faithfulness. A short time afterward, the engagement against which she had protested was made public, and a year later she saw the announcement of the marriage.

Amy Morton's own life during the next few years was one of busy usefulness. In the world, yet not of the world, her light shone steadily, guiding many of her poorer friends, and not a few among her fashionable acquaintances, into the channels of joy and peace. More than once suitors had sought her hand only to retire before the vigorous life and purpose which subordinated all to her work. She was derided by some, and pitied as a fanatic by others, but she persevered, and she had the joy of seeing some who had ridiculed her come to her in their troubles, in preference to all others, for consolation and advice. "She may be peculiar, my dear," said one who knew her, and had not always been her friend, to another who spoke slightingly of Amy Morton's fanaticism. "She may be peculiar, but her peculiarity is one that many of us could ill spare. She is the only girl I know of, who utterly forgets herself for the sake of others. Amy does not know what selfishness is, and self-denial is a pleasure to her. I suppose it is her religion that does it for her, and I honor her for it." Certainly Amy's life was leading her friends to believe that there was power in "the love of Christ that constraineth."

It was about five years after the writing of that letter to Helen Dysart that Amy Morton was one of a large party assembled at a well-known hospitable mansion in the holidays. "Mr. and Mrs. Plymdale are coming to-morrow," said her hostess to Amy on the night of her arrival. "I am so glad that you will be here to meet them. Mrs. Plymdale is quite one of the queens of society now. She distanced all her rivals in Washington last season. A little reckless and imprudent, perhaps, but always charming." Amy did not recognize the name, but the next day, when Mrs. Plymdale arrived, she recognized the lady with delighted surprise as no other than her old friend Helen Dysart. She was very different now from the school-girl Amy had known. Her self-possession, ready wit, and vivacious manner made her the life of the brilliant circle. All eyes were attracted to her, and the incense of delicate flattery which was offered to her seemed to be her ordinary atmosphere. Amy was astonished that so plain and simple a girl could have developed into the brilliant creature who fascinated all within her reach.

Another side to the picture was disclosed, however, to Amy, that night. Throwing a light shawl over her shoulders, Mrs. Plymdale made her way to Amy Morton's bedroom. "I am so glad to see you again, my dear girl," she said, in her old impulsive way. "You are just the same darling creature as ever. What have you been doing all these years? They have made more difference to me than to you."

"Yes, you have developed wonderfully; I should scarcely have known you. Have you been happy?"

"I have had a great deal of pleasure; that is the nearest approach I have made to happiness. It is not quite the same thing, I find. Oh! Amy, I have sold myself for pleasure, and I am a long way from happiness. You were quite right in that dreadful letter you wrote me. I have become a worldling. The temptation was too strong. You do not know the life I led the first year. I did try to be good; it was impossible. The kind of men and women that came to the house, and the continual urging to go to this place and the other, made me yield. I was flattered, dazed, excited; my ambition stimulated, and gradually I gave up all. Amy, it is nearly three years since I prayed! What is to become of me? I dare not be alone; I dare not think. Sometimes I feel as if I should become demented. When I looked at your pure, innocent face to-night, and thought of what I had become, I trembled. Oh! I can never get back to the right again: I am lost, utterly." The brilliant, worldly woman bent her head on her friend's shoulder and sobbed hysterically.

Amy had comforted many a poor waif of the streets, and pointed her to the Saviour. She had stood by the bedside of degraded women in despair, and had led them to trust in the atoning blood of Christ, but she had never had so difficult a task as to lead back this backslider to God. She resisted all appeals. She had no desire to return. A life of pleasure was the only life open to her now. God had cast her off as she deserved, she said, and there was no hope for her. Amy would not believe such things, and she continued pleading with her for a long time; but even she, who had seen the most degraded turn from their evil ways and repent, had less hope of this beautiful, fascinating woman, whom Satan had enticed with the cup of worldly pleasure. One resource only—that of prayer—was left to her; and feeling her own utter powerlessness, she committed her friend's case to God, praying that she might even yet be rescued, even though it might be as by fire.

Helen's Pitiful Confession.

THE EPOCHS OF A LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. L. S. Keyser.

The Syren's Enchantment.

THE entrance of Belle Havelock into Hadley Madelling's life was an epoch of momentous importance. She was very beautiful, and that fact has a mighty influence in the relations of the sexes, no matter how studious and pre-occupied a young man may be. But the charm Belle cast over Hadley was due still more to the piquancy of her manner, the incisiveness of her remarks, and the keen intelligence she showed in dissecting the characters of mutual acquaintances. She seemed to be destitute of reverence altogether. Neither age nor social standing protected any one from her caustic ridicule. It was delicious to listen to her witty raillery, but it occurred to Hadley more than once, during the early days of their acquaintance, that she would have been more charming had she been more gentle and womanly. Still, even in her most cynical moods, she was fascinating; and an evening in her society could not be dull.

At his first call upon her at her home, she received him with unconcealed pleasure, and evidently was glad that he had availed himself of the permission she had given him to visit her. The evening was passed in vivacious conversation, chiefly on matters connected with the college. Belle gave no clue to her religious condition, but, from the glances Hadley took at her library, he inferred that her favorite authors were agnostics and avowed unbelievers, from which he concluded that there would be no difference of opinion between them on religion.

That she attended church, however, he knew, for he had seen her there; and he therefore, according to the custom in vogue at the college, asked the pleasure of accompanying her on the following Sunday evening. The request was granted cheerfully.

It was with some degree of impatience that he waited for Sunday evening. Undoubtedly it would be regarded as a triumph in the college, if he should be the first young man to appear in public with this beautiful and intelligent girl, who had already attracted considerable attention among the students. It was, therefore, with a feeling very like exultation that he walked down the street by her side before the time for the evenning service.

"What church do you propose to attend?" she inquired, after they had gone a few blocks.

"I have no preference, and will leave it to you to choose," he replied.

"A stranger is to preach to-night at the Jefferson Street Church. Perhaps we might have a mental tonic there, if such a thing is to be had in a church service. If you have no choice, we will go there."

He readily assented, for he, the sentimental egotist, was not so anxious that the services should be profitable, as that he might display the social triumph he had won. As the last bell was ringing, they stepped into the church, and were politely ushered to a pew.

It was an unfortunate service for them. Unhappily, the "strange" clergyman who was to deliver the discourse was one of those crude, silly, conceited declaimers who find their way occasionally into a Christian pulpit. Gifted with a voluble flow of words, and possessed of a retentive memory, crammed with a mass of unassimilated knowledge, while lacking the logical faculties for its arrangement and use, the poor man talked as one beating the air.

In the first place, he chose a sensational text—one that might be made to point in any direction that suited the preacher's unbridled fancy, instead of one that would admit of a practical and logical development. And this text was tossed about and played with in the most capricious fashion. That class of persons who are excited by claptrap might have thought it a splendid sermon, but to thinking people it was painful to listen to his rambling, incoherent declamation and fanciful interpretations.

The preacher, being saturated by an immense amount of vanity, thought that, as he was preaching in a college town, it would be a good opportunity to parade his knowledge of "science" and "philosophy." He proceeded to deliver a wordy diatribe against science as the enemy of the Bible. In several passionate outbursts, he denounced the hypothesis of Darwin, calling it Darwinianism, greatly to the amusement of the students present. Then he made a lunge at the "evolution theory," speaking of the ape as "the undeveloped grandpapa" of a number of eminent scientific men, several of whose names he mispronounced. Some of the students in the audience gave way to convulsive laughter. All this vituperation was dashed off in an apparently pugnacious and ill-humored spirit.

But worst of all, he made several very ungenerous assaults on scepticism, calling it abusive names, instead of pointing out its errors. It was denominated "senseless," "blatant," "corrupt," and even "devilish." Scepticism, he said, was a crime. Sceptics were rebels. They dared to doubt the word of God Himself. Fancy the blasphemous impiety of the created being doubting the word of the Creator! Apparently, the poor man could not conceive of honest doubt, had no idea that the sceptic whom he abused only required to be convinced that the Bible really is the word of God to believe and obey. Evidently this would-be preacher was more of an expert at browbeating than at argument. He was more anxious to parade his unsystematized knowledge than to reclaim the wanderer.

From the corners of his eyes, Hadley furtively watched the changing expressions on the face of the girl beside him, and was almost pained to see her hard, angry look. She could not hide her deep disgust, and turned away with an impatient curl on her lip. It was barely possible for her to endure the speaker's puerile and high-flown peroration.

When they were clear of the dispersing crowd after the service, Miss Havelock burst into a ringing laugh, which did not seem to be the expression of real merriment, but there was an intonation of irony in it.

"Mr. Madelling, that was an intellectual banquet, was it not? 'A feast of reason and a flow of soul,'" she said, with an effort at good-humor.

"Now," thought Hadley, "is the time to get an insight into her theological views." So he said, tentatively: "Do you not think that it was on a par with the usual quality of the sermons we hear?"

"I have heard better," was her rejoinder; "but, it is true, there is very little mental nutriment in the effusions of the pulpit." And then, pausing a moment, as if in doubt whether her next remark would meet with a favorable reception on the part of her interlocutor, she added: "But it is no wonder, when we consider the subject-matter of their discourses. That is sufficient to cramp and dwarf any mind."

"Ah! you mean that their text-book furnishes very little mental stimulus, do you?"

"Mr. Madelling, I shall stop this circumlocution ot once," she said, earnestly. "I have the courage of my opinions, and I think it cowardly to conceal them. It is impossible that one who has thought and read as much as you have should accept these Hebrew legends as the word of God. If I am rightly informed, your attitude toward the Bible is not altogether friendly. Allow me to say that I sympathize with you. My intellect rebels against such inane teaching as that to which we listened to-night.

While Miss Havelock was making these observations, Hadley could see by the light of the moon that her face was flushed with feeling. Here was a girl, bright and winsome, having an intellectual affinity with him cultivated literary tastes, and surrounded with all the advantages of wealth; what could there be lacking to render them entirely congenial? Yet the feeling of warmth and ardor that had been aroused in him when he first saw her in Chapel Hall, and afterward when he met her in the grove, was becoming cooled by degrees. She was just as beautiful as before; he still admired her intellectual acumen; but when he saw that she rejected religion with cold scorn, and ventured out boldly into a rigid intellectualism, he felt chilled. A woman destitute of tender, reverent sympathies would never awaken his love. Yet she charmed him, and he was loath to quit her society so early; and, therefore, when she politely asked him to step into the cosy room that she called her study, he was not slow to accept the invitation.

"And so you think," he said, when he was seated, "that these gospel stories are all a myth!"

"Not exactly that," she replied, quickly; "but I think them the ideas of men of bygone ages, which their successors are trying to impose upon an age that has outgrown them. I do not pretend to account for the hold that they have taken on the minds of many people, any more than I account for the remarkable spread of Buddhism, or Mohammedanism. And I am willing to grant that there are many valuable things, historical, ethical, and practical, in the Bible; but when the churches want to saddle it upon us as the only revelation of God, and as the only guide of life, and especially when they threaten us with a most fearful doom if we discard it, then it is time to call a halt to their assumptions. Such dogmatic claims fill me with indignation, and make me almost hate the Bible." She sat looking at him with a flushed face, her eyes flashing with a deeper color than their usual azure.

"Ah! she could hate with a vengeance," thought Hadley. Then he said aloud: "Miss Havelock, you have been travelling the same road that I have travelled, and I can fully sympathize with you. But what is to be done? The Church holds its thousands in thralldom, and by some means has captured nearly all our institutions of learning, so that our hands are tied, and our mouths closed. Everything is against us. What can we do?"

The girl rose, and said with feeling, "Go and teach them better—these deluded people. Why should Christians monopolize the pulpits, the platforms, and the press of the country? Give the new light to the world. Disseminate it with tongue and pen, and show the slaves their chains. If I were a man, I should employ every agency available for that purpose. It is a mission of which a man of staunch moral fibre might well be proud."

"But are you aware of the obstacles in the way of such an undertaking?" objected Hadley, in melancholy tones. "Why, Miss Havelock, only three years ago my colleague, Mr. Dane, and myself tried, in the lyceum halls and class-rooms of the college, to gain a hearing in behalf of free-thought, but were sneered at as mere tyros in learning, or were summarily hushed up."

"You are older now," urged the girl; "you are more matured in character, your intellectual gifts are recognized and respected, your compeers in the College will not undertake to cow you now; and if they do, rise to the occasion, as Gambetta did when he was hissed, or Wendell Phillips when he was threatened with mob-violence—turn on your opponents, and overwhelm them with logic and vehement earnestness. You and your friend have had your eyes opened, and it is your duty to open the eyes of others."

"Do you wish us to become martyrs?"

"Mr. Madelling, are you too—too timid to give expression to your honest convictions from the platform of yonder college? Will you let the cause of truth suffer, merely because you lack the courage or fortitude to advocate it, and endure the consequences?"

She seemed taller than her natural stature as she stood imperiously beside him. She was not the same girl as the one he had met a week ago, naïve, rollicking, careless. She looked older, but she was almost as peerless as a queen in that majestic attitude.

He sat before her too nonplussed to answer, and she resumed: "They allow sentimental utterances there that are favorable to religion. It was said, only last Saturday morning, by some flamboyant young orator, that 'the Bible is the bulwark of our nation, the ægis of our liberties.' The Professors looked on with a smile of approbation—some of them did. Nobody said 'Stop! we cannot have such sentiments advanced here.' Why should one phase of the question be discussed, and not the other? If this religious balderdash is tolerated by 'the powers that be,' ought they to object when the plain, unvarnished truth is told? Some one must be the pioneer of every new truth. A few strong, eloquent appeals would revolutionize the college, and open the eyes of the blind votaries of religion."

"You have certainly put in a strong plea," acknowledged Hadley. "But there is one thing that has troubled me of late. What good will it do to open people's eyes? Will it make them better men and women to teach them that the Bible is not true? Will it put a more substantial foundation under our social structure? Will it comfort anybody's sorrow to tell them, in our Huxleyan way, that we do not know whether there is a heaven or not? Will it be salutary, in any respect, to disabuse people's minds of their religious errors, and tell them that our ignorance is as dense as their presumption is nauseating?"

There is a queer psychological feature about the thinking of many self-styled sceptics, that deserves to be noted. They can, when they feel so disposed, state the case of the Christian as tersely and strongly as their own. The reason of the ease with which they shuffle their position is because they themselves are in uncertainty as to what they shall believe. Yet there was considerable sincerity in Hadley's questions, as well as in what he added: "These considerations cut the nerve of my enthusiasm sometimes, and make me pessimistic."

For a moment the girl's eyes dropped, and she sank into a chair, with a deep flush in her face. But in a few moments she rallied.

"Mr. Madelling, error is never really beneficent. What we want is truth, whether it brings happiness or sorrow. People ought to face the truth bravely. It can never be healthful for the mind to be held in superstition and error. Here is a mother whose idolized child is dead. Though her heart break, it is better for her to face the truth, and bear it with fortitude, than console herself with the delusion that her child is yet alive. It is the hallucination of dupes and fools to cling to error because it affords them a little temporary relief from sorrow. So it is the work of a disordered brain to believe in heaven because it affords comfort, when we know nothing about it. The desire for heaven, as Spencer says, is, with most people, only a kind of 'other worldliness.' It is putting a premium on virtue, appealing to mercenary motives to incite people to its practice."

"I am at one with you there," exclaimed Hadley, admiringly. "We ought to practice virtue for its own sake. In the same spirit we ought to welcome truth. My conscience responds to your counsel. But who shall run the gauntlet of unpopularity by becoming the pioneer of these new truths?"

"Why should not you and your friend?"

"Ah, but—"

"But what?"

"One naturally shrinks from incurring public disfavor."

"You will not, sir, to any great extent," declared the girl, emphatically. "It is the sure road to true popularity. You will receive the plaudits of the élite of thinkers, those who are governed by reason and intelligence. Besides, you will be the spokesman of a large class of persons, whose sentiments you will voice and enunciate, and become the deliverers of a class of honest souls who are chafing under the thraldom of religious intolerance."

"Perhaps you are right. There are, no doubt, more infidels than Christians suppose. But why do not they express their opinions?"

"Because they have no leader," said the girl. "They will follow a valiant and competent champion. You are the man for that position in the college."

"I will think of what you have said," he rejoined, rising and looking at his watch.

GOD'S PRESENCE PROMISED.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for July 15, Ex. 33: 12–23; 34: 1–7. Golden Text, Matt. 28: 20.

The People without God's Presence—The Tabernacle Removed—God Conversing with Moses—Moses' Desire to Know God's Way—Spurious Revelations in Modern Days—The Test of Revelation—The Presence Promised to Moses—His Desire to See God—Dying to See Him—The Revelation Granted.

THE glory of our holy religion is a present God. "Lo I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world" (Matt. 28: 20), is an inspiration for every moment of a true Christian's life. When Moses was interceding with God for the people, God said to him, "Depart and go up hence, thou and the people which thou hast brought up out of the land of Egypt, unto the land which I sware unto Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob, saying, Unto thy seed will I give it, before thee . . . for I will not go up in the midst of thee, for thou art a stiff-necked people; lest I consume thee in the way." Moses brought this message to the people, and when they "heard these evil tidings, they mourned, and no man did put on him his ornaments." The ornament and glory of Israel was the pillar of cloud and the pillar of fire: let that be absent, and every other ornament was a mockery. Painted and gilded churches, vestments, beautiful architecture, fine music—O how hollow they all are, when the Lord is absent. Let us put off all our ornaments until it can be said, "The Lord is there." (Ezek. 48: 35.)

And I will Send an Angel

Then "Moses took the tabernacle," the place of meeting with God, "and pitched it without the camp, afar off from the camp, and called it the "Tabernacle of the Congregation." God could no longer be met in the midst of His people. God is not found in the midst of those whose hearts are after golden calves, music and dancing, and other self-indulgence or self-glory. "Every one which sought the Lord, went out unto the tabernacle." Moses was the first to go out, and the people, who dared not themselves draw near, stood at their tent-doors, watching him. But the sin of the people did not hinder Moses from communion with God. As he "entered into the tabernacle, the cloudy pillar descended and stood at the door of the tabernacle." The people knew that God and Moses were entering into conversation, and every man of Israel arose and worshipped (i. e., prostrated himself) in his tent door.

And the Lord Talked with Moses.

"The Lord spake unto Moses face to face, as a man speaketh unto his friend." Oh, how many formal, useless prayers there are, because men throw prayers into the air, and do not first wait in reverent awe to know that the cloud descends, and that God is there. Moses' intercourse with God was no experiment, no haphazard work; he spake with Jehovah face to face. He was deeply and personally acquainted with God, and he communed with Him without any constraint. This is the privilege of every child of God who is reconciled to Him by the death of His Son, and who is yielded up to Him in living sacrifice, "alive unto God," and his members "instruments of righteousness unto God."

Here, again, we have a sample of Moses' communion with God. He "said unto the Lord: See Thou sayest unto me, Bring up this people: and Thou hast not let me know whom Thou wilt send with me." Moses was familiar with the guidance of God, he understood God, and was at home with Him; but he could not accept a second-hand guidance—an angel could never take the place of God with him. The people had said, "Speak thou with us, and we will hear: but let not God speak with us, lest we die." (Ex. 20: 19.) Moses, on the contrary, would have God guide him, but let not an angel, or any other being, come between him and God. Moses knew God face to face; the people knew God only through Moses. Oh, let us have first-hand dealings with our God! Moses went on to plead: "Thou hast not let me know whom Thou wilt send with me, yet thou hast said, I know thee by name, and thou hast also found grace in My sight. Now, therefore, I pray Thee, if I have found grace in Thy sight, that I may know Thee, that I may find grace in Thy sight; and consider that this nation is Thy people." "The wisdom of the prudent is to understand His way." (Prov. 14: 8.) That Moses knew as well as Jeremiah, that "the way of man is not in himself: it is not in man that walketh to direct his steps." (Jer. 10: 23.) He had learned by his own experience in the mistake he made in Egypt, when he took matters into his own hands and slew the Egyptians and when he had to be put to school by God in the land of Midian; that truth of God, "My thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways My ways, saith the Lord. For as the heavens are higher than the earth, so are My ways higher than your ways, and My thoughts than your thoughts." (Isa. 55: 8, 9.) Jesus says to us, "I am the Way," and He is indeed the Way into all that is of God. "Show me now Thy way," said the same Moses who had once so signally taken his own way. No one is fit to be a leader of others who has not learned to let God guide him. And yet the question of guidance is perhaps more caricatured by Satan than any other, and perhaps there is nothing in which we are more apt to make mistakes. The Roman Catholic and the Ritualist shirk all the responsibility by casting it on the priest or "spiritual director," but the judgment-seat will prove whether God is a party to this arrangement. The Mormon takes his guidance from which pander to the desires of licentious men, who all the time crushed the womanhood and dignity out of woman, and declared polygamy to be the guidance of God. The Agapemonites, Shakers, and the few followers of Mr. Wood, of Brighton, declare, on the contrary, that it is wrong to marry, and they separate husband and wife. A considerable number of self-called religious teachers of the day give out that they are called to live a faith life, and, caricaturing real faith, they quarter themselves on some hospitable Christian and tell him God guides them to stay on with him! Now all these diverse and perilous teachings cannot be really the guidance of God. How, then, shall we know the true from the false, how discern that which is of God and that which is not of Him? "To the law and to the testimony (the whole council of God, not a few isolated passages), if they speak not according to this word it is because there is no light in them." Read the Bible as a whole, with a will yielded up, and God will never let it confuse. True, all erroneous teaching is claimed by its disciples to come from the word of God, but it is the word of God read in the light of self-will.

Shew Me Now Thy Way,

God answered Moses, "My presence shall go with thee, and I will give thee rest." But Moses was speaking for the people as well as for himself, and he said, "If Thy presence go not with me, carry us not up hence. For wherein shall it be known here that I and Thy people have found grace in Thy sight? Is it not in that "Thou goest with us?

So Shall we be Separated,

I and Thy people, from all the people that are upon the face of the earth." It is our calling and privilege to be a peculiar people (Tit 2: 14), but the peculiarity must not consist in oddity or eccentricity, but in the presence of God with us. This distinguished Joseph, whether in the family in Potiphar's house, in the prison or the court; this distinguished Elijah, and made him superior to King Ahab, and all the assembled prophets of the idolatrous Jezabel. This made Paul so to speak and act that jailers, judges, and kings fell down and trembled before him.

Again Moses prevailed with God. It was not by "vain repetitions," not by urgent and desperate appeals, but by his quiet, unalterable confidence in the goodness of God. He could not accept that God would break a promise or go back from His word. The Lord said unto him, "I will do this thing, also, that thou hast spoken: for thou hast found grace in My sight, and I know thee by name." Then Moses grew bold, and made a further request, this time for himself: "I beseech Thee, show me Thy glory." What is the glory of the Lord? God is our glory, but there is none greater than the Lord, to be His glory." "And He said, I will make all My goodness pass before thee." The glory of the Lord is what He is, His goodness. But to see the face of God, man must die; for there shall no man see Me and live." "Sirs, we would see Jesus," said some Greeks to Philip; but when Philip told Jesus, He said, "Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone; but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit." (John 12: 21–24.) "Blessed are the pure in heart; for they shall see God." Paul saw God in everything, and believed that all things worked together for good; but, then, Paul was crucified with Christ, nevertheless he lived; yet not he, but Christ lived in him. (Gal. 2: 20.)

"Thou Canst Not See My Face:

Then the Lord said to Moses, "Behold, there is a place by Me, and thou shalt stand upon a rock; and it shall come to pass, while My glory passeth by, that I will put thee into a cleft of the rock, and will cover thee with My hand, while I pass by: and I will take away Mine hand, and thou shalt see My back parts; but My face shall not be seen." The only safe place for a sinner in the presence of God is hidden in the rock Christ Jesus. All Moses' faithfulness to God could never put away sin. Only hidden in the cleft rock, in the wounds of Jesus who died for him, could he stand before God.

But before Moses could see God, he must remedy his rash act of breaking the tables of stone in his anger at the sight of the golden calf, God said, "Hew thee two tables of stone, like unto the first (the tables were to be no longer the work of God, but only an imitation), and I will write upon the tables the words that were on the first tables, which thou breakest." Moses had given way to anger and hopelessness when he broke the tables. He had pleaded with God to have patience, but he had lost patience himself; therefore he must make the tables anew. At God's command, he presented himself with the unwritten tables in his hand, and then God answered his prayer. The Lord descended in the cloud, and stood with him there, and proclaimed

The Name of the Lord.

And the Lord passed by before him, and proclaimed, "The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious." It is the glory of God to be merciful and gracious—"long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth. Keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity and transgression and sin." All this is the glory of the Lord. But it is His glory to be just, also; that will, by no means, clear the guilty; "visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children, and upon the children's children, unto the third and to the fourth generation." Moses had known enough of God to trust Him before this; he was acquainted with His power and His faithfulness; he knew Him as a Holy God, but this overwhelming revelation of His goodness was more than all he knew before. He had always felt safe with God. All the thunders of Sinai had not the terror for him which the absence of God would have had; and again he prostrated himself, and, in the light of the new revelation of God, which he now had, he urged anew. "If now I have found grace in Thy sight, O Lord, let my Lord, I pray Thee, go among us; for it is a stiff-necked people; and pardon our iniquity and our sin, and take us for Thine inheritance." God let Himself be conquered by the faith of His servant, and He reneweth His covenant.

NOT KNOWING.

I know not what shall befall me,
God hangs a mist o'er my eyes,
And so at each step of my onward path,
He makes new scenes to rise,
And ever joy He sends me, comes
As a sweet and glad surprise.

I see not a step before me,
As I tread on another year.
But the past is still in God's keeping,
The future His mercy shall clear,
And what looks dark in the distance,
May brighten as I draw near.

For perhaps the dreaded future
Has less bitter than I think;
The Lord may sweeten the waters
Before I stoop to drink.
Or, if Marah, must be Marah,
He will stand besides its brink.

It may be He keeps waiting
Till the coming of my feet,
Some gift of rare blessedness,
Some joy so strangely sweet,
That my lips should only tremble,
With the thanks they cannot speak

O, restful, blissful ignorance!
'Tis blessed not to know,
It hold me in those mighty arms
Which will not let me go,
And hushes my soul to rest,
On the bosom that loves me so.

So I go on not knowing,
I would not if I might;
I would rather walk in the dark with God,
Than go alone in the light:
I would rather walk with Him by faith,
Than walk alone by sight.

My heart shrinks back from trials
Which the future may disclose,
Yet I never had a sorrow,
But what the dear Lord chose;
So I send the coming tears back,
With the whispered words "He Knows."

Christian Work in Mexico.

Through the reading of the Holy Scriptures translated into Spanish some earnest souls in Mexico have, by God's blessing, been led to a clear knowledge of the Gospel. From their numbers able preachers of the Christian faith in its primitive purity have been raised up, around whom congregations have been gathered from among the humble poor, who have been the first to publicly welcome and defend the pure Gospel in Mexico. The members of these congregations, rich in faith, have worked earnestly and bravely for Christ and His truth among their fellow countrymen in that beautiful Southern portion of North America called Mexico. Schools have been established by them, in which large numbers of bright boys and girls have received a good secular education and have been carefully taught the Christian faith. From the children thus educated faithful Christian workers have been raised up. A Mexican Branch of the Church of Christ, that maintains the faith in its purity and integrity, has been organized among these native Christians in the Republic of Mexico. The members of this Mexican Church of Christ, though gathered mostly from among the poor, are yet doing a most important Christian work. To continue that work, we need to pay a few leading workers small monthly salaries, and also to defray some current expenses. To raise the needed funds we have formed a society with an office at 43 Bible House, New York, U. S., and should be pleased to have many of our fellow Christians join this society by becoming regular contributors to its treasury. We are trying to secure monthly or quarterly contributions to meet the regular monthly expenses of the work. In order to continue and extend the work, we wish to raise four hundred dollars a month, by endeavoring to have four hundred persons each give on an average one dollar every month to this object, leaving the donors to give less or more as they may be able and willing.

We earnestly invite all who will, to join us in this systematic effort in behalf of the cause of Christ in Mexico, by becoming monthly subscribers to this fund. We have already regular subscribers whose gifts amount monthly to over eighty dollars, and a growing circle of friends who are forwarding us occasional donations.

This Mexican Church of Christ is a very effective instrumentality through which to do Christian work among the many millions on this Western Hemisphere who speak the Spanish language, comparatively few of whom have ever had a Bible in their hands. A beautiful church building has been secured in the City of Mexico as the centre of the activities of this Mexican Church of Christ. Through the workers connected with that centre more than forty congregations have been gathered from among the poor in different parts of the Republic of Mexico. We have some faithful and able preachers now in the field, but more young men need to be trained for the ministry. Multitudes of Protestant children in Mexico, some of them orphans, need to be educated. We make three requests of you, Christian reader: first, that you will, if possible, become a monthly or quarterly subscriber in behalf of this Christian work; second, that you will try and induce your friends also to contribute to it; third, that you will remember this precious work in Mexico in your prayers.

We most sincerely thank all who are already generously contributing to this Christian work for their timely and generous gifts, and we earnestly invite many others, to unite with us in aiding it by also becoming monthly subscribers in its behalf. Those who may not feel that they can give as much as a dollar a month are earnestly asked to give what they can, whenever they are able—EVERY LITTLE HELPS. Fellow Christian, if you will generously consent to contribute a dollar a month or more or less to the work, will you kindly inform me of the fact? Contributions either large or small can be mailed directly to my address as follows:

William II., Emperor of Germany.

SCENE IN THE DEATH CHAMBER OF THE LATE EMPEROR FREDERICK III. OF GERMANY.

WILLIAM II., EMPEROR OF GERMANY.

HAVING already described somewhat extensively in previous numbers of this journal the character of the young monarch whose portrait appears on the first page, it is only necessary here to summarize briefly the events of his life, and to note the new indications furnished by his recent public utterances.

Frederick William Victor Albert was born on January 27, 1859, and is consequently twenty-nine years of age. Like all Hohenzollern heirs to the throne, he has received a most careful military education, having been given a commission as second lieutenant in the Guards on his tenth birthday by his grandfather, the late Emperor William I. His military education, moreover, was in no way mere child's play, for he was subjected to the strictest discipline, and, as he evinced an ardent love for military matters, he eventually became one of the smartest officers in the service, and thoroughly acquainted with all the minute and manifold details of military administration. He served in turn with infantry, cavalry, artillery, and engineer regiments, passing examinations of efficiency in each branch; and neglected nothing which could contribute towards making him fit to take command in the field. Not that was wholly military; for he studied for some time at Bonn, and subsequently spent several years in mastering the complete machinery of the Civil Service, under the eye of Dr. Asschenbach, President of the Province of Brandenburg. Moreover, in order to fit the young Prince for his future position, his grandfather requested Prince Bismarck to take him in hand, and initiate him into the mysteries of statesmanship and foreign diplomacy, and thus Prince William, whose force of character greatly resembles that which distinguishes the Iron Chancellor, early conceived a reverence for the great statesman and his policy, which has had a marked effect upon his character.

Before all, however, the Prince showed an all-engrossing devotion to the pursuit of arms; so much so as to inspire the prophecy in more than one quarter that he would in later years develop that military genius which characterized his famous predecessor, Frederick the Great. Indeed, he has never concealed his desire to win laurels for himself and soldiers on the field of battle—a desire which has been encouraged by many of his seniors, and which has made him immensely popular with the army. The new Emperor, since the death of his grandfather, has had a considerable share in the affairs of the state; his father, by a special rescript on March 29, empowering him to "take a direct part therein." In all things he has shown himself a staunch disciple of Prince Bismarck.

The Emperor's first words, on his accession, were addressed to the army and navy, in proclamations which were issued so promptly as to suggest a suspicion that the young man actually wrote them while his father was still alive.

His Proclamations

were conceived in a spirit of despotic principle, indicating his conviction that he was accountable to God alone for his conduct as Emperor, and was in no sense responsible to the nation. This was held by his grandfather, and was excusable in the veteran of ninety, but is ridiculous in the hot-headed young man of twenty-nine. In his address to the army, he alludes to the sense of honor and duty which his glorious ancestors had implanted in the army, and declares that he and the army will stand together in an indissoluble bond, in peace and storm. In the navy his Majesty states that he has, since his earliest youth, felt a warm and lively interest, and he knows that every member of it is prepared to give his life for the honor of the German flag, wherever it may be. The tone of both proclamations implies that he relies on his fighting men to execute any project, righteous or wicked, which he forms. But notwithstanding his martial ardor, it is generally considered that the weight of responsibility which now rests upon him, together with the counsels of Prince Bismarck, will act as a wholesome check upon the warlike propensities which are attributed to him, though it is evident that he will be more ready to rush into war than was either of his immediate predecessors.

To the Reichstag,

as to the Landtag on June 25 and 27, the Emperor used language of similar tenor. As an influential journal remarked: "The Emperor's speech to the Reichstag means, if it means anything, that, with Austria, and Italy, the German Empire will continue to maintain international relations based upon treaty stipulations, but that with Russia the personal relations between Czar and Kaiser will stand for the interests of Germany. This is personal government indeed. It is something so boldly tyrannical and irresponsible that it takes the breath away. The old Emperor might have exercised the power implied by the young Emperor's words, but he would not have avowed the purpose. Never in the nineteenth century has the imperial prerogative been so bluntly asserted; and what makes it worse is the fact that the peace of Europe may at any time depend on the whims of a madcap and a madman. So far as the immediate effect of his words is concerned, his utterances have no significance. But they are important in showing that this young man has no sympathy with modern ideas of government. He wants to be not only as absolute as William I. or Frederick II., but to exercise an absolutism as barbarous as that of the Great Frederick's father. William II. would carry Germany back to the middle of the last century."

The young man's admiration for Prince Bismarck may lead him to rely on that statesman's guidance for a time, and so he may be kept from egregious folly, but should he in some crisis act as did King Rehoboam (1 Kings 12: 1–16), whose spirit he has, he, too, may find that "a haughty spirit goeth before a fall." (Prov. 16: 18.)

THE EMPRESS OF GERMANY.

(See Portrait on first page.)

THE new Empress was married to the present Emperor, on February 27, 1881, when he was but little more than twenty-two years of age. Her name is Augusta Victoria Fredericka Louisa Fedora Jenny, and she was the eldest daughter of Duke Frederick of Schleswig-Holstein Sonderburg, Augustenburg, who had died the year before, a disappointed, aggrieved, and dejected man, because he had been despoiled of his inheritance and expelled from his realms by the King of Prussia. The alliance in question, which had been arranged by his Royal Highness's most influential female relatives, was welcomed with sincere approval throughout the Fatherland. Four sons have been born of this marriage, the eldest of whom, now the "German Crown Prince and of Prussia"—that being the official version of his actual title—came into the world on May 6, 1882. (His portrait, in his miniature military uniform, appears on page 444.) He bears the names of Frederick William Victor Augustus Ernest.

An important factor in

of the new Empress has its rise on this side of the Atlantic. She has formed a close and intimate friendship with an American lady, the daughter of Mr. David Lea, the wealthy banker. Miss Mary Lea is now the wife of Count Waldersee, an officer of distinction in the German army, and a great favorite of Von Moltke. The pretty American lady has unbounded influence over the Empress, and scandal hints that the Emperor himself is more apt to take her advice than that of his wife, with whom he does not lead an ideal life. "Like all persons of hot head and somewhat self-sufficient disposition," says the New York Tribune, "the new Emperor is as soft as wax in the hands of a clever and clear-headed woman. Now that the young William has succeeded to his father's crown, and the Crown Princess has become Empress, the rôle of the fair American may become a commanding one, and the 'power behind the throne' vested in the person of Mary Lea, Princess of Noer and Countess of Waldersee."

As explaining in some degree the influence of the Countess Waldersee over the Empress, it is stated that when the latter was married she did not enjoy the favor of her mother-in-law, the English Princess, who is now the Dowager Empress of Germany. This placed her at some disadvantage in the Court, as the mother-in-law is admitted to be one of the ablest and most brilliant women in Europe, while the daughter-in-law is not highly gifted with natural talent, nor burdened by book knowledge or accomplishments. The mother-in-law is somewhat intolerant of "stupid women," and perhaps a little too plainly classed her daughter-in-law in that category. The Princess William therefore was only too glad to seize the helping hand held out to her by Count Waldersee's wife, and to avail herself of the relations between them to turn to her for guidance.

Count Waldersee is now placed in the exalted position of deputy to Von Moltke, as that great general's advanced age necessitates his having an assistant in his duties. His own choice fell on Count Waldersee, and the Emperor naturally approves of the arrangement. Some high office at court will probably be found for the Countess, who will doubtless be able to aid her pupil now to repay with interest some of the humiliations she suffered at the hands of the brilliant but somewhat caustic English Princess. A recent cablegram intimates that the English court is to be taught that under the brief reign of the late Emperor there was too much English influence exerted in German affairs, and that for the future the Queen of England and her daughter the Dowager Empress will not be encouraged to give their advice, or to meddle in any way in social or political life in the German court.

THE DEATH-CHAMBER SCENE.

IN accordance with German custom, an artist was summoned to the Palace of Friederichskrohn immediately the late Emperor breathed his last, to take photographs of the chamber, the silent figure on the bed, and the mourning group around it. Scarcely a shade paler than he had been during the last days of his illness the dead Emperor's face reclined on the snowy pillows, framed by hair and beard, light brown rather than gray in color. The expression of that face was peaceful beyond description. The spectators could not restrain their tears as they gazed on those placid features. The Emperor's bed stood removed from the wall, in which there is an alcove that would not allow the air to circulate. It was a common iron bedstead with brass ornaments. Besides the snowy linen, nothing was visible but a dark counterpane. The Emperor had a small silk kerchief tied round his neck to hide the disfiguring hole where the canula had been inserted, upon which rested a golden chain with three lockets, the central one containing the Empress Victoria's miniature when a child. Upon the breast rested a small laurel wreath entwined with scarlet ribbon, and having two white roses in the centre. This laurel wreath was sent to the Emperor by his wife the Empress Victoria after the battle of Woerth. The roses were the last she gave him. The Emperor's hands were laid upon the cavalry swore he used in 1870. He was placed in the coffin in the same position.

Behind the bed there stood a shabby gray arm-chair, prized by the Emperor far above his other belongings. It is the arm-chair in which Frederick the Great breathed his last. At the lower end of the bed stood a small table supporting a beautiful wreath of laurels.

An Autopsy

was subsequently held by order of the new Emperor William, although the Dowager Empress Victoria was averse to it. Public feeling in Berlin distinctly favored the holding of such an examination, and the supposed abandonment of the plan caused the revival of the excitement against Dr. Mackenzie, who was charged with omitting an autopsy in order that he might prevent a final authoritative report as to the true malady from which the Emperor died. Besides the doctors who conducted the autopsy, Count von Stolberg-Wernigerode, Court Chamberlain, remained during the examination, which proved the existence of cancer. The physicians who performed the post mortem examination, formally announced that death resulted from "cancer of the larynx and inflammation of the minor bronchial tubes, due to the introduction of foreign morbid substances." The cartilage of the larynx had totally disappeared, leaving a huge cavity, so that portions of food flowed over into the trachea and lungs. Thus, "the direct cause of death is attributed to paralysis of the lungs." Further, the report states that the presence of perichondritis and caries of the cartilages contributed to the difficulty of fixing the nature of the disease until recently.

Dr. Mackenzie's friends state that he concurred in the holding of the post-mortem. They also say that he knew the character of the disease from an early period, but took the best course possible with the patient.

The Vienna Neue Freie Presse publishes a letter from Professor Virchow, dated Berlin, March 27, dealing with the attacks upon Dr. Mackenzie, wherein he declares that he (Dr. Mackenzie), with his great experience, certainly agreed with the diagnosis of his German colleagues, and in concealing the nature of the malady from the Emperor, acted as a man and a physician should act in such a case.

The Funeral

took place on June 18. All the way from the castle to the Fridenskirche, where the body was placed, torches and cressets were seen. Every here and there rose huge flagstaffs and poles bearing banners with mourning devices. The troops who were to take part in the funeral ceremony comprised the entire garrison at Potsdam and a portion of the Berlin and Spandau garrisons. Prince Bismarck and Count von Moltke, and a number of foreign princes—notably the Prince of Wales, who was deeply attached to his brother-in-law, and the King of Saxony, also an intimate friend—appeared among the mourners.

The railway stations at Berlin and Potsdam were closed against the public. Crowds gathered outside these buildings, and soldiers and police were posted all around the station to keep back the crowds. The Friedrichskron Palace was guarded like a fortress.

At nine o'clock in the morning the bells were tolled, and at half-past ten o'clock the ministers who were to officiate took their places around the coffin in the palace. The choir sang the hymns, "Soon Thou callest me to higher joys," and "Jesus is my trust." As the last strains died away, Chaplain Kögel arose and offered a prayer, in which he alluded in feeling terms to the double grievous visitation upon the imperial house and upon the nation. He thanked God for all He had done for the departed monarch, and implored heavenly consolation for the sorely tried members of the imperial family, and for the nation. Then the choir sang the hymn, "If I am to die." The commanders of twelve regiments, of which the late Emperor was the chief officer, carried the coffin to the hearse, the choir meanwhile singing, "I know that my Redeemer liveth." Eight majors then took the horses by the bridles, and the procession started for the church.

Upon arriving at the church the mourners took the seats assigned to them. After the service, Chaplain Kögel pronounced the benediction. There was no sermon. After the firing of volleys and minute guns by the troops, the mourners took their departure.

Before leaving, the widowed Empress bent over the coffin, and took a solemn farewell look at her dead husband's face.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

The Voice Gideon Ouseley Heard. — Mr. Balmer said: "When Gideon Ouseley was impressed with the thought that he ought to preach Jesus Christ to the people he hesitated for a time, but a voice came to him as if saying, 'Gideon, do you know the nature of the evil?' and he said, 'Yes, I do; I know the nature of the sin.' 'Do you know the remedy for the evil?' Gideon said, 'Yes, I do.' 'Then go and tell it; go and preach it.' Now that is the simple story. We know the nature of the disease. We know the only remedy is in Jesus Christ, and we must go and make the remedy known to those who are in the dark valley of the shadow of slavery and death."

The "Headman" and His Warriors.—"Some time after I went to Africa," said a Scotch missionary, "a heathen headman sent for me to pay him a visit. This invitation he many times renewed; but as the object of his visit was only political, I declined. By and by I thought, 'Have I any right to refuse this invitation? May not the Lord overrule this for good?' I determined to go, and sent word accordingly. My assistant and I soon arrived at this man's village, and he sent his son to bid us welcome, and give us a place where we might hold a meeting. We soon had a good service, the chief himself coming to hear us, with two hundred of his warriors. This was one of the greatest honors that could be shown to us. After the meeting we had a long conference, which ended by his giving us liberty to choose a site for a church in any part of his country. We made our choice, and there is now a good work being done in that place. That is how God holds the hearts of kings and rulers in His hand, and causes them to do as He pleases. It also shows how doors are being opened for the spread of the gospel in heathen lands."

A Promise of Money—An Evangelistic Worker in the North observes: "One day I received a letter from a gentleman, the tenor of which ran thus: 'Understanding that you are engaged in a good work, and one with which I am in hearty sympathy, I shall be happy to give you £100 towards the furtherance of the cause. If you call at my office I shall have pleasure in handing you a cheque for that amount.' When I got that letter there were three things to be settled. First, Was there such a person as the writer represented? Yes, there was. Secondly, is he able to give so large a donation? Yes, he is wealthy. Thirdly, can he be relied upon to fulfil his word? He can. He is a Christian and a man of honor. These three things being settled, I am richer by the amount promised, though I have it not actually in my possession. I believe in the letter, and the man's fulfilment of his promise. At the time appointed I called, and at once was handed a cheque for the amount promised. Similarly God has promised us salvation, if we will accept it. God has promised, and He will fulfil. Why then do not men come and claim that which He has said He will give? Call upon Him, and you shall be saved."

From the Ship to the Shore.—The Son of a sea-captain said: "We had been many days 'beating' up the English Channel, when, one morning, the wind changed to 'fair,' and my father said, 'If this wind lasts, we shall be at home to-night.' How glad I was to hear the news! Towards evening, however, the breeze died away; and, although we had entered the Needles passage, yet with an 'ebb' tide against us, our hopes began to wane. Soon the 'darkness thickened,' and weary with watching, I went down into my little cabin and tried to sleep. Meanwhile the ebbing tide ceased; and presently the fair flood began to flow, upon the bosom of which, apparently without a motion, the vessel was carried into the roadstead. The first intimation I had of our arrival home, was the noise of the cable running out as the anchor was cast. As I ran on deck in the midnight darkness, I shall never forget how I shrank from getting into the small boat that was waiting to take us to the harbor. Scarcely awake, I remember seeing, about a mile distant, the lights on the shore, the black waters—as black as night—between; my father sitting in the stern of the boat, waiting to receive me, and the sailors ready with their oars waiting to pull away. I was but a little fellow, and remember a strong man carried me down the gangway and deposited me in my father's arms. Father at once threw his greatcoat around me, and beyond hearing his orders to start, and the first splash or two of the oars, I am utterly oblivious of all that happened. I fell sound asleep in his arms. When I opened my eyes again, I found myself in my own little room, the morning sun shining brilliantly, and my mother and the family waiting to give me a welcome home. And may not the landing in heaven be similar? Death, after all, is but the little boat that takes us to the shore. The Pilot who has been our guide all through, will be our strength then. Our eyes will soon close to the darkness and open to the light. The dark waters 'between,' will soon be behind forever."

A Customer "in the Horrors."—Mr. Stewart observes: "A saloon-keeper well known to myself, entered his shop one morning, and proceeded to clear up the place as usual. He had scarcely begun to do so, when a man rushed in, and, leaning over the counter, said, hoarsely, 'Quick, quick, give me a glass of whisky, for pity's sake.' The publican lifted a glass, and knelt down to fill it. While doing so he heard a knock, and, looking up to see what it was, beheld his customer in the horrors. As he looked at the poor slave of Satan standing there, trembling from head to foot, he imagined he saw the very Evil One himself looking from his eyes. The man redemanded his whisky, but the publican dropped the measure, saying, as much to himself as to the man, 'No, never; never again to you or any other man, God helping me.' His intending customer was surprised, and noticing that the tap was still running, he drew the publican's attention to it, who replied, 'Yes; it is running, and so will all the others be in a minute.' And at once he turned on every tap in the shop. When telling me of this, he said, 'That man thought me mad, but I had only then come to my senses, and seen for the first time that the traffic in which I was engaged was ruining immortal souls."

The Medical Student's Leap.—Mr. Campbell said: "I was present at a Gospel meeting not long ago, and when the service had just ended, and the workers were gathered together in groups talking, there entered the hall a young medical student. He walked slowly up to the first knot of workers, and said, very seriously, 'Can you tell me how to be saved?' One of the number answered, 'Just believe.' 'I have heard those words, believe and faith, so often,' replied he impatiently, 'yet I do not know what they mean; can you not use any other word to make plain what is meant?' He then walked towards me, to whom he put his question in a new form, 'can you tell me how to trust?' I said, 'You are now standing beside me here; but suppose instead of being in safety, the house were on fire, and we were encircled with flames. There is no safety for us in the house; but in the street below the firemen are ready with a life-saving apparatus, upon which is spread a large sheet. They call upon us to leap, and they will catch us. We hesitate; the flames draw nearer. Again they cry, 'Leap, men, leap.' We look at the distance between, and cry, 'The risk is great,' but the reply comes, 'There is no risk; trust yourselves to us.' We leap, and are caught. That is an illustration of saving trust.' The young man remained quiet for a minute, then, grasping me by the hand, he said, 'Thank God, I have taken the leap.' Then he shook hands with everyone in the hall, and rather astonished some by asking if they had taken the leap. At length he left for home, full of the joy of trusting in a newly-found Saviour."

SOUR EXPERIENCES.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached at Chicago Last Sunday Morning, July 8, 1888.

"When Jesus, therefore, had received the vinegar." John 19 : 30.

Christ's Cry of Thirst—The Agony Implied in the Complaint—The Vinegar an Insult—Lives in which Acids Predominate—A Story of King George—Christ Able to Sympathize with the Troubled—His Own Experience of Sourness—The Sourness of Betrayal—Of Physical Disabilities—Of Poverty—Genius Inadequately Paid—Wilkie, Gainsborough, and Goldsmith—Christ's Life of Poverty—Sourness of Bereavement—Christ's Tears Over Lazarus—The Sourness of Death—Christ in Sympathy with the Dying—A Crew Dying of Thirst—Nana Sahib's Ruby.

The brigands of Jerusalem had done their work. It was almost sundown, and Jesus was dying. Persons in crucifixion often lingered on from day to day—crying, begging, cursing; but Christ had been exhausted by years of maltreatment. Pillowless, poorly fed, flogged—as bent over and tied to a low post, His bare back was inflamed with the scourges intersticed with pieces of lead and bone—and now for whole hours, the weight of His body hung on delicate tendons, and, according to custom, a violent stroke under the armpits had been given by the executioner. Dizzy, nauseated, feverish—is compressed in the two words: "I thirst!" O skies of Judea, let a drop of rain strike on His burning tongue! O world, with rolling rivers, and sparkling lakes, and spraying fountains, give Jesus something to drink! If there be any pity in earth or heaven or hell, let it now be demonstrated in behalf of this royal sufferer. The wealthy women of Jerusalem used to have a fund of money with which they provided wine for those people who died in crucifixion—a powerful opiate to deaden the pain; but Christ would not take it. He wanted to die sober, and so He refused the wine. But afterward they go to a cup of vinegar and soak a sponge in it, and put it on a stick of hyssop, and then press it against the hot lips of Christ. You say the wine was an anæsthetic, and intended to relieve or deaden the pain. But

The Vinegar was an Insult.

I am disposed to adopt the theory of the old English commentators, who believed that instead of its being an opiate to soothe, it was vinegar to insult. Malaga and Burgundy for grand dukes and duchesses, and costly wines from royal vats for bloated imperials; but acids for a dying Christ. He took the vinegar.

In some lives the saccharine seems to predominate. Life is sunshine on a bank of flowers. A thousand hands to clap approval. In December or in January, looking across their table, they see all their family present. Health rubicund. Skies flamboyant. Days resilient. But in a great many cases there are not so many sugars as acids. The annoyances, and the vexations, and the disappointments of life overpower the successes. There is

A Gravel in Almost Every Shoe.

An Arabian legend says that there was a worm in Soloman's staff, gnawing its strength away; and there is a weak spot in every earthly support that a man leans on. King George of England forgot all the grandeurs of his throne because, one day, in an interview, Beau Brummel called him by his first name, and addressed him as a servant, crying: "George, ring the bell!" Miss Langdon, honored all the world over for her poetic genius, is so worried over the evil reports set afloat regarding her, that she is found dead, with an empty bottle of prussic acid in her hand. Goldsmith said that his life was a wretched being, and that all that want and contempt could bring to it had been brought, and cries out: "What, then, is there formidable in a jail?" Correggio's fine painting is hung up for a tavern sign. Hogarth cannot sell his best paintings except through a raffle. Andrew Delsart makes the great fresco in the Church of the Annunciata, at Florence, and gets for pay a sack of corn; and there are annoyances and vexations in high places as well as in low places, showing that in a great many lives are the Sours Greater Than The Sweets.

"When Jesus therefore had received the vinegar." It is absurd to suppose that a man who has always been well can sympathize with those who are sick, or that one who has always been honored can appreciate the sorrow of those who are despised, or that one who has been born to a great fortune can understand the distress and the straits of those who are destitute. The fact that Christ Himself took the vinegar, makes Him able to sympathize to-day and for ever with all those whose cup is filled with sharp acids of this life. He took the vinegar!

In the first place, there was

The Sourness of Betrayal.

The treachery of Judas hurt Christ's feelings more than all the friendship of His disciples did Him good. You have had many friends; but there was one friend upon whom you put especial stress. You feasted him. You loaned him money. You befriended him in the dark passes of life, when he especially needed a friend. Afterward, he turned upon you, and he took advantage of your former intimacies. He wrote against you. He talked against you. He microscopized your faults. He flung contempt at you when you ought to have received nothing but gratitude. At first, you could not sleep at nights. Then you went about with a sense of having been stung. That difficulty will never be healed, for though mutual friends may arbitrate in the matter until you shall shake hands, the old cordiality will never come back. Now I commend to all such the sympathy of a betrayed Christ. Why, they sold Him for less than our twenty dollars! They all forsook Him and fled. They cut Him to the quick. He drank that cup to the dregs. He took the vinegar.

There is also the sourness of pain. There are some of you who have not seen a well day for many years. By keeping out of draughts, and by carefully studying dietetics, you continue to this time; but oh, the headaches, and the sideaches, and the backaches, and the heartaches which have been your accompaniment all the way through! You have struggled under a heavy mortgage of and instead of the placidity that once characterized you, it is now only with great effort that you keep away from irritability and sharp retort. Difficulties of respiration, of digestion, of locomotion, make up the great obstacle in your life, and you tug and sweat along the pathway, and wonder when the exhaustion will end. My friends, the brightest crowns in heaven will not be given to those who, in stirrups, dashed to the cavalry charge, while the general applauded and the sound of clashing sabres rang through the land; but the brightest crowns in heaven, I believe, will be given to those who trudged on amid chronic ailments which unnerved their strength, yet all the time maintaining their faith in God. It is comparatively easy to fight in a regiment of a thousand men, charging up the parapets to the sound of martial music; but it is not so easy to endure when no one but the nurse and the doctor are the witnesses of the Christian fortitude. Besides that, you never had any pains worse than Christ's. The sharpnesses that stung through His brain, through His hands, through His feet, through His heart, were as great as yours certainly. He was as sick and as weary. Not a nerve or muscle or ligament escaped. All the pangs of all the nations of all the ages compressed into one sour cup. He took the vinegar!

There is also the Sourness of Poverty.

Your income does not meet your outgoings, and that always gives an honest man anxiety. There is no sign of destitution about you—pleasant appearance, and a cheerful home for you; but God only knows what a time you have had to manage your private finances. Just as the bills run up, the wages seem to run down. But you are not the only one who has not been paid for hard work. The great Wilkie sold his celebrated piece, "The Blind Fiddler," for fifty guineas, although afterwards it brought its thousands. The world hangs in admiration over the sketch of Gainsborough, yet that very sketch hung for years in the shop-window, because there was not any purchaser. Oliver Goldsmith sold his "Vicar of Wakefield" for a few pounds, in order to keep the bailiff out of the door; and the vast majority of men in all occupations and professions are not fully paid for their work.

You may say nothing, but life to you is a hard push; and when you sit down with your wife, and talk over the expenses, you both rise up discouraged. You abridge here and you abridge there, and you get things snug for smooth sailings, and lo! suddenly there is a large doctor's bill to pay, or you have lost your pocketbook, or some debtor has failed, and you are thrown abeam-end. Well, brother, you are

In Glorious Company.

Christ owned not the house in which He stopped, or the colt on which He rode, or the boat in which He sailed. He lived in a borrowed house; He was buried in a borrowed grave. Exposed to all kinds of weather, yet He had only one suit of clothes. He breakfasted in the morning, and no one could possibly tell where He could get anything to eat before night. He would have been pronounced a financial failure. He had to perform a miracle to get money to pay a tax-bill. Not a dollar did He own. Privation of domesticity; privation of nutritious food; privation of a comfortable couch on which to sleep; privation of all worldly resources! The kings of the earth had chased chalices out of which to drink; but Christ had nothing but a plain cup set before Him, and it was very sharp, and it was very sour. He took the vinegar.

The Sourness of Bereavement.

There were years that passed along before your family circle was invaded by death, but the moment the charmed circle was broken everything seemed to dissolve. Hardly have you put the black apparel in the wardrobe before you have again to take it out. Great and rapid changes in your family record. You got the house and rejoiced in it, but the charm was gone as soon as the crape hung on the door-bell. The one upon whom you most depended was taken away from you. A cold marble slab lies on your heart to-day. Once, as the children romped through the house, you put your hand over your aching head, and said: "Oh, if I could only have it still!" Oh, it is too still now. You lost your patience when the tops, and the strings, and the shells were left amid floor; but oh, you would be willing to have the trinkets scattered all over the floor again, if they were scattered by the same hands. With what bereavement rips up the heart. But Jesus knows all about that. You cannot tell Him anything new in regard to bereavement. He had only a few friends, and when He lost one it brought tears to His eyes. Lazarus had often entertained Him at his house. Now Lazarus is dead and buried, and Christ breaks down with emotion, the convulsion of grief shuddering through all the ages of bereavement. Christ knows what it is to go through the house missing a familiar inmate. Christ knows what it is to see an unoccupied place at the table. Were there not four of them—Mary and Martha, and Christ and Lazarus? Four of them. But where is Lazarus? Lonely and afflicted Christ, His great loving eyes filled with tears, which drop from eye to cheek, and from cheek to beard, and from beard to robe, and from robe to floor. Oh, yes, yes. He knows all about the loneliness and the heartbreak. He took the vinegar!

The Sourness of Death.

Then there is the sourness of the death-hour. Whatever else we may escape, that acid-sponge will be pressed to our lips. I sometimes have a curiosity to know how I will behave when I come to die; whether I will be calm or excited; whether I will be filled with reminiscence or with anticipation. I cannot say. But come to the point I must and you must. In the six thousand years that have passed, only two persons have got into the eternal world without death, and I do not suppose that God is going to send a carriage for us, with horses of flame, to draw us up the steeps of heaven; but I suppose we will have to go like the preceding generations. An officer from the future world will knock at the door of our hearts, and serve on us the writ of ejectment, and we will have to surrender. And we will wake up after these autumnal and wintry and vernal and summery glories have vanished from our vision; we will wake up into a realm which has only one season, and that the season of everlasting love.

But you say: "I don't want to break out from my present associations. It is so chilly and so damp to go down the stairs of that vault. I don't want anything drawn so tightly over my eyes. If there were only some way of breaking through the partition between worlds without tearing this body all to shreds! I wonder if the surgeons and the doctors cannot compound a mixture by which this body and soul can all the time be kept together? Is there no escape from this separation?" None; absolutely none. So I look over this audience to-day—the vast majority of you seeming in good health and spirits—and yet I realize that in a short time all of us will be gone—gone from earth, and gone for ever. A great many men tumble through the gates of the future, as it were, and we do not know where they have gone, and they only add to the passage; but Jesus Christ so mightily stormed the gates of that future world that they have never since been closely shut. Christ knows what it is to leave this world, of the beauty of which He was more appreciative than we ever could be. He knows the exquisiteness of the phosphorescence of the sea; He trod it. He knows the glories of the midnight heavens, for they were the spangled canopy of His wilderness pillow. He knows about the lilies; He twisted them into His sermon. He knows about the fowls of the air; they whirred their way through His discourse. He knows about the sorrows of leaving this beautiful world. Not a taper was kindled in the darkness. He died physicianless. He died in cold sweat, and dizziness and hemorrhage and agony, that have put Him in Sympathy With all the Dying.

He goes through Christendom, and He gathers up the stings out of all the death pillows, and He puts them under His own neck and head. He gathers on His own tongue the burning thirsts of many generations. The sponge is soaked in the sorrows of all those who have died in their beds, as well as soaked in the sorrows of all those who perished in icy or fiery martyrdom. While heaven was pitying, and earth was mocking, and hell was deriding, He took the vinegar!

To all those in this audience to whom life has been an acerbity—a dose they could not swallow, a draught that set their teeth on edge and a-rasping—I preach the omnipotent sympathy of Jesus Christ. The sister of Herschel, the astronomer, used to help him in his work. He got all the credit; she got none. She used to spend much of her time polishing the telescopes through which he brought the distant worlds nigh; and it is my ambition now, this hour, to clear the lens of your spiritual vision, so that looking through the dark night of your earthly troubles you may behold the glorious constellation of a Saviour's mercy and a Saviour's love. O, my friends, do not try to carry all your ills alone. Do not put your poor shoulder under the Apennines when the Almighty Christ is ready to lift up all your burdens. When you have a trouble of any kind, you rush this way, and that way; and you wonder what this man will say about it, and what that man will say about it; and you try this prescription, and that prescription, and the other prescription. O, why do you not go straight to the heart of Christ, knowing that for our own sinning and suffering race He took the vinegar!

There was a vessel that had been tossed on the seas for a great many weeks, and been disabled, and the supply of water gave out, and the crew were Dying of Thirst.

After many days, they saw a sail against the sky. They signalled it. When the vessel came nearer, the people on the suffering ship cried to the captain of the other vessel: "Send us some water. We are dying for lack of water." And the captain on the vessel that was hailed responded: "Dip your buckets where you are. You are in the mouth of the Amazon, and there are scores of miles of fresh water all around about you, and hundreds of feet deep." And then they dropped their buckets over the side of the vessel, and brought up the clear, bright, fresh water, and put out the fire of their thirst. So I hail you to-day, after a long and perilous voyage, thirsting as you are for pardon, and thirsting for comfort, and thirsting for eternal life; and I ask you what is the use of your going in that death-struck state, while all around you is the deep, clear, wide, sparkling flood of God's sympathetic mercy. O, dip your buckets, and drink, and live forever. "Whosoever will, let him come and take of the water of life freely."

Yet, my utterance is almost choked at the thought that there are people here who will refuse this Divine sympathy; and they will try to fight their own battles, and and carry their own burdens; and their life, instead of being a triumphal march from victory to victory, will be a hobbling-on from defeat to defeat, until they make final surrender to retributive disaster. O, I wish I could to-day gather up in my arms all the woes of men and women—all their heart-aches—all their disappointments—all their chagrins—and just take them right to the feet of a sympathizing Jesus. He took the vinegar. Nana Sahib, after he had lost his last battle in India, fell back into the jungles of Iheri—jungles so full of malaria that no mortal can live there. He carried with him also a ruby of great lustre and of great value. He died in those jungles; his body was never found, and the ruby has never yet been recovered. And I fear that to-day there are some who will fall back from this subject into the sickening, killing jungles of their sin, carrying

A Gem of Infinite Value

—a priceless soul—to be lost forever. O, that that ruby might flash in the eternal coronation! But no. There are some, I fear, in this audience who turn away from this offered mercy, and comfort, and Divine sympathy; notwithstanding that Christ, for all who would accept His grace, trudged the long way, and suffered the lacerating thongs, and received in His face the expectorations of the filthy mob, and for the guilty, and the discouraged, and the discomforted of the race, took the vinegar. May God Almighty break the infatuation, and lead you out into the strong hope, and the good cheer, and the glorious sunshine of this triumphant Gospel.

THE RIO POLOCHIC, GUATEMALA.

As with other Central American republics, Gautemala has two distinct lands and climates. The lowlands, near the coast, covered with luxuriant tropical vegetation, where the heat is intense, are fatal to the white races; but on the high table-lands, some of which are four thousand feet above the sea-level, the trade-winds lower the temperature, and the air is fresh and pure. The rivers vary greatly with the seasons. In the rainy season they carry a large volume of water to the sea, but in the dry season they are not navigable far from their mouths. The Polochic, a part of which is shown in the illustration, is for a considerable distance choked up by the soil it filters from its banks, and is impeded at its mouth by a dangerous sand-bar. The scenes along its banks are the amazement of the visitor, who gazes enraptured at the beauty of its trees and flowers, its trailing plants and rare growths.

The population of Guatemala is believed to be about a million and a quarter, of whom 360,000 are whites. The others are made up of Indians and negroes, ladinos and Sambos. The ladinos are a mixed race of Spanish and Indian origin, while the Sambos—a physically strong race, but morally weak—are a cross of Indian and negro blood. All are nominally Roman Catholics, the Spanish settlers having taken care that there is no lack of priests; but the priests do not understand the native languages, and are therefore powerless to impress their charge even with the doctrines of Romanism. The natives consequently cling to their debasing superstitions, and are, for the most part, living in idleness, immorality, and drunkenness. The earth produces, without cultivation, sufficient to furnish them with food, and a day or two of work, at long intervals, easily supplies them with money to buy whisky, while their clothing is so scanty that a few cents will buy them all that they wish to wear.

Education, even among the whites, is at a low ebb. The immorality and ignorance of the priests have disgusted them with religion, and they are, consequently, fast tending toward open infidelity. There is urgent need of earnest, self-denying Christian work among them. The most hopeful plan to reach the country and the other Spanish-American lands, is that which Bishop Riley is laboring so indefatigably to carry into operation. It is that of training, in Mexico, young Christian men and women to go there, not to make proselytes for any denomination, but to preach in their own language the pure gospel of Christ. The work has been carried on as far as the funds would permit. Dr. Riley has devoted to it the whole of his private fortune, and he is now working on in faith that God will incline the hearts of Christians in the United States to support and extend the effort he has begun, and to which he has devoted so many years of his life.

Subscriptions in aid of the Church of Jesus, in Mexico, it pastors, evangelists, church and orphanages, will be thankfully received by the Rt. Rev. H. C. Riley, 43 Bible House, New York.

A CAPTIVE GAMBLER PREACHING.

AT the recent International Missionary Conference in London, the Rev. J. McGowan related the following incident of mission work in China: "In Amoy, was a Chinese gambler, whose wife and father entreated him to give up that ruinous practice; but the passion was too strong for him, and even attemps to shame him could not drive nim from it. But one day he came within the sound of a preacher's voice. The demon of gambling was from that time driven out of him. He became a Christian, and, not only that, but a preacher of the gospel. Soon after that he was seized by the members of a predatory village, carried thither, and his goods and money distributed, and he himself held to ransom. But he gladly seized the chance of preaching the gospel where it had never been heard before, with the result that his goods, etc., were given back to him by those who had been impressed by his excellent words. This man had formed a church."

NEW AND ENLARGED EDITION—1888.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled Prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled, "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting 75 cents. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth, and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a résumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have on entering the study of that portion of the Word of God.

TIMID PASSENGERS ON A STEAMER.

THE following incident in connection with Captain Dutton, the Christian seaman, well known to our Canadian readers, is narrated in the Faithful Witness, as an illustration of the love and wisdom of God's providential dealings with his people: During a voyage of the S. S. Sarmatian, of which Captain Dutton was commander, we had entered the River St. Lawrence, when suddenly a heavy fog arose which completely hid the shore and all objects from view; the ship, which was going at full speed, continued on her course without relaxing in the least; the passengers became rather frightened, and considered it extremely reckless on the part of the captain; finally one of them went and remonstrated with the first mate, telling him of the fears of the passengers. He listened and then replied, with a smile: "Oh, do not allow them to be frightened; they need not be the least uneasy; the fog only extends a certain height, and the captain 'is up above the fog,' and it is he that is running the vessel." When this was reported to the passengers, the change on their countenances, from fear and uneasiness to quiet satisfaction, was wonderful. Oh, what cheer and comfort it would bring to our hearts on our voyage of life, if, when surrounded by the mists of doubt or sorrow, and unable to see our way, we could always remember that our Captain "is above the fog," that He is guiding our way, and will bring us at last, if we only wait and trust Him, to the "haven where we would be."!

HOW A QUARREL ENDED.

AN excellent method of dealihg with a vituperative enemy was recently described by Rev. Moses D. Hoge, D.D., of Richmond, Va. He states that two friends had a misunderstanding which developed into a quarrel. Both were Christian men, and there was general regret over the affair in the religious community. At length one of them heard that the other was talking against him, and he went to him and said, "Will you be kind enough to tell me my faults to my face, that I may profit by your Christian candor, and try to get rid of them? "Yes, sir," said the other, "I will do it." They went aside, and the man who had made the request, said, "Before you commence telling me what you think wrong in me, will you please kneel down with me, and let us pray over it, that my eyes may be opened to see my faults as you will tell them. You lead in the prayer." It was done, and when the prayer was over, the man who had sought the interview, said, "Now proceed with what you have to complain of in me." But the other replied, "After praying over it, it looks so little that it is not worth talking about. The truth is, I feel now that in going around talking against you, I have been serving the devil myself, and have need that you pray for me, and forgive me the wrong I have done you." How many a quarrel that causes scandal in the church might be settled, if the injunction of the Great Teacher (Matt. 18: 15) were thus similarly obeyed!

PRACTICAL RELIGION IN CHINA.

THE commands of Christ as to the kind of life a Christian ought to live, though not always obeyed in Christian lands, are never obeyed there or in heathen countries without producing good effects on others. A remarkable illustration of that fact is mentioned by the Rev. Frank V. Mills in a letter to the Church. He says: "The gospel has power over the lives of some Chinamen, as I learned from a heathen the other day. I was standing on one of the bridges in the city, trying to interest the bystanders in the tracts I was selling, when a stranger asked if a Christian did not live in a house near by. I replied I thought one did, but I did not know him, as he was not a member of our communion. 'Well,' said the questioner, 'he is a wonderful man. He does not get angry nor quarrel with his neighbors, and when you revile him he does not talk back.' I felt I had accomplished a great deal in just being the cause of bringing out this heathen testimony to the value and power of the religion we are trying to promulgate. Another day I was standing in front of a shop with my bag of tracts. Some one came from the shop and bought an illustrated tract. Pretty soon he came again and bought another. Then he brought the first back and wanted to exchange it. Later on he brought out two more books, asking to exchange them, but, said I, 'You did not get these books from me; they are old ones.' 'But we have read them and want to see some others.' They were Christian tracts, the same as some I was selling, so I willingly gave him others in exchange."

A HAPPY CHRISTIAN LEPER.

ONE of the most remarkable illustrations of the power of Christianity to give happiness under the most distressing circumstances is related by Mr. W. C. Bailey, the secretary of the Mission to Lepers in India, who has recently travelled through that country. He says: "When I was passing through an asylum one day, I came to the hut of one leper, whom I had known as a Christian for many years. He crawled out of his hut, as best he could, into the pleasant sunshine outside—sunshine which he could not see, for his eyes had gone long since—just as I passed, and I said to him: 'Do you remember me?' I had to repeat my question before he recognized my voice, and gladly welcomed me as 'Padri Bailey Sahib.' He was very much worse than when I had last seen him, and in fact in such a shocking condition that I commiserated him upon his sufferings. Very quietly he answered me, 'No, Sahib, no! Since I trusted Christ, nineteen years ago, I have known neither pain of mind or body. God is very good to me.' I turned, astounded, to my companion, the head of the asylum. 'Did you ever hear anything like that?' I asked, knowing that, at times especially, the poor fellow must suffer frightfully. Not only was the man himself one of the brightest Christians I ever met, but nearly all the good that is done in the asylum is done through him. He used to compose hymns to Jesus that all the lepers sing." Ah, friends! Think of the spirit prisoned in that sightless, mutilated body, singing unceasing praises to its God! "God is very good to me!"

AN AMERICAN POMPEII.

IT is not uncommon to hear sceptics ridicule the idea that the world has to pass through the judgments described in prophecy. There are, however, abundant examples of the sudden destruction, in the past, of advanced civilization, from which the inference is legitimate that what has occurred in the past, in isolated cases, may occur in the future universally, as the Apostle Peter says it will. (II Peter 3. 10.)

One example has recently been found in the shape of a magnificent city in the midst of lava and ashes, by the railroad engineers and surveyors who are surveying the route for the Kansas City, El Paso and Mexican Railroad, which will be built in a diagonal direction through New Mexico from northeast to southwest. The surveying party has just reached that part of the line which lies between the thirty-third and thirty-fourth parallels of latitude at their intersection with the one hundred and sixth degree of longitude. They passed along the lava flow which by the local population is called the Molpais, which is probably the most unique of its kind in America. It consists of a sea of molten black glass, agitated at the moment of cooling in ragged waves of fantastic shapes. These lava waves or ridges are from ten to twelve feet high with combing crests, and the whole formation presents the appearance of having been made at a comparatively modern period.

This lava flow is about forty miles long from northeast to southwest, and from one to ten miles wide. For miles on all sides the country is the most desolate that can be imagined. It has been literally burned up. It consists of fine white ashes to any depth which, so far, has been dug down. To the north of the lava flow, and lying in a country equally desolate and arid, the surveyors have come upon the ruins of Gran Guivera, known already to the early Spanish explorers, but which have been visited by white men less often even than the mysterious ruins of Paienque in Central America. Only a few people at Socorro and White Oaks have been at Gran Guivera, because it is at present forty miles from water. The surveyors found the ruins to be of gigantic stone buildings, made in the most substantial manner and of grand proportions. One of them was four acres in extent. All indications around the ruins point to the existence here at one time of a dense population. No legend of any kind exists as to how this great city was destroyed or when it was abandoned.

THE RETURNED CHINESE IMMIGRANTS.

THE self-denying Christian ladies who have been teaching Chinese immigrants in the Sunday-schools in San Francisco, and other large cities, and have, in consequence, had to bear much ridicule and obloquy from our own people, who ought to know better, will be consoled and encouraged by the letter which the Rev. H. V. Noyes, Presbyterian missionary in Canton, sends to the Church. He says, that among the Chinamen who came to America to make a fortune, and have returned, are many who have brought with them, in addition to their fortune, something better than gold. They have come back true Christians, and instead of spending the remainder of their days in idle luxury, as they probably intended when they left China, they have come back to spend both time and money in spreading the knowledge of Christ among their neighbors.

"There are," says Mr. Noyes, "few places in southern China where there is not a mission chapel within fifteen miles, a distance the Chinese easily walk. Of these chapels, the Presbyterian mission has six. Every one of these six locations was obtained by the help of Christians returned from California. Of the thirteen native assistants who have labored at these stations, six were converted in California, one in Australia, and one received his first serious impressions and religious instruction from a member of the Chinese church in California, on the steamer crossing the Pacific. The work in these localities has resulted in the establishment of two churches, one of which has been almost entirely self-supporting from the beginning. The members of this latter church have already established places, in private houses, for religious services and instruction, in two outlying villages.

Besides the faithful laborers mentioned above, we can point, with great satisfaction, to others converted in California, to Rev. Kuan Loy, the earnest pastor of the Second Church, Canton; to another faithful man, now preaching in the chapel of the First Church; to the two most valuable medical assistants in the Canton hospital; to Dr. Thomson's right-hand man at Yeung Kong, the faithful Bible student and intelligent preacher, Lam Tai. These men are among our very best native helpers, commencing their Christian course in the United States, and continuing their studies and work in China.

A MAHARAJAH'S PREJUDICE OVERCOME.

HOW a Maharajah in India, who had persistently refused to allow any Christian missionary to settle in his country, was led to urge one to come and preach, was told at the International Missionary Conference in London by Dr. Sutherland of Canada. He said that a Dr. Valentine, being out of health, was recommended to go to the Himalayas in hope of restoration. He had to pass through Jeypore, and in the way of courtesy called upon the Maharajah. In conversation this ruler told him that his wife was ill, and that the doctors had given her up. Dr. Valentine said he would like to see her; the Maharajah was pleased, and made every effort, at length with success, to get him an interview with the Maharanee. Under his treatment she was restored to health, and the Rajah said, "What can I do to thank you?" Dr. Valentine answered, "Let me preach the gospel in Jeypore." The other answered, "Yes, if you will settle here and be my private physician." "But," said Dr. Valentine, "I am a missionary. I will stay if you will allow me to preach the gospel from one end of the province to the other without let or hindrance." To this the Maharajah consented; and Dr. Valentine remained for fourteen years, and now the United Presbyterian Church has a large and very prosperous mission there.

THE TWO TRANSLATIONS.

By G. H. Pember, M. A.*

The Finishing of the Great Mystery—The Time of General Assembly—Three Different Classes of Glorified Believers—The Raptured, the Martyrs, and the Faithful Survivors—To Reign in the Millennium—The Reward of Being in the First Rapture—Not for all Christians—Holiness Essential—Watching and Prayer Necessary.

IN writing to the Corinthians, the Apostle Paul bids them regard himself and his colleagues as "stewards of the mysteries of God"—an expression often twisted by sacerdotalists into accord with their own views, and interpreted to mean "dispensers of the sacraments." But neither Baptism, nor the Lord's Supper, is ever called a mystery in the New Testament; the term is invariably applied to revelations given by the Spirit for communication to the Church.

The mystery of the Church—the great mystery of the present dispensation—is the most frequently mentioned of all. It is said to have been hidden from the ages, and its secret was that God would invite Jews and Gentiles, without distinction, to be one in Christ, to become members of His body, of His flesh and of His bones, and to be partakers of a heavenly destiny. The Lord began to reveal some of its details in the Seven Parables, and in so doing is said to have fulfilled the prophecy; "I will utter things which have been kept secret from the foundation of the world."

Of its termination we are told that, "in the days of the voice of

when he is about to sound, then is finished the mystery of God. (Rev. 10: 7.) For, at that time, the last member of the Church of the First-born will have been made ready, and, at the blast of the seventh trumpet, its general assembly will take place.

But now the question arises, Is this event the same as that which is described by Paul in the First Epistle to the Thessalonians?

Several reasons induce us to think that it is not.

And, first, Paul does not preface his description with any notice of the violent persecutions, or supernatural judgments, which are to take place just before the mystery is finished.

Again: in the first five verses of the next chapter he manifestly treats the rapture as the introduction to the Day of the Lord, just as Christ Himself gives it as in the air. So, too, in the Second Epistle, when he adjured the Thessalonians, by the coming of Christ, and our gathering together unto Him, not to be persuaded that the Day of the Lord was then in progress (II Thess. 2: 1, 2), he clearly implied that the coming and the gathering must take place before that Day.

On the other hand, the blast which signals the conclusion of the mystery sounds just at the close of the time of judgment. For the seventh angel's period includes the final outpouring of wrath from the vials, the plagues of which are of such a nature that their duration must be very limited, or no flesh would be saved. Moreover, their horrors appear to be cumulative; since, under the fifth vial, men are represented as blaspheming God for what they are still suffering from the first. (Rev. 16: 2, 11.)

It would seem, then, that the rapture of which Paul speaks, and the

of God, are distinct events, and there is no lack of proof that the Church will be gathered to the Lord in two translations, one taking place before, and the other after, the Great Tribulation and the persecutions of Antichrist. In the twentieth chapter of Revelation the full assembly of the Church of the First-born is described in these terms: "And I saw thrones, and they sat upon them, and judgment was given to them; and I saw the souls of them which had been beheaded for the testimony of Jesus, and for the word of God, and such as worshipped not the Beast, neither his image, and received not the mark upon their forehead and upon their hand; and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years. The rest of the dead lived not until the thousand years should be finished. This is the first resurrection." Now, in this passage we can discern of glorified believers. There are, first, those who are seen sitting upon thrones, and who are probably the company which will be caught up to the Lord at the beginning of the Presence. Then there are those who, being left behind, will be martyred for the testimony of Jesus during the Seventieth Week; and, lastly, those who will be faithful witnesses for Christ in the times of trial, neither worshipping the Beast nor his image, but will, nevertheless, escape death, or, at least, death by persecution. The first class appears to occupy a higher position than the others, but all live and reign with Christ for a thousand years, while the rest of the dead are not recalled to life until the end of that period.

Three Different Classes

Thus the glorified saints which John saw are those who, in the Lord's words, shall be accounted worthy to obtain that age, and resurrection out of the dead. For they will live and while others are still confined to the abode of disembodied spirits; they will not wait for the general awakening, but be raised up from the great multitudes of the dead, and have part in the First Resurrection.

We should not omit to notice that their reign is limited to a fixed time; therefore, this kingdom is not identical with eternal life, nor yet with the inheritance which, as Peter tells us, "fadeth not away." It is something additional to both of these, and special. And, whenever it is mentioned in the New Testament, it appears to be connected rather with the fruits of faith than with faith in the abstract.

The expression, the souls of them that had been beheaded, is peculiar, and its possible meaning not very apparent to the merely English reader. In Greek the same word signifies "soul" and "life"—that kind of life which enables us to rejoice in all that God has created. Now this word is used by the Lord in the oft-quoted saying: "Whosoever would save his life—or soul—shall lose it: and whosoever shall lose his life for My sake shall find it." Of the promise in the last clause, all who spend and are spent in His service are inheritors, and especially those whose love urges them forward on the path of obedience, even though Death appear standing in the way.

There is a gracious recognition of this in a previous vision, in which were seen lying under the great altar, poured out as the blood of a sacrifice which had been offered to God. Such a sacrifice, with which He is well pleased, was presented by those who had been beheaded for the testimony of Jesus; at His command they had cast their lives upon the ground, and now, in return for the few and evil years of mortal existence, He has given them length of days, even life for evermore.

It is, then, the manifest teaching of Scripture that the Church will ascend to the Lord in two divisions, the first of which will leave the earth, at the beginning of the Presence, the other toward its close. But it is most important to remember that the set time for its full assembly is at the sounding of the seventh trumpet. Then the mystery of God will be finished, and the invitation to Jew and Gentile to become one in Christ, as a heavenly people, be withdrawn.

Hence, so far, at least, as the living are concerned, to have part in the first rapture is a reward and privilege given only to those whom the Lord, when He comes, shall find watching. It involves

Immunity from The Terrific Woes of The End:

It is that blessing for which the Lord urges us to strive, when He bids us take heed, lest, coming suddenly, He find us sleeping. And those who obtain it will have secured the fulfilment of His promise: "Because thou hast kept the word of My patience, I also will keep thee from the hour of temptation, which shall come upon all the world, to try them that dwell upon the earth." (Rev. 3: 10.)

Surely such a promise is of vital interest to us, standing, as we seem to be, hard by the end of the age. It cannot be misunderstood: it has nothing to do with Jews, but occurs in one of the Epistles to the Churches; it is not given unconditionally to mere believers, but only to those who walk consistently, and are willing to endure with Christ. To them it brings assurance of escape from a temptation by which all other men must be tried, since it is to come upon the whole world. And, as the next verse intimates, their deliverance will be wrought by the personal advent of the Lord.

And how earnestly He is longing to rescue His own from the frightful ordeal through which they otherwise must pass, we may see by the memorable but much neglected command in the Gospel of Luke, which He uttered just after He had been portraying the terrors of the Last Week: "Watch ye, therefore, and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of Man."

Of these words also it is impossible to mistake the meaning, unless we do so wilfully. They certainly intimate that a Christian, though sure of eternal life, is from the earth before the troubles of the Last Week. This favor will be granted only to those who have progressed in holiness, only to those who have been so strengthened with might in the inner man that they can watch and pray. Such a growth in grace may, indeed, be attained by all believers; the power of watching and prayer is given to every man at his conversion; but if he would be able to bring it into action, he must be willing to deny himself, to take up his cross, and to follow his Master. Then there will be no doubt as to the issue; for faithful is He that calleth you, Who will also do it."

But the Lord has no thought of translating worldly-minded believers from the toils of life into the joy of His Presence, of admitting them to honor and immortality by the gate of glory instead of by the dark valley of Death. Those who vainly expect such a thing are like the Jews, who would have had Christ put Himself at their head as the all-victorious King, when as yet He had not saved them from their sins. But He will not grant to the careless and slothful servant that blessing which Paul craved, yet did not receive, the joy of being clothed upon, without the necessity of shuffling off this mortal coil, and so He bid us watch and pray always, that we may be accounted worthy to escape the time of greatest trouble, and to stand before Him while it is going on.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Ceremony of Notifying Gen. Harrison of his nomination for the Presidency took place on July 4. Thirty-three gentlemen, each representing a separate State or Territory, waited upon the candidate at his home, in Indianapolis, Ind., and Mr. M. M. Estee, of California, as chairman, formally informed him that the Convention had unanimously chosen him as the standard-bearer of the party in the coming contest. Gen. Harrison displayed becoming modesty in his reply, accepting the nomination, referring gracefully to "the more eminent men who divided with him" the suffrages of the Convention. He went on to say: "I accept the nomination with so deep a sense of the dignity of the office, and of the gravity of its duties and responsibilities, as altogether to exclude any feeling of exultation or pride. The principles of government, and the practices in administration, upon which issues are now fortunately so clearly made, are so important in their relations to the national and to individual prosperity, that we may expect an unusual popular interest in the campaign. Relying wholly upon the considerate judgment of our fellow-citizens, and the gracious favor of God, we will confidently submit our cause to the arbitrament of a free ballot." The platform adopted by the Convention was, the General stated, in harmony with his views.

Congress has Beaten its Record in the Construction of this year's River and Harbor Bill. The Senate concluded its labors upon it on July 2, and sent it back to the House for consideration in its extended shape. The bill as it has gone back to the House appropriates the enormous sum of $22,474,783.77. As originally reported to the House from committee, it carried a little over nineteen millions, which would have been a larger appropriation for this purpose than any ever before made. It left the House increased to nearly twenty millions. The Senate committee added a million and a half, and then the Senate a net amount of nearly a million more. The largest sum ever before appropriated in a river and harbor measure was $18,738,875, contained in the act of August 22, 1882, passed over President Arthur's veto. Hence the bill now pending proposes to expend $3,735,908 more than the amount which caused such a storm of public indignation six years ago. In its present shape the bill includes several items rejected in former years by the House, and which the House will probably again eliminate. They included the Hennepin Canal appropriation, the purchase of the Green and Barren River property, and the purchase of the Portage Lake and Lake Superior canals. If Congress adheres to the principle of this bill it is evident that there need be no fear of the Treasury being too full.

The Treasury Statement Just Issued Shows that the national debt, less cash in the Treasury, on June 30, when the fiscal year closed, was $1,165,584,656, being a reduction during the month of June of $14,429,502. This brings the total reduction of the debt for the year up to $113,844,080. It leaves a net cash balance on hand of $103,220,464, which is an increase despite the purchase of bonds. The statement of the Treasury shows that the amount already paid out for premiums on the bonds—that is, through purchasing them of the holders instead of waiting for them to mature, when the holders must accept their face value—has amounted to over $8,000,000. Against this has to be set the sum that would have been paid in interest on the bonds if they had not been bought.

The Trouble Over the South American Mails appears likely to be renewed, Posmaster-General Dickinson being apparently as much opposed to subsidies as his predecessor. In reply to a request for his opinion from the Chairman of the House Post Office Committee, Mr. Dickinson declares that the subsidy provision "would not be advantageous to the service, but the disadvantages would be positive." He would be compelled to contract with the owners of American vessels for the transportation of the mails to the ports of Central and South America and the West Indies for a period of not less than five years, with a compensation of $1 for each mile sailed on the outward trip, regardless of the amount of mail carried. Considering the number of companies available for the service and their relations to each other, there would be practically no competition, and the maximum rate would have to be paid in each case. It would not encourage the development of new lines, but on the contrary would secure advantages to those now in existence which they would be sure to confine to themselves. Practically it would be a mandate to distribute the appropriation among certain companies, which could be easily named beforehand.

Cincinnati Celebrated her Centennial by a double pageant on July 4. In the morning the magnificent exposition which during the past few months has been brought to completion, was formerly opened by Gov. Foraker. He was supported by the Governors of Nebraska, Indiana, Pennsylvania, and ex-Governor Bryan, of Kentucky, with Senator Sherman and Congressman Butterworth. The exposition is intended to celebrate not only the settlement of Cincinnati, but of Ohio and the whole Northwest. Accordingly Indiana, Michigan, Illinois., and Wisconsin have taken part in the celebration. The General Government assisted with an appropriation of $50,000 and the loan of collections from the Smithsonian Institute and the Patent Office. The signal for opening the exposition and setting the machinery in motion was given by the widow of President Polk, who, by touching an electric button at her home in Nashville, Tenn, sounded a gong in the exposition building. In the evening a grand pageant, illustrating the progress of science, art, and manufactures of the past century, passed before the Governor and his distinguished guests. The exposition will remain open for ten weeks.

The Reunion on the Battle-field of Gettysburg on three days of last week was the occasion of hearty fraternization of North and South. Fully a thousand Southern veterans were present at the opening exercises to meet the Northern regiments, and many more came later. A feature of the celebration was the dedication by the various States, notably New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Wisconsin, of a large number of monuments in memory of the brave men from each State who fell in the battle twenty-five years ago. On Monday the corner-stone of the Memorial Church of the Prince of Peace was laid on the battle-field with impressive ceremonies by Bishop Howe, of the Protestant Episcopal Church. A large number of stones to be used in its erection have been given by veterans, or friends of men who perished in the battle, and their names are inscribed on the stones. The manœuvres of the battle were rehearsed with the joining of hands as at former reunions, and Generals Sickles, Gordon, Longstreet, and Slocum were seen in friendly converse, taking interest in the various movements.

The Long-Anticipated Suit for Libel, of O'Donnell against the London Times, was tried last week, and resulted in a verdict for the newspaper. Mr. O'Donnell was formerly editor of United Ireland, and a member of the Parnellite party. He claimed that he had been injured by a series of articles published in the Times, under the heading of "Parnellism and Crime," in which the Parnellites were charged with associating with murderers and instigating crime. As he is not now a member of the party, O'Donnell's case was that he had suffered by the imputation, and claimed $250,000 damages. The case was conducted in a feeble manner, and, as the judge who tried it said, really served the cause of the Times more than that of the plaintiff. In defence the newspaper produced letters purporting to be written by Mr. Parnell implying that he was in association with the men who perpetrated the Phœnix Park murders, and that he approved of the crime. Mr. Parnell did not go upon the witness-stand, but in the House of Commons he denounced the letters as forgeries.

The Approaching Meeting between the Emperor of Germany and the Czar of Russia has taken Europe by surprise. For months past the relations of the two countries have been, if not strained, anything but cordial, and the newspapers of each country have attacked each other with bitter upbraidings. Now it is announced that the young Emperor proposes to pay a visit, the first of his reign, to his northern neighbor. The event is significant and the French nation, which hoped to have Russia's assistance in the next struggle with Germany, is unable to conceal its disappointment. It is believed to be Kaiser Wilhelm's intention about the 15th, or at the latest on the 18th inst., to leave Dantzic in the royal yacht Hohenzollern for Peterhof, where the two monarchs will greet one another. Count Herbert von Bismarck, among others, is to accompany the Kaiser. By August 1 His Majesty will be back again in the German capital. From St. Petersburg news comes that considerable preparations are already being made for a worthy reception of the German Kaiser. That the Emperor should visit the Czar before visiting the Emperor of Austria is also regarded as an ominous fact, as the triple alliance into which Germany entered was regarded as a pledge to protect Austria against Russia.

The Unanimous Vote of the French Senate to grant the extraordinary army appropriation demanded by the Secretary of War, indicates that France feels little confidence in the pacific assurances of the Emperor of Germany. The amount appropriated for the army alone was ninety-four million dollars. In asking for this sum the Secretary of War said to the Senate that it was intended to perfect the armament of the French troops and the completion of fortresses. "We must face manfully, added the Minister, "the eventualities in the presence of which we may find ourselves." These significant words produced a marked effect upon the Senate. It is somewhat remarkable that M. Boulanger has recently been gaining friends among the royalists, who appear to think that his destiny is to overthrow the Republic.

Canvassers Wanted to Sell, from House to House, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Any man, woman or youth may easily add to their income every week by selling the paper in their spare hours in their own neighborhood. For terms address Manager, 63 Bible House, New York.

The Pan-Presbyterian Council Met in London on July 4. At its first session a general report was read by Mr. Matthews, of Quebec. He stated that the church now numbered four million communicants, equivalent to twenty million adherents. He said that education was much looked after, as the principles they held did not commend themselves to persons without education. Respecting missions, sixty thousand communicants had been gathered into the Presbyterian Church from heathenism, and over five hundred ministers had been sent to preach the gospel to the heathen. At the evening session Mr. Van Norden, of New York, who presided, read a paper on the need of home missionary efforts. He said that the Presbyterian Church in America was never more prosperous or aggressive, freer from unbelief and heresy or more spiritual than to-day, because it was never more alive to missionary effort. Mr. Pierson, of Philadelphia, delivered a stirring address on organized Christian work. The next Council is to be held at Toronto.

Another Effort is to be Made to Gain the Release of the Rev. W. F. Davis, of Boston, Mass., who is in prison for preaching on the Common. His counsel has presented a petition for a writ of habeas corpus in the Supreme Judicial Court before Judge Field, in Boston, stating that he intended to raise a question as to the constitutionality of the city ordinance prohibiting preaching on the Common, in order to carry the case before the Supreme Court of the United States at Washington. Judge Field took the papers in the case under consideration.

Another Death in the Niagara Rapids took place on July 4. A man named Robert W. Flack, of Syracuse, N. Y., undertook to navigate the rapids in a boat of his own construction. He had built it of white pine lined with oak, and had fitted it with a propeller which could be worked by hand. It was shod with iron and was made expressly to stand the strain of the highest water. Flack had the utmost confidence in his boat, and assured the reporters that there was not the slightest doubt of his passing through the dangerous waters safely. He was buckled by a strap around his waist to his seat in the boat, so that if the boat capsized he would be in his place when it righted again. Twice after entering the rapids the boat made a somersault and came up right side uppermost, and the man could be seen using his steering apparatus. Once more it turned when opposite the Deveaux College grounds, but this time it floated on keel uppermost. The fatal strap had kept Flack under the boat and held him there, while the boat floated into the whirlpool and circled around. It was nearly an hour before some venturous swimmers succeeded in catching the boat and dragging it to land. Flack was still in it, held by the middle, his head and feet hanging limply together like the ends of a half empty sack. His face and body had been bounded until they were almost unrecognizable as human remains. The same spirit of adventure and unwarranted confidence in his own resources which led to his losing his life, have led many others losing their souls. The rapids of pleasure and the whirlpool of sin are more to be dreaded than Niagara. (Prov. 5: 22, 23.)

The Discovery of a Long Lost-Mother Will make the recent Republican convention in Chicago memorable to one of the delegates. The delegation from California entertained each other on their way East with personal reminiscences. Among them, one of the delegates from San Francisco, said that he had not been in Chicago since he was twelve years old. His family had lived in Baraboo, Wis., and when the father died he had started with his mother for New York. In the crowded railroad station in Chicago he had become separated from his mother, and had never seen her since. By mistake he got into an excursion train for Niagara Falls and was carried to Buffalo. There a benevolent man in the station helped him to New York, where he hoped to find his mother. He did not find her, but got work as errand boy in a store, and supported himself for six years. Then he went West, and turned up in a miners' camp in California. He struck "pay dirt," invested his earnings in San Francisco, and made money rapidly. He had written often to people to ask about his mother, but never obtained tidings of her. The delegate was in the convention the day Harrison was nominated. Just as he was coming out a patrol wagon went by with an old woman in it. The police were taking her to the poorhouse. He looked at her, stopped the wagon, and found his mother. She accompanied him the next day to his home in San Francisco. Doubtless the mother also, during the long years of their separation, had vainly sought her lost son. Happily for the wandering sinner separation from his heavenly Father need never continue long. To the seeking soul God is always near. (1 Chron. 28: 9.)

A Charity Girl's Fortune was Announced to her foster-father at Breslau, L. I., last week. About three years ago a tailor happened to see among the children in the poorhouse of Hudson County, New Jersey, a bright little girl, who impressed him so favorably that he asked permission to adopt her. The child's parents, who were in indigent circumstances, gave their consent and the authorities of the poorhouse accordingly transferred their charge to the tailor. She has been tenderly cared for and educated, her foster parents treating her as their own child. To their astonishment, last week a lawyer waited upon them and announced that the little girl was heiress to $125,000. Her mother, it appeared, was the daughter of wealthy parents in London, but they had cast her off because she had married against their wishes. They are now dead, and though they were unable to forgive their daughter, they so far relented as to leave this fortune to her eldest child. The poor little charity child, the adopted daughter of the tailor, is now therefore a wealthy little heiress, much to her own surprise and that of her foster-parents. Greater surprises even than that are in store when God acknowledges His children before the assembled world. Then it will be found that among the poor and despised are some who are "heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ." (James 2: 5.)

Two Astonished Prisoners Stood before the Judge in a New York Police Court on July 2. They had been brought into the station-house the previous evening, charged with "loitering," and had been kept there all night. When confronted with the judge the man and his female companion expressed considerable indignation at the treatment they had received for "loitering," which certainly did not appear a very heinous offence to commit on the evening of a day in which the thermometer had been registering nearly a hundred degrees in the shade. The man especially seemed to expect that they would be immediately released and the officer who had arrested them severely reprimanded. The case, however, assumed a different aspect when the policeman told his story. He had looked up the record of the prisoners. He showed that the man had committed crimes in Galveston, Tex., and in St. Louis, Mo., and that the woman's record was not clean. The prisoners had doubtless forgotten that the police had facilities for learning the past life of criminals, and producing it at the proper time. A similar mistake is made by men who, when alarmed about the prospect of death and judgment, think that all they have to do is to "turn over a fresh leaf" and become reformed characters. Unless their past sins are blotted out by the blood of Jesus, through faith, they cannot stand in the judgment. (Prov. 20:9).

The Purchase and Sale of a Husband for two hundred dollars are recorded in the Chicago Times. It is stated that a young married man living at Montreal, Canada, contracted expensive habits, and though he was earning considerable income as book-keeper in a wholesale house, he contributed nothing to household expenses, but spent all his money on fashionable clothes, expensive jewelry, and personal indulgences. His wife was reduced to painful straits, and expostulated with him frequently. Ultimately he became enamored with another lady, and deserted his wife. She followed him to Chicago, where she had the pair arrested. Before the trial came on, the prisoners pleaded with the injured wife, begging her to refrain from prosecuting them. The husband even promised to return to his home if the case were dropped. The wife, however, was not moved by that inducement, as the return of her husband did not promise to conduce to her happiness. Finally, the woman for whom her husband had deserted her agreed to give the wife two hundred dollars if she would abandon the prosecution and all claims on the husband. This the wife consented to do, and the transaction was completed. The disgraceful immorality of the bargain will surely work its own retribution, and the purchaser of the husband will probably be the worst sufferer. Though she had the money to purchase him, it is unlikely that she has the power to reform him. But for that power even the incalculable price with which Christ purchased His bride, when He redeemed her with His precious blood, would have been wasted. He is able to make her "holy and without blemish." (Eph. 5: 25–27.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The National Temperance Camp-meeting, at Ocean Grove, N. J., will be held August 1–5.

The Young Men's Christian Association of Cleveland, Ohio, has received a gift of $25,000 toward the erection of its new building, from Mr. John D. Rockefeller, President of the Standard Oil Company.

The Rev. Thomas Harrison closed his labors at the Jane Street M. E. Church, New York, on July 1, when a grand thanksgiving jubilee was held, to rejoice over the conversion of seventeen hundred souls.

Mr. George W. Vanderbilt has given a commodious building to the city of New York to be used as a circulating library, and has furnished it, and equipped it with six thousand volumes of standard literature.

The American Institute of Christian Philosophy will hold its eleventh Summer School at Round Lake, N. Y., July 26–August 1; and the Twelfth School at Key East, N. J., August 7–11. Full information may be obtained of the Secretary, Mr. C. M. Davis, 4 Winthorp Place, New York.

The Rev. H. G. Pendleton, the veteran Congregationalist minister, familiarly known as "Father Pendleton," died on July 3 at Chenoa, Ill. He was eighty-seven years of age, and during his long life had been the founder or organizer of a large number of Congregational churches in Illinois.

The Rev. E. Walpole Warren requested the trustees of Holy Trinity Church, New York, to hoist the Stars and Stripes on July 4 from the flagstaff over the porch. Though the Doctor is an imported pastor, and the church has been fined for importing him, he is evidently in sympathy with American patriotism.

Mr. George Muller was in Auckland, New Zealand, at the close of April. On the 23d of that month he had been twelve weeks in New Zealand, but the openings for service were so abundant that he thought it likely he might be detained three, four, or six weeks longer in Auckland, besides visiting other places in the North Island.

A noble monument to the memory of Helen Hunt Jackson, is to be erected at Santa Fe, New Mexico. It will be a thirty-thousand dollar building, to be used for an Indian girls' school. One hundred and fifty pupils will be accommodated. The school will bear the name of the devoted friend of the Indians, the author of "A Century of Dishonor."

Mr. Araki Miyake, a native Japanese, and a graduate of Rutgers College, delivered an address on Sunday evening, June 3, in Emanuel Reformed Episcopal Church, Newark, N. J., under the auspices of the Cawnpore Mission Band of that church, on "Japan and Christianity." He gave a very encouraging account of the progress and prospects of Christianity in Japan.

A delegation from the English Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, Trinity College, Dublin, and Utrecht University, Holland, arrived last week in New York and proceeded to Northfield, Mass., to take part in the Conference on Christian Work and Bible Study being held by Mr. Moody. About four hundred delegates from the various branches of the Young Men's Christian Associations of America are also in attendance.

Clergymen and Evangelists who will Allow Copies of the CHRISTIAN HERALD to be placed in the seats of churches, or will have them distributed at the doors, will be supplied with assorted parcels of back number if they will write to the Manager, 63 Bible House, New York.

AN IMPIOUS TAUNT.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"He trusted in God; let Him deliver Him now, if He will have Him: for He said, I am the Son of God." Matt. 27: 43.

The Sin Bearer Taunted—I. The Acknowledgment of His Faith — The Mockers Said He Trusted in God—How They Knew—By His Life—A Personal Faith—Makes Men Strong—The Mentonese and the Prince of Monaco—II. The Test the Essence of the Taunt—Logical—An Item for the Devil's Gazette—A Brave Patient in Guy's Hospital—All Faith Must be Tried—III. The Answer—God Does Deliver—By Sustaining—In His Own Way.

IT is very painful to the heart to picture our blessed Master in His death-agonies, surrounded by a ribald multitude, who watched Him and mocked Him, made sport of His prayer and insulted His faith. Nothing was sacred to them: they invaded the Holy of Holies of His confidence in God, and taunted Him concerning that faith in Jehovah which they were compelled to admit. Beloved, the treatment of our Lord Jesus Christ by men is the clearest proof of total depravity which can possibly be required or discovered. Those must be stony hearts indeed which can laugh at a dying Saviour, and in God! Compassion would seem to have deserted humanity, while malice sat supreme on the throne. Painful as the picture is, it will do you good to paint it. You will need neither canvas nor brush nor palette nor colors. Let your thoughts draw the outline, and your love fill in the detail; I shall not complain if imagination heightens the coloring. The Son of God, whom angels adore with veiled faces, is pointed at with scornful fingers by men who thrust out the tongue and mockingly exclaim, "He trusted on the Lord that He would deliver Him: let Him deliver Him, seeing He delighted in Him."

While thus we see our Lord in His sorrow and His shame as our substitute, we must not forget that He also is there as our representative. In Him we see what we have in our measure to endure. "As He is, so are we also in this world." We also must be crucified to the world, and we may look for somewhat of those tests of faith and taunts of derision which go with such a crucifixion. "Marvel not if the world hate you." You, too, must suffer without the gate. Not for the world's redemption, but for the accomplishment of divine purposes in you, and through you to the sons of men, you must be made to know the cross and its shame.

I. First, then, my beloved brethren, you who know the Lord by faith, and live by trusting in Him, let me invite you to observe which these mockers made of our Lord's faith: He trusted in God." Yet the Saviour did not wear any peculiar garb or token by which He let men know that He trusted in God. He was not a recluse, neither did He join some little knot of separatists, who boasted their peculiar trust in Jehovah. Although our Saviour was separate from sinners, yet He was eminently a man among men, and He went in and out among the multitude as one of themselves. His one peculiarity was that "He trusted in God." This was the one thing which distinguished him among men—"He trusted in God," and He lived such a life as naturally grows out of faith in the Eternal Lord. This peculiarity had been visible even to that ungodly multitude who least of all cared to perceive a spiritual point of character. Was ever any other upon a cross thus saluted by the mob who watched His execution? Had these scorners ever mocked any one before for such a matter as this? I trow not. Yet faith had been so manifest in our Lord's daily life that the crowd cried, "He trusted in God."

How did they know? I suppose they could not help seeing that He made much of God in His teaching, in His life, and in His miracles. Whenever Jesus spoke it was always godly talk; and if it was not always distinctly about God, it was always about things that related to God, that came from God, that led to God, that magnified God. A man may be fairly judged by that which he makes most of. The ruling passion is a fair gauge of the heart. What a soul-ruler faith is! It sways the man as the rudder guides the ship. When a man once gets to live by faith in God, it tinctures his thoughts, it masters his purposes, it flavors his words, it puts a tone into his actions, and it comes out in everything by ways and means most natural and unconstrained, till men perceive that they have to do with a man who makes much of God. To our Lord Jesus, God was all in all; and when you come to estimate God as He did, then the most careless onlooker will soon begin to say of you, "He trusted in God."

In addition to observing that Jesus made much of God, men came to note that He was a trusting man, and not self-confident. Certain persons are very proud because they are Self-Made Men.

I will do them credit to admit that they heartily worship their Maker. Self made them, and they worship self. We have among us individuals who are self-sufficient, and almost all-sufficient; they sneer at those who do not succeed, for they can succeed anywhere at anything. A vat of sufficiency ferments within their ribs! There was nothing of that sort of thing in our Lord. The words that He spake He spake not of Himself, and the great deeds that He did He never boasted of, but said, "The Father that dwelleth in Me, He doeth the works." He was a truster in God, not a boaster in self.

It is evident that the Lord Jesus trusted in God openly, since even yonder gibing crowd proclaimed it. Some good people try to exercise faith on the sly: they practice it in snug corners, and in lonely hours, but they are afraid to say much before others, for fear their faith should not see the promise fulfilled. They dare not say, with David, "My soul shall make her boast in the Lord: the humble shall hear thereof, and be glad." This secrecy robs God of His honor. Brethren, we do not glorify our God as He ought to be glorified. Let us trust in Him, and own it. Oh, I want you so to live that those who dislike you most may, nevertheless, know that you do trust in God! When you come to die, may your dear children say of you, "Our dear mother did trust in the Lord!" May that boy, who has gone furthest away from Christ, and grieved your heart the most, nevertheless say in his heart, "There may be hypocrites in the world, but my dear father does truly trust in God!" Oh, that our faith may be known unmistakably!

Faith Must Begin at Home.

Of what use were the longest arm if it were not fixed to the man himself at the shoulder? If you have no faith about yourself, what faith can you have about others? "He trusted in the Lord that He would deliver Him." Come, beloved, have you such a faith in the living God? Do you trust in God through Christ Jesus that He will save you? Yes, you poor, unworthy one, the Lord will deliver you if you trust him. Yes, poor woman, or unknown man, the Lord can help you in your present trouble, and in every other, and He will do so if you trust Him to that end. May the Holy Spirit lead you to first trust the Lord Jesus for the pardon of sin, and then to trust for all things.

Certainly, dear friends, it is extremely comfortable to trust in God. I find it so, and therefore speak. To roll your burden upon the Lord, since He will sustain you, is a blessed way of being quit of care. We know Him to be faithful, and as powerful as He is faithful; and our dependence upon Him is the solid foundation of a profound peace. If you trust in men—the best of men—you are likely to be lowered by your trust. We are apt to cringe before those who patronize us. If your prosperity depends upon a person's smile, you are tempted to pay homage even when it is undeserved. The old saying mentions a certain person as "knowing on which side his bread is buttered." Thousands are practically degraded by trusting men. But when our reliance is upon the livi God, we are raised by it, and elevated both mc ally and spiritually.

This confidence in God makes men strong. should advise the enemy not to oppose the m who trusts in God. In the long run he will beaten, as Haman found it with Mordecai. I had been warned of this: "If Mordecai be of t seed of the Jews, before whom thou hast beg to fall, thou shalt not prevail against him, b shalt surely fall before him." Contend not wi a man who has God at his back. Years ago t Mentonese desired to break away from the d minion of the Prince of Monaco. They the fore drove out his agent. The prince came wi his army—not a great one, it is true, but s formidable to the Mentonese. I know not wh the high and mighty princeling was not goi to do; but the news came that the King of S dinia was coming up in the rear to help t Mentonese, and, therefore, his lordship of M naco very prudently retired to his own ro When a believer stands out against evil, he m be sure that the Lord will not be far away.

II. Secondly, I want you to follow me brie in considering the test which is which was hurled by the mockers against Lord—"Let Him deliver Him now, if He w have Him." Such a test will come to all l lievers. It may come as a taunt from enemi it will certainly come as a trial of your faith. T arch-enemy will assuredly hiss out, "Let H deliver Him, seeing He delighted in Him."

This taunt has about it the appearance being very logical, and indeed in a measure it is. If God has promised to deliver us, and have openly professed to believe the promise is only natural that others should say, "Let see whether He does deliver him. This m believes that the Lord will help him; and must help him, or else the man's faith is a de sion." This is the sort of test to which we o selves would have put others before our conv sion, and we cannot object to be proved in same manner ourselves. Perhaps we incline run away from the ordeal, but this very shri ing should be a solemn call to us to quest the genuineness of that faith which we are afr to test. "He trusted on the Lord," says enemy, "that He would deliver him: let H deliver him"; and surely, however malici the design, there is no escaping from the lo of the challenge.

The taunt is specially pointed and perso It is put thus: "He trusted on the Lord t He would deliver Him: let Him deliver Him "Do not come to us with your fiddle-fad about God's helping all His chosen. Here i man who is one of His people; will He help hi Do not talk to us big things about Jehovah the Red Sea, or in the Desert of Sinai, or C helping His people in ages past. Here is a ing man before us who trusted in God that would deliver him: let Him deliver him no You know how Satan will pick out one of most afflicted, and pointing his fingers at h will cry, "Let Him deliver HIM." Brethren, test is fair. God will be True to Every Believer.

If any one child of God could be lost, it wo be quite enough to enable the devil to spoil the glory of God for ever. If one promise God to one of His people should fail, that failure would suffice to mar the veracity of Lord to all eternity; they would publish it the Diabolical Gazette, and in every street Tophet they would howl it out, "God has fail God has broken His promise. God has cea to be faithful to His people." It would th be a horrible reproach—"He trusted in God deliver him, but He did not deliver him."

Much emphasis lies in its being in the pres tense: "He trusted in God that He would liver Him: let Him deliver Him now." I Thee, O Lord Jesus; Thou art not now in the w derness, where the fiend is saying, "If Thou the Son of God, command that these stones ıade bread." No. Thou art nailed to a tree; hine enemies have hemmed Thee in. The gionaries of Rome are at the foot of the cross. ıe scribes and Pharisees and raging Jews com- ıss Thee about. There is no escape from eath for Thee! Hence their cry: "Let Him eliver Him now." Ah, brothers and sisters! ıis is how Satan assails us, using our present ıd pressing tribulations as the barbs of his ar- ows. Yet here also there is reason and logic the challenge.

I told you a story the other day of the brother Guy's Hospital to whom the doctors said that must undergo an operation which was ex- emely dangerous. They gave him a week to onsider whether he would submit to it. He as troubled for his young wife and children, ıd for his work for the Lord. A friend left a ınch of flowers for him, with this verse as its otto, "He trusted in God; let Him deliver im now." "Yes," he thought, "now." In ayer he cast himself upon the Lord, and felt his heart, "Come on, doctors, I am ready for ou!" When the next morning came, he refused take chloroform, for he desired to go to eaven in his senses. He bore the operation anfully, and he is yet alive. "He trusted on ıe Lord that He would deliver him" then and ıere, and the Lord did so.

A Christian man may be beaten in business, may fail to meet all demands, and then Sa- n yells, "Let Him deliver him now." The oor man has been out of work for two or ree months, tramping the streets of London ıtil he has worn out his boots; he has been ought to his last penny. I think I hear the ugh of the Prince of Darkness as he cries, Let Him deliver him now." Or else the be- ever is very ill in body, and low in spirit, and en Satan howls, "Let Him deliver him now." ome of us have been

e were moved with indignation because of adly error, and we spoke plainly, but men re- sed to hear. Those we relied upon deserted ; good men sought their own ease and would ot march with us, and we had to bear testi- ony for despised truth alone, until we were our- lves despised. Then the adversary shouted, Let Him deliver him now." Be it so! We do ot refuse the test. Our God whom we serve ll deliver us. We will not bow down to mod- n thought nor worship the image which hu- an wisdom has set up. Our God is God both hills and of valleys. He will not fail his serv- ts, albeit that for awhile He forbears that He ay try their faith. We dare accept the test, d say, "Let Him deliver us now."

Beloved friends, we need not be afraid of this unt if it is brought by adversaries; for, after , the test will come to us apart from any alice, for it is inevitable. Brethren, we have t a tithe of the faith we think we have. But ıether or not, all our od builds no ships but what He sends to sea. living, in losing, in working, in weeping, in ffering, or in striving, God will find a fitting ıcible for every single grain of the precious th which He has given us.

Yes, the test will come again and again. May gibes of adversaries only make us ready for sterner ordeals of the judgment to come! O dear friends, examine your religion. You ve a great deal of it, some of you; but ıat, of its quality? Can your religion stand the t of poverty, and scandal, and scorn? Can it nd the test of scientific sarcasm and learned ntempt? Will your religion stand the test of ıg sickness of body, and depression of spirit ıused by weakness? What are you doing amid common trials of life? What will you do in swellings of Jordan? Examine well your th, since all hangs there. Some of us who ve lain for weeks together, peering through e thin veil which parts us from the unseen, ve been made to feel that nothing will suffice but a promise which will answer the taunt, .et Him deliver us now."

III. I shall finish, in the third place, dear friends, by noticing to the test. God does deliver those who trust in Him. God's interposition for the faithful is not a dream, but a substantial reality. "Many are the afflictions of the righteous; but the Lord delivereth him out of them all." All history proves the faithfulness of God. Those who trust God have been in all sorts of troubles; but they have always been delivered. They have been bereaved. What a horrible bereavement was that which fell to the lot of Aaron, when his two sons were struck dead for their profanity in the presence of God! "And Aaron held his peace!" What grace was there! Thus will the Lord sustain you also, should He take away the desire of your eyes with a stroke. Grave after grave has the good man visited, till it seemed that his whole race was buried, yet his heart has not been broken; but he has bowed his soul before the will of the ever-blessed One. Thus has the Lord delivered His afflicted one by sustaining him. In other ways the bush has burned, and yet has not been consumed.

But God's ways of deliverance are His own. He does not deliver according to the translation put upon "deliverance" by the ribald throng. He does not deliver according to the interpretation put upon "deliverance" by our shrinking flesh and blood. He delivers, but it is in His own way. Let me remark that, if God delivers you and me in the same way as He delivered His own Son, we can have no cause of complaint.

What Kind of a Deliverance was that? Did the Father tear up the cross from the earth? Did He proceed to draw out the nails from the sacred hands and feet of His dear Son? Did He set Him down upon that "green hill far away, beyond the city wall," and place in His hand a sword of fire with which to smite His adversaries? Did He bid the earth open and swallow up all His foes? No: nothing of the kind. Jehovah did not interpose to spare His Son a single pang; but He let Him die. He let Him be taken as a dead man down from the cross and laid in a tomb. Jesus went through with His suffering to the bitter end. O brothers and sisters, this may be God's way of delivering us. We have trusted in God that He would deliver us; and His rendering of His promise is, that He will enable us to go through with it; we shall suffer to the last, and triumph in so doing.

Anyhow, He will deliver His chosen: the taunt of the adversary shall not cause our God to forget or forego His people. I know that the Lord will no more fail me than any other of His servants. He will not leave a faithful witness to his adversaries. "I know that my Avenger liveth, and that He shall stand at the latter day upon the earth: and though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God: whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another; though my reins be consumed within me." Is this also your confidence? Then do not sit down in sorrow, and act as though you despaired. Quit yourselves like men. Be strong, fear not.

There are times when we may use this text to our comfort. "Let Him deliver Him now," saith the text, "if He will have Him." You, dear friends, who have never believed in the Lord Jesus Christ before, how I wish you could try Him now! You feel this morning full of sin, and full of need. Come, then, and trust the Saviour now. See whether He will not save you now. "Oh," you say, "I am in such an unfit state; I am in all the deshabille of my carelessness and godlessness." Come along, man, come along, just as you are. Tarry not for improvement or arrangement, for both of these Jesus will give you; come and put your trust in the great Sacrifice for sin, and He will deliver you—deliver you now. Lord, save the sinner, now!

It may be that some of us are in trouble about the church and the faith. We have defended God's truth as well as we could, and spoken out against deadly error; but craft and numbers have been against us, and at present things seem to have gone wrong. If we have not spoken in God's name we are content to go back to the dust from whence we sprang; but if we have spoken God's truth, we defy the whole confederacy to prevail against it. Let us drown the taunts of the adversary with our shouts of Hallelujah! The Lord shall reign for ever and ever. Hallelujah. Amen!

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

A BALTIMORE POLICEMAN'S CONVERSION.*

A POLICEMAN was appointed to guard the doors of the church during the services held by Rev. Thomas Harrison, at Baltimore, owing to the pressure of the crowds who sought admission. On one occasion a young man came after the church was full, and was refused admission by the policeman. He urged his request with importunity, and said that Mr. Harrison had invited specially, that night, such as he to attend. The policeman had been duped on a previous occasion by a similar plea, and still objected to let the young man in. At length he consented to appeal to Mr. Harrison, as to the truth of the statement, and the policeman and the young man entered together. While waiting to speak to the evangelist, the power of the Holy Spirit operated on the hearts of both, and that night the policeman and his charge were both rejoicing in the Saviour.

A Young Captain.

There was living in Baltimore, at the time, a young soldier, who had been a captain in the army. He was an intelligent man, and something of a wit. He was the leader of a circle of godless young men, whose chief delight consisted in caricaturing religion and religious teachers, and he was deputed to hear "the boy preacher," and report to his associates. He made his way into one of the meetings, with this wicked object. Mr. Harrison's first words that night were: "My text is but one word, and I have but a very few words to say about it. My text is 'Eternity,' and I ask you where you will spend it?" The man heard no more; with the question ringing in his ears he left the building. He found his associates, and said, "That man has asked me a question I cannot answer. He wanted to know where I was going to spend eternity, and I believe I shall spend it in hell. I am going back to talk to him." He returned to the meeting, accompanied by his friends, and before Mr. Harrison left Baltimore, he had the pleasure of seeing them all publicly profess their faith in Jesus, and their joy in His salvation.

The Dying Sister.

A pure-minded invalid sister was exceedingly anxious for the salvation of her wicked brothers. She invited them around her dying bed, and besought them to come to Christ for salvation. One of them was deeply affected, and in a few days he sent a letter to the ringleader of the company of wicked men that he mingled with, asking for a private interview. The letter was answered in person; and after inquiring as to the great secret for which he sent for him, he was surprised to find that he was sent for because his friend was in earnest for the salvation of his soul, but he did not want to go forward for prayers without having his companions go with him. After hearing his simple story, he said to his friend:

"I am glad for you. I hope you will go on with your good purpose. I do not know what I shall do; but we will write letters of invitation, and have a meeting in my parlor." The letters were sent, and some met to decide what they would do in relation to the salvation of their souls. Not a Christian among them! But they had told a Christian man to be ready if they should call for his help.

They discussed this great subject till nine o'clock, P. M. There was one noted drunkard among them, who had made his home more like hell than heaven. He arose and said:

"Boys, you all know me, and you know what a wicked man I have been, and how miserable I have made my family. I have decided that it is time for me to change my course of life. I am going to the Union Square Church, and am going forward for prayers, if I go alone."

This settled the matter with eight more, and they all, nine, went to the church to seek salvation. The pastor had expected them all the evening, and met them at the door of the church, and made a way for them to go to the altar. They pressed their way through the crowd, and cried mightily to God for mercy, and found salvation.

The next day they sent out letters in every direction, inviting their companions to meet in the vestry of the church, and about fifty responded to the call—not a Christian among them, except the converts. But Dr. France stood ready to go down and help them, when they gave the signal.

After the pastor went down to the vestry, Mr. Oran, the miserable drunkard I wrote about, arose, and said. "Gentlemen, you all know me—what an awful sinner I have been. But God has wrought a great change in me. He has forgiven all my sins, and renewed my heart after His likeness; and if you cannot believe me, who have been so wicked, then go and ask my wife."

This was conclusive evidence that he was truly converted, and fully determined to be faithful to God and man.

Something to Lean on.

An old gentleman rose for prayers one night during Mr. Harrison's service at the Brooklyn Tabernacle. He was accompanied by his two daughters, who had been converted during the services, and who had with difficulty persuaded their father to attend just once. To the intense joy of his children, he listened attentively; and when those desiring prayer were asked to stand up, he arose. In conversing with him at the after-meeting, he said he was seventy-five years of age, and had led 'a fair sort of life,' and had 'not been a very bad man'; he was old now, and, as he quaintly expressed it, 'wanted something to lean on.' By the blessing of God he was brought to see that his boasted righteousness counted for nothing, and he learned that in Jesus he had a support on which he might lean in time and in eternity. His day of indifference was over, and in the eventide of his life he has light.

A MATRIMONIAL BURDEN.

"Ah! Mrs. Thornton, I am glad to see you here," said a society man, as he languidly seated himself beside a lady at a fashionable party. It is such a bore to talk to those simpering girls. You are always piquant and charming. Shall we see Mr. Thornton here to-night?"

"No; he is immersed in his books, as usual. He would only be miserable if he came, and would make me miserable, so I did not urge him to come. He regards all evenings spent in society as a waste of time, I believe."

"Well, he is quite right about that, but what is one to do with one's time? One must get rid of it somehow, and this is a very delightful way of wasting it. Cannot you get him to look at it in that light?"

"Not at all, Mr. West. Mr. Thornton is so desperately in earnest about his work that his difficulty is, not to get rid of time, but to get time enough. He works all night, sometimes, when he has been interrupted in the day."

"What a strange life his must be! Quite refreshing in these days when no one seems to be in earnest about anything. Then you have to idle for two?"

"I have to come alone to such places as this, if that is what you mean. I do not choose to retire altogether from the world yet, and of course, if my husband will not come with me, I must come alone. It is very dull for me; I suppose there are many who think I am a widow, or have quarrelled with my husband."

"That mistake might lead to results more agreeable to you than to Mr. Thornton."

"Oh! I do not think he troubles. I often tell him that his books and his literary reputation are dearer to him than his wife is. They certainly occupy more of his attention."

"I cannot think that is possible with such a wife," said Mr. West, gallantly; "I expect he prefers to have your society when he can have it altogether. If he came out with you he would have to share it with your friends. It may be an excess of devotion on his part."

"You are very ingenious, Mr. West; you should have been a lawyer. Your clients would have risen in their own esteem when they heard your pleading. But I know too much to be influenced. When Mr. Thornton and I do spend an evening alone we have the dullest time. I cannot interest him in anything. I wanted his advice about re-furnishing the drawing-room, and gave up an evening last week to deciding about it; but he said he would rather leave it entirely to me. He offered me a cheque for the expense, but he would not help me to decide anything. He is just absorbed in his work, and is quite distraught when he is on any other track."

"What a doleful picture! How did he ever succeed in making love? Did he bring his books and read to you?"

"Not exactly, but I read them for myself. They helped to fascinate me, and Mr. Thornton was more fascinating himself as a lover than as a husband. I had no idea then that he would think of shutting himself up in his study all day and leaving me to just die of loneliness and monotony."

"Still, you can amuse yourself; he does not object to that, I suppose?"

"Oh, no; but it is dreary work. When I see other ladies escorted by their husbands, and receiving attention from them all the time, I am just ready to cry with vexation. Of course, I know that an income has to be earned, but Mr. Thornton is so easy with the people he deals with. He ought to be better paid for his work, then he would not have to do so much."

"I suppose rather a large sum is required?" said Mr. West, glancing at the handsome dress which Mrs. Thornton wore, and the jewels that glistened on her fingers.

"Oh, no; Mr. Thornton likes me to dress well, and to have the house as I like it; he never objects to give any money I need. But I am very careful. A great many ladies spend more than double what I do."

"That point of providing the funds amiably is a decided merit," said Mr. West sententiously. "I think I have heard more complaints on that score than on any other. Generally it is quite an ordeal for a wife to extract a cheque from her husband. As a bachelor I have no personal knowledge, but I have certainly heard ladies refer to it as a very painful experience. You should be thankful that you are spared that."

"Oh! it is not quite all gloom. If Mr. Thornton would only be more sociable, and take an interest in ordinary affairs I would be content. His connecting himself with that church was the turning-point. Things were not so bad before that. It takes his time, and I think he does a great deal of gratuitous work for it, and it increased his expenses too. I am sure of that, for I have heard his liberality praised, and I lectured him about it. How can he provide

It a dreary lot—that of the hard uncomplain- worker. His profession tasked his brain to the ost limit of endurance; he must work early late continuously, lest debt, the enemy he ded, should overtake him. And he was out sympathy; that was worst of all. That r he had done all, his wife should not be py, should complain of his neglect, should perceive that his work was for her, was as a ght around his neck, rendering every burden vier. Hith- he had borne his burden cheerfully, had ened to reproaches without retort, had sed to reason or defend himself, and was ifully doing his duty. "O God, help me, for ist's sake," he prayed. "In thee alone is hope." How many thousands of God's children are uttering the same prayer, daily, hourly, almost crushed beneath burdens that their fellows know nothing of, yet sustained in the path of duty by God's strength, and learning day by day the faithfulness of Him who has said, "My grace is sufficient for thee"!

THE EPOCHS OF A LIFE.

By Rev. L. S. Keyser.

A Better Light.

THE earnestness with which Miss Havelock urged Hadley to enter upon an anti-Christian crusade in the college moved him powerfully. No man likes to admit that he lacks courage, and especially to a charming girl who declares that if she were a man she would not be afraid. Belle Havelock's words had almost stung the young student, but her friendly grasp of the hand at parting and her bewitching smile took away any personal pain he might have felt.

On his way to his rooms he could still feel the thrill of her touch. His emotions were in a flurried state. It was impossible to analyze them. Her cynicism repelled him, while her intelligence and beauty attracted him. In her opposition to revelation she evinced so much earnestness and sincerity, and withal seemed to have so high a regard for the truth, that he could not but respect her.

Her enthusiasm was contagious. Before Hadley retired that night, he had given his roommate an epitome of his conversation with the brilliant girl, and though George was less infected by her intensity, the two young doubters resolved that the policy of repression had dominated them long enough, and that they would avail themselves of the first opportunity to begin a vigorous campaign against Christianity.

This resolution would perhaps have been carried out immediately had not a new star crossed the orbit of Hadley's life, which for a time made a new centre for his thoughts diametrically opposed in its influence to the star whose brilliant but baleful rays would lead him into the arena of anti-Christian conflict.

That, also, sprang from a woman's nature. Oh, if women only realized their power and their responsibility, how different a world this would be! How the power before which men bow might be used to guide, to stimulate, to guard the lives of lovers and husbands, and to develop the good that is in them! It would be difficult to gauge the power that one beautiful, consecrated woman has at her disposal. No more mighty influence do we know of in this world, below that of the Spirit of God.

Such a woman it was upon whom the eyes of Hadley and his friend rested as they entered the class-room of the Professor of Languages on the morning after Hadley's interview with Belle Havelock. She was sitting quietly and modestly there as a student, utterly devoid of self-consciousness and apparently oblivious of the fact that many eyes were bent on her in mute admiration.

"Look at that young lady, Hadley," said Dane. "Did you ever see so spiritual a face? If I were a painter wanting a model for an angel I should look no further."

"Yes, she is very beautiful," said Hadley. "Who is she?"

"I do not know," Dane replied. "I think I had rather not know. She is a being I should prefer to worship afar off. I never saw such exquisite grace and purity embodied in a human face before. It would ruin the charm to hear her utter the young lady frivolities that probably are all that she can produce. I should not like to have my conception marred."

"Nonsense!" said Madelling; "you are too sentimental. If I can get to know her I shall. She is only human, after all, and I daresay is amenable to masculine influence."

When the new-comer's turn came to recite both young men listened intently. Her voice was singularly clear and melodious, and in translating the Latin verse she used well-chosen and correct words. A question or two from the professor as to idiom and construction she answered intelligently and with ease.

The class passed from room to room until at last they were in the presence of their instructor in mathematics. This was the last recitation of the morning. The professor seemed to be perfectly confident of the abilities of the new girl student, for, addressing her, he said: "Miss Winters, will you go to the board and solve the eighth problem?" Hadley noticed that it was one of the most difficult problems of the lesson. His own name was mentioned in conjunction with hers, and as he went to the board to solve the problem assigned him, he stood by her side.

Their hands came into close propinquity more than once. It was with pleasure that he furtively watched the easy grace and mastery with which the girl drew her figures and manipulated her signs. Presently it happened that he was putting down a column of figures near the place on the board where she was drawing a mathematical diagram. By an accident their hands touched. She glanced up at him innocently. As their eyes met, a thrill ran through him, causing the blood to mount, as if propelled by the piston of an engine, to his forehead and temples.

"Of course, she might disappoint one on nearer acquaintance, as you say," remarked Hadley to his friend, when they had reached their study. "One cannot always trust his first impressions. I have had some recent experience confirmatory of that fact, for when I first saw Belle Havelock I thought that I had received an attack of the 'grand passion'; but, while I admire her as much as ever, I have been disappointed in her in some respects. She is not the kind of girl I should choose for a lady-love. Too cynical. While it is perfectly proper to be bold and outspoken against the Christian errors, I still should not be able to love a girl who shows so much contempt for sacred institutions—who doesn't even believe in heaven or immortality. Perhaps Miss Winters would be disappointing in other respects. But I think not. If I mistake not, she is a believer in the Christian religion. The opinion is forced upon me intuitively when I look at her. But we will keep ourselves on the qui vive for a few days and see whether we can find out anything about her."

"One thing seems to be obvious," replied George, "and that is, she is very bright intellectually. With what clear, confident tones she gave the explanation of her problem! It was thrilling. But how modest she is! Did you see how she blushed when the class applauded her? I doubt whether she really liked it. I do not know that I should fall in love with her, but I believe that I should enjoy her society."

"As for myself, I am not so sure about not falling in love," said Hadley, doubtfully. "Perhaps I am too impressionable, but if I had any objection to taking that plunge, I should avoid her company. Under the circumstances, however, I shall keep my eye on her for a few days, and if she proves to be what her début promises, I shall seek an introduction."

The week, with its studies, recitations, and social enjoyments, passed. The oftener Hadley saw Miss Winters the more he was fascinated by her grace, beauty, and mental brilliance. As his restive mind was continually harassed more or less by theological questions, he was more than curious to learn what was her attitude toward religion. His curiosity was destined to be gratified before long.

It happened one day in the recitation-room of the Professor of Mental Philosophy, that a question was put to Miss Winters in such a way as to require an unequivocal declaration of her views on a cardinal doctrine of Christianity. In firm, clear tones, without a moment's hesitation, and yet without dogmatism, her conviction was expressed; so that all knew that she was a firm believer in evangelical truth. A moment of silence followed her declaration. Then some one began to applaud. Hadley glanced around and saw that it was Duneman. The next moment the room vibrated with the hearty applause of the whole class, in which the two sceptics, almost against their own volition, found themselves joining. Afterward, as a sort of emolient for their consciences, they explained that they had not acclaimed the girl's sentiments, but the girl herself,

It was now clear to the young sceptics that Miss Winters was a Christian girl. There is perhaps something paradoxical in every nature, Much as Hadley detested the tenets of religion for himself, he experienced no special revulsion of feeling when he discovered that Miss Winters accepted the Scriptures with an acquiescent faith. One thing was "a foregone conclusion." She was incapable of hypocrisy. If she accepted the gospel, she also tried to conform her life to its principles. How she could accept it mystified him, but the fact that so intellectual a girl believed it, was, in a measure, a presumption in its favor. So that for a day or two he rather oscillated toward a favorable view of the gospel.

However, it was unfortunate that the divinity student noticed the applause bestowed by the two young sceptics upon Miss Winters' statement in the recitation-room. As he had once suffered humiliation at Hadley's hands, he improved the occasion at the next meeting of the Athenian Society, on the following Friday evening, to deliver him a severe castigation. It may be remarked that this organization was made up of young men only, and gave but one or two public exhibitions during the year. The meeting referred to was an ordinary one. Mr. Duneman appeared to feel it his duty to make an invidious thrust at "the insincerity of infidels," as he entitled his speech. After speaking awhile he said: "We had an exhibition of the lack of sincerity among opposers of the Bible in one of our class-rooms the other day. A member of the class made an emphatic statement of her belief in evangelical doctrine, and when the class expressed its appreciation, several young men, whose anti-Christian views are well known, joined vigorously in the applause. Is not that prima facie evidence that they do not believe what they advocate? Or does it prove that they are like straws that are carried in any direction that the wind blows—that they want to be on the popular side? I pity men who court a cheap notoriety in that way. Those of us who are sincerely attached to the Bible would not applaud a statement that was averse to it. No; even if we are, in the opinion of certain quasi wise-acres, narrow-minded and bigoted, we can at least lay claim to the merit of being sincere. We do not howl with every pack of wolves, or give our acclamations to sentiments that we reprobate."

Of course, while this harangue was being delivered, there were many furtive side-glances cast at Hadley and George, and at the close a loud guffaw, accompanied by the clapping of a few hands, burst from the lips of the young men of the society. They cared very little for the real points at issue, but it was regarded as a good joke that the two honor men of the class should receive such an unmerciful scoring.

The charge of dishonesty did not set well with Hadley. It stirred his irascibility into a blaze, and it was fortunate for the divinity student that the rules of the Society did not permit an immediate reply. Duneman's speech proved to his opponents that he was not too scrupulous, with all his vaunted piety, to retain a grudge, and wait for an opportunity to resent an insult. Hadley knew that the speech had a personal reference to himself, and was meant in repayment for the humbling that Duneman had received some time before.

After the exercises were over the fencing began. Walking up to the divinity student, Hadley said: "You charged me the other day with boorishness; do you not think that you have acted the part of a boor yourself this evening?"

"I do not know what you mean," Duneman replied.

"Well," said Madelling," you are more obtuse than I thought. I will tell you what I mean. I know that in your remarks, this evening, you were making a personal allusion to my friend and me. Every one knew to whom you were referring." Hadley looked inquiringly around the circle that had gathered about them, and received several confirmatory nods.

"Yes, and what then?" said Duneman; "what I said was true."

"That may or may not be; I am not going into that. The point I make is, that in dragging these personal matters into a public speech, and at a time when no reply was possible, you did a very ungentlemanly thing. In fact, it was a mean and cowardly thing, and you ought to be ashamed of it."

"I am not ashamed, and there is no cause for shame," said Duneman, hotly. "You are doing a great injury to the students of the college by your infidel notions, and I was perfectly just in opposing your influence, and showing you, in common with other infidels, are in cere. Your opposition to the Bible is m put on to impress the college with your cou and independence. It is only skin-deep."

"Like your religion!" retorted Madel his temper rising. "If your religion gove your tongue and life, you would not be so cious and vindictive. I know enough of Bible to see that you do not obey its teachi You lack spirituality as much as you do manners, and I am afraid you have too n temper to make a useful clergyman."

The charge went home. Duneman's science told him that he had erred, that he not so acted as to commend the religion he fessed to his friends or his enemies, and h proached himself even more bitterly than his accuser. Wounded self-esteem, howe would not let him confess his fault. " brought it on yourself," he muttered, sullen

"Well," said Hadley, "you have certa taught us how a Christian acts in these da he thinks himself injured." And he tu on his heel and left the room. "I suppose, said to Dane, when they were alone, I s have to accept the situation. Duneman a are enemies. I expect he will do me all the jury he can. But he will find that I can him blow for blow."

Dane laughed. "You will not be gover by the Scripture which you quoted to him

"Not much! Nobody practices those max nowadays, not even the Christians themsel so far as I can see. They are as touchy vindictive as other people, and I don't see I should be molded by a book which I re diate."

"Hadley, it seems to me that you are bec ing terribly acrimonious," said Dane, with s concern. "You must not let your scepticism s your temper, or you will prove its unethical ture at once. The question is not whether a tain code of morals is taught in the Bible, whether it is in harmony with the laws of ri If it is wrong to hold a grudge or take reven it is wrong, Bible or no Bible. The moral is above all—"

"The moral law"! echoed Hadley, reflecti ly. Then turning upon his companion wit look of concern, he said: "George, do you kn that I cannot see where we are to draw the l of demarkation between the moral and the th logical! Since I have been reading the writi of these agnostic authors, ethical distinct are fading more and more from my mind. W should we call one thing right per se, a another wrong? If there is no God, with power of volition, where is there any basis moral relations? Everything is the result evolution, and cannot be changed by the wil man, if he has a will. There can be no mora where there is no freedom, for the power choose is the very root of the ethical. If th is no God, but the world is the outcome of blind laws of development, where is the se of calling one thing right and another wrong

"But we agnostics do not say that there is God; we simply say that we do not know a cannot know."

"Well, that is simply plunging farther i the labyrinth. It is to say that we do not kn and cannot know whether there is any basis our moral distinctions."

"That is dangerous doctrine to sow bro cast."

"If it is the truth, it ought to be disseminate

But George was flurried. He did not like t logical conclusions of his philosophy of the known and unknowable. If all moral disti tions were obliterated, the result would be a pletion of all the moral energies of man. looked fallacious. Perhaps there was some fl in the reasoning. He would, some time, over the ground again. But his lids were g ting heavy, and he abandoned the attempt solve the abstruse problem for that evening.

Of Thine Own

e we given Thee." (1 Chron. 29: 13, 14.) ne will ask, "What proportion of our income uld we give to the Lord?" It is impossible make a rule. The rule under the law was -tenth, and this may be a good beginning unconverted people and legal Christians; as the heart gets filled with Jesus it is wonful how earthly possessions become an enbrance, and the privilege of giving all to us is more and more seen. Some may say, That would you do if you were a laboring n, earning only about $5 a week, with a family ix children?" I think I would ask the Lord show me what to do under such circumstances. Perhaps such a man could not honestly give more than five or ten cents a week, unless he did some extra work at home in the evening, and earned thereby a little store for the Lord; and yet his whole life might be a gift, his children trained for God, and his house a witness for Him.

"Do you think we ought to give to the Lord's work while we are in debt?" How can you? You would be robbing of one to give to another. If you owe the shoemaker for a pair of boots, and then you give money to the work of God, you are getting credit for loving God's work with the shoemaker's money; it is just the same as though you stole the boots from him, and put them into the collection.

"Provide Things Honest

in the sight of all men." (Rom. 12: 17.) Perhaps the shoemaker may love God's work as much as you do, but, while you give his money to the collection in your own name, he is prevented from giving anything, although the money is rightly his! God put an end to this unrighteousness! "How much can I afford?" is the world's question, "How much will God accept from such as I?" is the question of His humble, loving child.

When Moses came down from the mountain, his face shone with the reflected light of God, and he was obliged to put a veil on his face. He had been communing with God, and his first message to the people was to enforce the observance of the Sabbath day, and then there immediately follows: "This is the thing which the Lord commanded, saying, 'Take ye from among you an offering unto the Lord: whosoever is of a willing heart, let him bring it, an offering of the Lord." There was no compulsion, no constraint, no urging; to give unto the Lord was a wondrous privilege. We have seen in various missions a most unseemly urging upon the people to give, showing that the faith of the worker was in the people, and not in the Lord. "And they came every one whose heart stirred him up"; not one unwilling, grudging grumbler, saying, "I cannot afford it." There were no collectors, the people brought their offerings themselves, "every one whom His spirit made willing, and they brought the Lord's offering to the work of the tabernacle of the congregation, and for all His service, and for the holy garments." They all brought what they had, "bracelets and earrings and rings and tablets, all jewels of gold," showing plainly that they thought God's service of more value than the ornamenting of their persons; these were Willing Hearted.

Sometimes it costs a young Christian girl something to put a handsome bracelet aside to be sold for the Lord's work. But oh how much more lovely, in God's sight, the hand which gives for the conversion of the heathen, or the work of God in our own land, than the hand which looks like a stand in a jeweller's shop, encumbered with useless rings and bracelets! How much more to God's glory is the ear which hearkens to his voice, than the ear which is dragged out of shape by useless and unnatural earrings. "Every one offered unto the Lord an offering of gold. They gave their best to Him. This is the true principle of giving—God the first, God the best. Then every one who possessed blue, purple, scarlet, fine linen and goat's hair, red skins of rams and badger skins, brought them; not because they had no use for them: perhaps not one of these offerings was lying by useless. Probably the skins formed their covering for the night, and the fine linen was ready to make into clothing when their present clothing was worn out, but God provided that they should not be at a loss, and Moses could bear testimony at the end of their wilderness wanderings: "Thy raiment waxed not old upon thee, neither did thy foot swell, these forty years." (Deut. 8: 4.) Silver, brass, and shittim wood were among the offerings; the tals were brought, doubtless, from Egypt, the od perhaps felled in the more fertile parts of wilderness.

Many of the women could give more that was valuable by their work than any other way. "All the women that were wisehearted did spin with their hands, and brought that which they had spun, both of blue, and of purple, and of scarlet, and of fine linen. And all the women whose hearts stirred them up in wisdom spun goat's hair." But what kind of wisdom was this? It was a kind of wisdom which is very rare, but very precious; the wisdom to do the will of God in common things; yet all had its bearing on the direct service of God. There must have been large spinning meetings and sewing meetings there under the tents of the wilderness; and if any passer-by had wanted to know why there was all this industry in the wilderness, the answer would have been, "It is for the Lord." All was freewill work, as well as freewill offering. God provided their food, they were fed with bread from heaven; God kept their clothing from wearing out; all their labor was for Him, and all was voluntary.

The rulers brought the most costly gifts. This is not always the case in our day. They "brought onyx stones, and stones to be set, for the ephod and for the breastplate; and spice, and oil for the light, and for the anointing oil, and for the sweet incense." We can imagine the gladness of heart with which the people, who had been saved through all the plagues of Egypt, brought through the sea, and miraculously maintained, testified their gratitude in the giving of willing offerings, and in their work for the tabernacle. "The children of Israel brought a willing offering unto the Lord, every man and woman whose heart made them willing to bring for all manner of work, which the Lord had commanded to be made by the hand of Moses."

Just as God had called Moses and fitted him to be the leader of the people, so He called Bezaleel to be master of the works in the wilderness. Moses said, "See, the Lord hath called by name Bezaleel, the son of Uri, the son of Hur, of the tribe of Judah; and He hath filled him with the spirit of God, in wisdom and in understanding, and in knowledge, and in all manner of workmanship; and to devise curious works, to work in gold, and in silver, and in brass, and in the cutting of stones, to set them, and in carving of wood, to make any manner of cunning work. And He hath put in his heart that he may teach, both he and Aholiab." What wisdom of God is here! He not only provided for the worship of the tabernacle, and so gave the people an object for work in their wilderness life, but taught them, through these two men, all kinds of trades which should fit them for their possession of the Promised Land; and He imparted dignity to the labor by making it voluntary, so that every day's service was a willing gift to the Lord. If we are altogether His, and live for Him alone, He will make all we give to Him a precious investment which will bring us rich returns.

COMPLETE IN JESUS.

"Complete in Him."—COL. II, 10.

Complete in Jesus! O how full
Of heavenly peace the thought,
Our souls redeemed—our pardon sealed!
Since Jesus' blood hath bought.

Complete in Jesus! have our souls
In bitter anguish cried?
'Tis Jesus hears and gives relief,
'Twas for our souls He died.

Complete in Jesus—blissful thought!
'Tis ours, whate'er befall;
Our Jesus is our Saviour, Friend,
Our Life, our Hope—our All.

O let us place our hand in His,
As on through life we go;
Like little children, trusting all
To Him, come weal or woe.

Thus shall our trembling hearts be filled
With love which grows not dim,
If "Jesus only" be our peace
And this—"Complete in Him."

TWIN BABIES.

This is the heading of a large advertisement appearing in this issue of CHRISTIAN HERALD. Those who read it will no doubt be anxious to know whether it is true that all of the articles named in the list of presents are sent in each box of the "Sweet Home" Soap. Yes, it is true, and the firm who make the offer are reliable and well established. "Sweet Home" Soap is of an extraordinary fine quality, and no one is disappointed who uses it. It bears no comparison with the cheap soaps with which our markets are flooded. The method of selling the soap is a novel one, and readily commends itself to every one, since those who buy it get all the profits usually paid out to traveling salesmen, wholesale and retail grocers, etc. Besides, no payment is asked until the goods are received and have been on trial in the house for thirty days. The soap is delivered right at the door, all freight charges prepaid, and arrangements made so that if one is not satisfied after seeing the presents and using the soap, the box will be taken away without expense or outlay of any kind. A postal-card sent to J. D. Larkin & Co., Buffalo, N. Y., will bring a box on trial. A short time ago a gentleman connected with this paper sent a postal-card requesting a trial case, in answer to which a box of "Sweet Home Soap, containing all of the articles promised, was promptly delivered at his office door, all freight and delivery charges prepaid, thus verifying the promises made in the advertisement. The soap was of excellent quality, and the presents were as described. All you have to do is to send your name and address on a postal-card, ordering a trial box. Address J. D. Larkin & Co., Buffalo, N. Y. They are worthy of your confidence, and when you get the goods you will not be disappointed.

ROMEO AND JULIET.

TWIN BABIES.

To you and your wife, twin babies are always interesting. Romeo and Juliet are especially interesting to us because they have always been washed with Ocean Bath Toilet Soap (this is one of the many kinds of fine Toilet Soap that are given gratis with the great box of "Sweet Home" Family Soap), we call them Romeo and Juliet because that is not their names, for when their Mamma consented for us to use their pictures she made us promise not to divulge their real names. But they are the funniest, tootsey-wootseyest, catchee, catchee, little dimpled darlings you ever saw. Their Mamma (we will show you her picture too some day) says they require so much looking after that if it were not for the help of "Boraxine" (which is given gratis with every great box of "Sweet Home" Soap) she could never keep her house in order. If you will mail us your name and address on a postal card we will send you one of the great boxes of "Sweet Home" Soap containing all the articles named in list, freight prepaid.

SIR JOHN H. KENNAWAY, BART.

Six of the Principal Speakers at the Recent International Missionary Conference.

THE INTERNATIONAL MISSIONARY CONFERENCE.

Six of the Leaders.

THE lively interest taken throughout Christendom in the great International Missionary Conference which has just concluded its sittings in London, has nowhere been more marked than in the United States. The delegates from this country were representative and able men, and their reception and the attention with which their speeches were listened to were eminently gratifying to our people. There is good reason to believe that a new impetus was given by the Conference to missionary enthusiasm, and we may hope that in the future there will through its influence be more union and fraternal feeling in the work among the various societies which are laboring to extend the knowledge of Christ throughout heathendom. The portraits on the preceding page are of six of the men who took a prominent part in the Conference, and who are fairly representative of its various component elements.

REV. H. GRATTAN GUINNESS.

THE founder of the East London Missionary Institute is well known in this country by his personal visits and by his works. He came first into prominent notice by an evangelistic tour he made in 1859 through Great Britain, Ireland, Canada, and the United States. Subsequently, he settled in Bath, England. Being impressed with the inadequacy in number and acquirements of the missionaries for the wide field of heathendom, he advised and was aided to establish a missionary training institute at Harley House, in London. The Institute was opened in March, 1873. It trains men of all evangelical denominations, of all nationalities, and of all classes; and it trains them for all societies, all lands and all spheres of Christian effort. It is as comprehensive as it is possible to be, within the limits of evangelical truth. The students have been of various nationalities; not only English, Scotch, Irish, and American, but French, German, Italian, Spanish, Swedish, Danish, Russian, Bulgarian, Syrian, Egyptian, Kaffir, Negro, Hindoo, Parsee, Koordish, and Jewish, and they have been of various denominations. Those of them who have gone forth as missionaries are now connected with about twenty different societies and associations.

The first Christian mission on the Congo was originated by Mr. and Mrs. Guinness, and was, until recently associated with their work, but has been transferred to the American Baptist Missionary Union.

Mr. and Mrs. Guinness's valuable works on Prophecy, "The Approaching End of the Ages," and "Light for the Last Days," are well known.

THE REV. A. T. PIERSON, D. D.

THE Rev. Dr. Pierson, who was one of the American delegates to the Conference, is the author of a very valuable article entitled "The Apparent Waste of Missions." He was one of the speakers on June 11, on "The Condition and Increase of the Heathen, and their Claims upon the Christian Church." He is pastor of Bethany Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, and was born in New York City in the year 1837, so that he is now fifty-one year old. At the age of fifteen he was converted to Christ, and became a member of the Presbyterian Church. Having passed through college, and received the usual theological training, he was licensed to preach by the New York Presbytery, and shortly afterwards, at the age of twenty-three, he accepted the charge of the Congregational Church at Binghampton, N. Y. Three years later he returned to the Presbyterian communion, and successively filled pastorates at Waterford, N. Y., Detroit, Mich., Indianapolis, Ind., and Philadelphia, his present charge.

Dr. Pierson's Work in Philadelphia is chiefly amongst the working classes. The church and Sunday-school hall, each capable of accommodating more than 2,000 persons, cost about $250 000. The fame of Bethany Sunday-school for size and excellence of arrangement has gone over the United States. In the Sunday-school hall a lay college is maintained from September to May, and some effort for the improvement of the people is going on almost every evening. There is an assistant pastor and a large body of earnest unpaid workers. The church is practically under the free and open system, and is generally crowded. And in addition to these agencies evangelistic services are carried on the greater part of the year in a mission tent, and conversions are constantly reported.

Dr. Pierson is an expository preacher, and in this, to a large extent, is the secret of his pulpit power and usefulness. Among the men deeply instructed in the Word of God who gather around Mr. Moody, in his conferences at Northfield, none exceed Dr. Pierson in close acquaintance with the Scriptures, or in clearness and fullness of expository teaching. His studies are confined, almost wholly to the Bible in the original tongues, and if ever a preacher might be described as that preacher is Dr. Pierson. His mind seems saturated with the Word of God, both in the letter and spirit. And busy as he is as a speaker, his pen is nearly as busy. It is said that he is a regular contributor to some thirty religious magazines and papers. In 1886 he published two books—one entitled "Many Infallible Proofs; a Series of Practical Chapters on the Evidences of Christianity, or the Written and Living Word of God"; and the other, "The Crisis of Missions." On the subject of missions Dr. Pierson is intensely in earnest. He is also a firm believer in the Speedy Second Advent of Christ, and at the International Prophetic Conference at Chicago, in November, 1886, gave an able and impressive address on the "Imminent Second Advent of Christ a Motive to Evangelism."

RFV. MARMADUKE C. OSBORN.

MR. OSBORN is one of the foremost men of the Wesleyan Methodist Connexion—popular as preacher and lecturer, uniformly esteemed as a Christian pastor, and possessing, moreover, a share of administrative power which, especially in his own missionary work, has been of signal service to the denomination. He has long been one of the chief officials of the Wesleyan Missionary Society—a society whose fame is world-wide. He was born in 1827, and is therefore sixty-one years old. It was his privilege to be born of godly parents and to be brought up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. At a very early age he accepted Jesus as his Saviour and Master. In his boyhood he had a notion that he should preach the gospel of Christ, and he could never shake off the impression.

He was educated for the ministry at Richmond College, under the Revs. Thomas Jackson and John Farrar, of whom he always speaks with enthusiastic gratitude. Leaving the theological institution, he was appointed in 1850 to Cambridge, and subsequently to Bradford, York, Liverpool (Pitt Street), Liverpool (Brunswick Street), Bristol, London (City Road), in each circuit remaining the full three years—a striking testimony to uniform good feeling between pastor and people. On the platform and in the pulpit he speedily made his mark. His ministrations were largely in request throughout the whole Wesleyan Connexion, and the high estimation entertained concerning him was displayed in his appointment to visit and report on the Wesleyan Missions in the West Indies.

Not only is he an eloquent minister and a popular speaker, but also an able administrator, as he has proved by the valuable services he has rendered to the Missionary Society in his official capacity. Missionary service requires quenchless zeal as well as tact, skill, and general knowledge of human nature. The highest order of man is required for a missionary, and this fact has been all along strongly impressed on the church by Mr. Osborn.

Missionary enterprise may be said to have been the work of Mr. Osborn's life-time. To this he has devoted all his energies, all his abilities, all his heart and soul, and he has lived to see some of the fruits of his labors. He has taken an active part in the International Missionary Conference.

REV. A. J. GORDON, D. D.

ADONIRAM JUDSON GORDON, the pastor of the Clarendon Street Baptist Church, Boston, Massachusetts, is well known to our readers. He was one of the most honored members of the American delegation. He was born at New Hampton, on April 19, 1836, and is therefore now fifty-two years of age. His father was a deacon eminent for his piety, who for many years had been an enthusiastic supporter of foreign missionary work, and an ardent admirer of the devoted men who leave home and country to preach the Gospel of Christ to those who sit in heathen darkness. One heroic man especially had won his respect, the pioneer American missionary, Adoniram Judson, "the apostle of Burmah." To him he tendered a tribute of homage by naming his infant child after him, and there is reason to believe that the pious father offered many prayers that he might prove worthy of the name given to him. It is certain that in his religious life and work, and notably in his interest in foreign missionary work, Dr. A. J. Gordon has been and is a living testimony of the power and influence of early training, and of the results of parental prayers.

He was Converted to Christ at the age of sixteen, and united with the church at New Hampton. Almost immediately afterwards he was strongly influenced to become a preacher of the gospel. He entered a preparatory school with the distinct object of fitting himself for a theological training in college. Thence he went to Brown University, where he entered with zest, even while a student, into active Christian work, teaching in the Sabbath-school and helping in missions in the neighborhood around.

In 1860, at the age of twenty-four, Mr. Gordon graduated. He then proceeded to Newton Theological Seminary, for a more special course of training for ministerial and pastoral work. Before the completion of his studies there, he had already entered upon his life's labor, by accepting, at the earnest solicitation of the people of Jamaica Plain, Mass., the office of pastor of the Baptist church in that place. His ordination took place in June, 1863, and until the year 1869 Dr. Gordon continued there. He then received a call from Boston, to become the minister of the Clarendon Street Baptist Church in that city. He accepted the call, and went to his new sphere with the expectation of doing vigorous and energetic work. He was not disappointed in that expectation, nor in the anticipated results. A new edifice was erected, which was soon filled with worshippers. Dr. Gordon is an

and a firm believer in the Premillennial Advent of Christ. He took a prominent part in the Prophetic Conference at New York in 1878, and in that at Chicago in 1886. As an author he has become favorably known to English-speaking Christians the world over. Among his best known works are "In Christ," "Grace and Glory," "Congregational Worship," "The Ministry of Healing" and "Two-fold Life."

ALFRED HENRY BAYNES, ESQ.

The name of Alfred Henry Baynes is a familiar name among British Baptists, who know him in many honorable connections, but chiefly as Secretary of their Missionary Society. His father was the Rev. Joseph Baynes, who was the pastor of the Baptist Church at Wellington, Somersetshire, for the long period of upwards of forty years. Alfred Henry was born at Wellington in 1838, so that he is just now fifty years of age. He was educated at Devonshire College, Bath. At first it was intended that he should enter the medical profession, but that project was abandoned on account of ill-health. Subsequently he became associated with several of the public undertakings of Messrs. Peto. Brassey, and Betts, the well-known railway and building contractors. In 1860, at the request of Sir Morton Peto, he undertook temporarily the finances of the Baptist Missionary Society. What was intended to be but a very temporary engagement has continued now twenty-eight years and promises to continue for years to come.

In 1881, at the request of the society, Mr. Baynes visited India and Ceylon, and inspected all the Baptist Mission Stations in that quarter of the globe. In connection with the missionary society Mr. Baynes has made several pleasant trips to Italy, which perhaps may be regarded as the most important part of the European field occupied by the society. He has also visited Belgium, and conducted negotiations in connection with the Baptist Congo mission with the King of the Belgians. In December, 1884, Mr. Baynes visited Berlin in connection with the sittings of the West African and Congo Conference, which met in that city. He was also charged to conduct negotiations relating to the annexation by Germany of the Cameroons and Bimbia on the West Coast of Africa, and the interests and property of the Mission at various stations in these districts. These negotiations were conducted with the German Chancellor and the authorities of the German Foreign Office, and were brought to as satisfactory a conclusion as was possible under the circumstances. He was one of the Executive Committee of the International Missionary Conference.

SIR JOHN H. KENNAWAY, BART., M. P.

For seventy years the name of Kennaway has been prominent in the Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church of England. His grandfather Sir John Kennaway was the first president of the Devon and Exeter auxiliary, which was founded in 1816; the next baronet, also Sir John, held the same office for many years; and the Sir John of to-day succeeded to it in the year 1872.

Sir John was born at Escot, Ottery St. Mary, Devonshire, in 1837, and is a little over fifty years of age. He was educated at Harrow, proceeding thence in due course to Balliol College, Oxford, where he took first-class honors in Law and History. He was called to the Bar at the Inner Temple in 1864. He has represented the Eastern Division of the county of Devon in Parliament since April 1870. From a very early period he evidenced deep sympathy with missionary and philanthropic enterprises.

He presided at a largely attended meeting in connection with the international Conference, on June 11, when the subject for consideration was the promotion of missionary effort in China. He said that though Britain had for a long time stood alone in that field of labor, America was now her rival there. He pointed out how minor differences of creed or form disappear in the face of missionary work, just as a disagreement between two naval officers who served under Nelson was speedily reconciled by Nelson's command in the presence of the enemy. He expressed pleasure at seeing American friends present, as well as some from France and Germany. He claimed that missions had been successful, and their indirect benefits great. Sir John described the considerable progress of the work of late, not only in China, with which land that meeting was concerned, but bade his hearers not forget the earlier labors of Morrison and others. The eleven months of seed-sowing in China were well advanced, and who could say how much the Lord of the harvest would give them in the remaining months of harvest?

An Invaluable Work on Prophecy by G. H. Pember, M. A., entitled "The Great Prophecies concerning the Jews the Gentiles, and the Church of God," is for sale at this office, 63 Bible House, New York. It is written in a most popular and eloquent style, and describes the impending fulfilment of Revelatio nand Daniel, and is illustrated by a colored chart. 458 pages. Price, including postage, $1.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Red Eyes and Green Spectacles. Mr. McCaul, of Canada, said: "In England, some time ago, a Quaker friend of mine was travelling through the country. He stopped at a roadside inn, and while he sat there, a gentleman, a rural landowner in the district, came in and ordered a glass of liquor. When the gentleman turned round towards him my friend noticed that he had very red eyes and wore large green spectacles. Whether or not there was something special in the Quaker's gaze I do not know, but the gentleman seemed very uneasy about it, and remarked, as he made his way to a seat, 'I have very bad eyes and have required to wear glasses for a long time, though they do not seem to do me much good!' 'My friend,' replied the Quaker, 'I will tell thee what I think. If thou wearest spectacles on thy mouth, thine eyes will soon improve.' Strong drink does not get credit for half the evil it does. If it takes away the sight, we blame study; if it ruins business, we blame the bad times; if it ruin a man's Christian life, we blame the bad example of professing Christians. But it is drink, the fiery fiend, that every year destroys its thousands of victims."

Happy Consequences of a Shower.—W. F. Green, said: "I remember, some twenty years ago, a lady was going home from a love-feast on Sunday afternoon, and was driven by a passing shower to take refuge in a court. A working man saw her and invited her into his house. She went in; her heart was full of the love of God, and she began to speak to this man about the Saviour. She found his wife was ill, 'May I see her?' she asked. 'Certainly,' he replied, and she went up-stairs, prayed with the woman, came down again, continued her conversation with the man, and obtained from him a promise to come to the house of God. 'Well,' she said, 'I will call for you.' 'Never mind that,' he said, 'I will be there.' She, however, did call for him, and looked after him for about a week; the result was that he eventually found peace, and became one of the most successful sick-visitors and one of the happiest Christians I ever met with in my life. It was quite a pleasure to meet him, for his face used to shine like an angel's. There is a bit of work done—done casually, just by the wayside."

Devils Adjured to Enter Eggs.—Rev. Silvester Whitehead related at the annual meeting of a missionary society that "In Canton, a father brought his son to the Taouist priest, saying that he was possessed of the devil. They consulted the idol, and then they announced that in the body of the child there were no fewer than five devils, intimating that for a consideration in silver they could expel them all. They placed the boy in front of the deity, and they placed on the ground at his feet five eggs, into which they adjured the devils to enter. Having done this a vase was placed over the eggs, while the high priest sounded a loud blast upon a horn. It was then lifted, and it was found that the eggs were no longer on the ground, but by act of legerdemain had been transferred to the vase. This, of course, was regarded as an undoubted proof that the devils had entered into the eggs. They then drew blood from an incision in the boy's arm, and dipping the seal of the temple into the blood, stamped the name of the deity upon his forehead, wrists, neck, and back. He had been suffering all the while from nothing but fever and ague. It is in this way that the people are deluded, impoverished, and priest-ridden."

A Victim of Drinking and Gambling Rescued. Richard Weaver said: "I had been preaching in a certain town for some days, when, one morning, two little barefooted boys came to the house at which I was staying. They were brought into the room in which I was sitting, and coming up to me the elder said, 'Sir, we were at your meeting last night, and we heard you say that God loved every one; now, we have an awful wicked father; do you think God would save him?' At the boys' request a friend and I accompanied them to their miserable home. We were guided by the boys, who kept saying to each other, 'If God saves father won't we be happy!" We reached their home, where we found their broken-hearted mother. As I looked at her I recognized a former acquaintance. I had known her when she was young and happy in her father's house. By-and-by her husband came in, a poor, drunken-looking fellow. 'What!' I exclaimed, for I recognized him also. 'My old master's son! Is it possible he can have come to this?' 'You see,' said the man, 'to what drinking and gambling have brought me.' Here one of the little fellows whispered to me, 'Pray for father.' I knelt at once and the dear lad prayed, 'Oh God, you love my father, save him for Jesus' sake.' The father dropped upon his knees beside us, and cried, 'Oh God, be merciful to me a sinner.' And soon he found peaee in Christ. He turned to his wife, and said, 'Oh, Mary, can you ever forgive me?' She was only too willing to do so, and I left them happy with each other in Christ."

The Drunkard and His Dead Wife. "When I was eight years of age, I heard a story from the late Mr. John B. Gough, which greatly affected me, and caused me, even at that early age, to pledge myself as a total abstainer. The great orator told in glowing terms the scenes that had been enacted in his own home, and how at last his base conduct and brutality had brought his wife to her death-bed. Even then her thoughts were of her husband, and she got him to promise that never again would he touch intoxicating liquor. Her words were, 'Now John, you will never touch strong drink again, never until I give it to you with my own hands.' He promised. She thought she had completely won his heart, and died contentedly. Her illness had sobered him, but when she was gone, the craving came back to him with redoubled force. Vainly he fought against it, he must have liquor. But how could he have it, and still keep his promise to his dead wife. He left the house, and quickly returned with a bottle of rum, He poured some into a glass, and carrying it over to where the dead body of his wife lay, he knelt, and lifting the thin, lifeless hand, he forced the cold fingers round the glass. and lifted both her hand and it to his mouth and drank the contents of the glass; nor was he content with one glass, but he drank until he fell helplessly intoxicated beside the corpse of his wife. That is what a man will do for drink. Oh, you moderate drinkers, who see no evil in a glass, tamper not with it, for it is full of subtlety and venom!"

How the Leak Was Stopped. "Some Few years ago, a sailing vessel was caught in a great storm; for some time it successfully combated the elements, but the strain upon all parts was excessive; and every moment the crew feared that the vessel would spring a leak. At last their fear was realized. The vessle was leaking. A search was made, and the leak was discovered; it was just at the water-line, but there was no way to get at it except over the side. Would any one venture? Would any face almost certain death in the chance of saving his comrades? No one could be ordered to such a duty. Volunteers were called for. Two or three men stepped forward, but one of them said, 'No, mates, let me go; I am a Christian, and better prepared to die than any of you. Let me go.' The other men looked at him in surprise, but silently acquiesced. He was lowered over the side, on a thin scaffolding. The waves broke over him, and every instant threatened to carry him into the raging waters, but He who stilled the tempest was with him, and, strong in His strength, the sailor was enabled to nail a board over the leak, and the ship was saved. The heroic sailor was drawn safely up, and soon afterwards gave himself entirely to the work of his Master, and to-day is an active missionary among the sailors. Nor was his testimony in the hour of peril without effect upon his mates. They saw that Christianity, instead of lessening, increased and ennobled manhood, and the event was blessed to the souls of some of them."

IN GOOD HUMOR WITH OUR LOT.

IF I should ask some one, "Where is Brooklyn, to-day?" he would say, "At Brighton Beach, or East Hampton, or Shelter Island." "Where is New York, to-day?" "At Long Branch." "Where Philadelphia?" "Cape May." "Where is Boston?" "At Martha's Vineyard." "Where is Virginia?" "At the Sulphur Springs." "Where the great multitude from all parts of the land?" "At Saratoga," the modern Bethesda, where the angel of health is ever stirring the waters. But, my friends, the largest multitude are at home, detained by business or circumstances. Among them all newspaper men, the hardest worked and the least compensated; city railroad employees, and ferry masters, and the police, and the tens of thousands of clerks and merchants waiting for their turn of absence, and households with an invalid who cannot be moved, and others hindered by and the great multitude of well-to-do people who stay at home because they like home better than any other place, refusing to go away simply because it is the fashion to go. When the express wagon, with its mountain of trunks, directed to the Catskills or Niagara, goes through the streets, we stand at our window envious and impatient, and wonder why we cannot go as well as others. Fools that we are, as though one could not be as happy at home as anywhere else! Our grandfathers and grandmothers had as good a time as we have, long before the first spring was bored at Saratoga, or the first deer shot in the Adirondacks. They made their wedding-tour to the next farmhouse, or, living in New York, they celebrated the event by an extra walk on the Battery.

Now, the genuine American is not happy until he is going somewhere, and the passion is so great that there are Christian people, with their families, detained in the city, who come not to the house of God, trying to give people the idea that they are out of town, leaving the door-plate unscoured for the same reason, and for two months keeping the front shutters closed while they sit in the back part of the house, the thermometer at ninety! My friends, if it is best for us to go, let us go and be happy. If it is best for us to stay at home, let us stay at home and be happy. There is a great deal of in Paul's advice to the Hebrews: "Be content with such things as ye have." To be content is to be in good humor with our circumstances, not picking a quarrel with our obscurity, or our poverty, or our social position. There are four or five grand reasons why we should be content with such things as we have.

The first reason that I mention as leading to this spirit, advised in the text, is the consideration that the poorest of us have all that is indispensable in life. We make great ado about our hardships, but how little we talk of our blessings. Health of body, which is given in largest quantity to those who have never been petted and fondled, and spoiled by fortune, we take as a matter of course. Rather have this luxury, and have it alone, than, without it, look out of a palace window upon parks of deer stalking between fountains and statuary. These people sleep sounder on a straw mattress than fashionable invalids on a couch of ivory and eagles' down. The dinner of herbs tastes better to the appetite sharpened on a woodman's axe or a reaper's scythe, than wealthy indigestion experiences seated at a table covered with partridge and venison and pineapple. The grandest luxury God ever gave a man is health. He who trades that off for all the palaces of the earth is infinitely cheated. We look back at the glory of the last Napoleon, but who would have taken his Versailles, and his Tuilleries, if with them we had to take his gout?

"Oh," says some one, "it isn't the grosser pleasures I covet, but it is the gratification of an artistic and intellectual taste." Why, from which these pictures are copied. What is a sunset on a wall compared with a sunset hung in loops of fire on the heavens? What is a cascade, silent on a canvas, compared to a cascade that makes the mountain tremble, its spray ascending like the departed spirit of the water slain on the rocks? Oh, there is a great deal of hollow affectation about a fondness for pictures on the part of those who never appreciate the original from which the pictures are taken. As though a parent should have no regard for his child, but go into ecstasies over its photograph. Bless the Lord to-day, O man! O woman! that though you may be shut out from the works of a Church, a Bierstadt, a Rubens, and a Raphael, you still have free access to a gallery grander than the Louvre, or the Luxemburg, or the Vatican—the royal gallery of the noonday heavens, the King's gallery of the midnight sky.

You Have the Original

Another consideration leading us to a spirit of contentment, is the fact that our happiness is not dependent upon outward circumstances. You see people happy and miserable amid all circumstances. In a family where the last loaf is on the table, and the last stick of wood on the fire, you sometimes find a cheerful confidence in God; while in a very fine place, you will see and hear discord sounding her war-whoop, and hospitality freezing to death in a cheerless parlor. I stopped one day on Broadway, at the head of Wall Street, at the foot of Trinity Church, to see who seemed the happiest people passing. I judged, from their looks, were not those who went down into Wall Street, for they had on their brow the anxiety of the dollar they expected to make; nor the people who came out of Wall Street, for they had on their brow the anxiety of the dollar they had lost; nor the people who swept by in splendid equipage, for they met a carriage that was finer than theirs. The happiest person in all that crowd, judging from the countenance, was the woman who sat at the apple-stand, knitting. I believe real happiness oftener looks out of the window of an humble home, than through the opera-glass of the gilded box of a theatre.

The Happiest People

I find Nero growling on a throne. I find Paul singing in a dungeon. I find King Ahab going to bed at noon, through melancholy, while near by is Naboth contented in the possession of a vineyard. Haman, prime minister of Persia, frets himself almost to death because a poor Jew will not tip his hat; and Ahithophel, one of the greatest lawyers of Bible times, through fear of dying, hangs himself. The wealthiest man, forty years ago, in New York, when congratulated over his large estate, replied, "Ah, you don't know how much trouble I have in taking care of it!" Byron declared, in his last hours, that he had never seen more than twelve happy days in all his life. I do not believe that he had seen twelve minutes of thorough satisfaction. Napoleon I. said, "I turn with disgust from the cowardice and selfishness of man. I hold life a horror: death is repose. What I have suffered the last twenty days is beyond human comprehension." While, on the other hand, to show amid the most disadvantageous circumstances, just after the Ocean Monarch had been wrecked in the English Channel, a steamer was cruising along in the darkness, when the captain heard a song, a sweet song, coming over the water, and he bore down toward that voice, and found it was a Christian woman on a plank of the wrecked steamer, singing to the tune of St. Martins:

"Jesus, lover of my soul,
Let me to Thy bosom fly,
While the billows near me roll,
While the tempest still is high."

The heart right toward God and man, we are happy. The heart wrong toward God and man, we are unhappy.

Another reason why we should come to this spirit inculcated in the text, is the fact that all the differences of earthly condition are transitory. The houses you build, the land you culture, the places in which you barter, are soon to go into other hands. However hard you may have it now, if you are a Christian

The Scene will Soon End.

Pain, trial, persecution, never knock at the door of the grave. A coffin made out of pine boards is just as good a resting-place as one made out of silver-mounted mahogany or rosewood. Go down among the resting-places of the dead, and you will find that though people there had a great difference of worldly circumstances, now they are all alike unconscious. The hand that greeted the senator, and the president, and the king, is still as the hand that hardened on the mechanic's hammer, or the manufacturer's wheel. It does not make any difference now, whether there is a plain stone above them, from which the traveller pulls aside the weeds to read the name, or a tall shaft springing into the heavens as though to tell their virtues to the skies.

In That Silent Land

there are no titles for great men, and there are no rumblings of chariot-wheels, and there is never heard the foot of the dance. The Egyptian guano which is thrown on the fields in the East for the enrichment of the soil, is the dust raked out from the sepulchres of kings and lords and mighty men. O the chagrin of those men if they had ever known that in the after ages of the world they would have been called Egyptian guano!

Of how much worth now is the crown of Cæsar? Who bids for it? Who cares now anything about the Amphitryronic Council or the laws of Lycurgus? Who trembles now because Xerxes crossed the Hellespont on a bridge of boats? Who fears because Nebuchadnezzar thunders at the gates of Jerusalem? Who cares now whether or not Cleopatra marries Antony? Who crouches before Ferdinand, or Boniface, or Alaric? Can Cromwell dissolve the English Parliament now? Is William Prince of Orange, king of the Netherlands? No; no! However much Elizabeth may love the Russian crown, she must pass it to Peter, and Peter to Catherine, and Catherine to Paul, and Paul to Alexander, and Alexander to Nicholas. Leopold puts the German sceptre into the hand of Joseph, and Philip comes down off the Spanish throne to let Ferdinand go on. House of Aragon, house of Hapsburg, house of Stuart, house of Bourbon, quarrelling about everything else, but agreeing in this: "The fashion of this world passeth away." But have all these dignitaries gone? Can they not be called back? I have been to assemblages where I have heard the roll called, and many distinguished men have answered. If I should to-day of some of those mighty ones who have gone, I wonder if they would not answer. I will call the roll. I will call the roll of the kings first: Alfred the Great! William the Conqueror! Frederick II.! Louis XVI.! No answer. I will call the roll of the poets: Robert Southey! Thomas Campbell! John Keats! George Crabbe! Robert Burns! No answer. I will call the roll of artists: Michael Angelo! Paul Veronese! William Turner! Christopher Wren! No answer. Eyes closed. Ears deaf. Lips silent. Hands palsied. Sceptre, pencil, pen, sword, put down forever. Why should we struggle for such baubles!

Another reason why we should culture this spirit of cheerfulness is the fact that God knows what is best for His creatures. You know what is best for your child. He thinks you are not as liberal with him as you ought to be. He criticises your discipline, but you look over the whole field, and you, loving that child, do what in your deliberate judgment is best for him. Now, God is the best of fathers. Sometimes His children think that He is hard on them, and that He is not as liberal with them as He might be. But children do not know as much as a father. I can tell you why you are not affluent, and

Why You have not been Successful.

It is because you cannot stand the temptation. If your path had been smooth, you would have depended upon your own surefootedness; but God roughened that path, so you have to take hold of His hand. If the weather had been mild, you would have loitered along the watercourses; but at the first howl of the storm you quickened your pace heavenward, and wrapped around you the robe of a Saviour's righteousness.

"What have I done?" says the wheat-sheaf to the farmer, "what have I done, that you beat me so hard with your flail?" The farmer makes no answer, but the rake takes off the straw, and the mill blows the chaff to the wind, and the golden grain falls down at the foot of the windmill. After awhile, the straw looking down from the mow upon the golden grain banked up on either side the floor understands why the farmer beat the wheat-sheaf with the flail.

Who are those before the throne? The answer came: "These are they who, out of great tribulation, had their robes washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb." Would God that we could understand that our trials are for us. If we had an appreciation of that truth, then we should know why it was that John Noyra, the martyr, in the very midst of the flame, reached down and picked up one of the faggots that was consuming him, and kissed it, and said, "Blessed be God for the time when I was born for this preferment!" They who suffer with Him on earth, shall be glorified with Him in heaven. Be content, then, with such things as you have.

Another consideration leading us to the spirit of the text, is the assurance that the Lord will provide somehow. Will He who holds the water in the hollow of His hand allow His children to die of thirst? Will He who owns the cattle on a thousand hills, and all the earth's luxuriance of grain and fruit, allow His children to starve? Go out to-morrow morning at five o'clock, into the woods, and hear the birds chant. They have had no breakfast, they know not where they will dine, they have no idea where they will sup; but hear the birds chant at five o'clock in the morning. "Behold the fowls of the air: for they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns, yet your heavenly Father feedeth them. Are you not much better than they?"

Seven thousand people, in Christ's time, went into the desert. They were the most ever heard of. They deserved to starve. They might have taken food enough to last them until they got back. Nothing did they take. A lad, who had more wit than all of them put together, asked his mother that morning for some loaves of bread and some fishes. They were put into his satchel. He went out into the desert. From this provision the seven thousand were fed, and the more they ate the larger the loaves grew, until the provision that the boy brought in one satchel was multiplied so he could not have carried the fragments home in six satchels. "Oh," you say, "times have changed, and the day of miracles has gone." I reply that, what God did then by miracle, He does now in some other way, and by natural laws. "I have been young" said David, "and now am I old; yet have I never seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread." It is high time that you people who are fretting about worldly circumstances, and who are fearing that you are coming to want, understood that the oath of the Eternal God is involved in the fact that you are to have enough to eat and to wear.

Again: I remark that the religion of Jesus is to make a man contented. Indemnity against all financial and spiritual harm! It calms the spirit, dwindles the earth into insignificance, and swallows up the soul with the thought of heaven. O ye who have been going about from place to place, expecting to find in change of circumstances something to give solace to the spirit, I commend you this morning to the warm-hearted, earnest, practical, common-sense religion of the Lord Jesus Christ. "There is no peace, saith my God, for the wicked," and as long as you continue in your sin, you will be miserable. Come to Christ. Make Him your portion and start for heaven, and you will be a happy man—you will be a happy woman.

Yet, my friends, notwithstanding all these inducements to a spirit of contentment, I have to tell you this morning the human race is divided into two classes—those who scold, and those who get scolded. The carpenter wants to be anything but a carpenter, and the mason anything but a mason, and the banker anything but a banker, and the lawyer anything but a lawyer, and the minister anything but a minister, and everybody would be happy if he were only somebody else. The anemone wants to be a sunflower, and the apple orchards throw down their blossoms because they are not tall cedars, and the scow wants to be a schooner, and the sloop would like to be a seventy-four pounder, and parents have the worst children that ever were, and everybody has the greatest misfortune, and everything is upside down, or going to be. Ah, my friends, you never make any advance through such a spirit as that.

You Cannot Fret Yourself Up;

you may fret yourself down. Amid all this grating of tones I strike this string of the Gospel harp: "Godliness with contentment is great gain. We brought nothing into the world, and it is very certain we can carry nothing out; having food and raiment, let us therewith be content."

Let us all remember, if we are Christians, that we are going after awhile, whatever be our circumstances now, to have

A Glorious Vacation.

As in summer we put off our garments, and go down into the cool sea to bathe, so we will put off these garments of flesh, and step into the cool Jordan. We will look around for some place to lay down our weariness, and the trees will say: "Come and rest under our shadow;" and the earth will say: "Come and sleep in my bosom;" and the winds will say: "Hush! while I sing thee a cradle hymn"; and while six strong men carry us out to our last resting-place, and ashes come to ashes, and dust to dust, we will see two scarred feet standing amid the broken soil, and a lacerated brow bending over the open grave, while a voice, tender with all-affection, and mighty with all-omnipotence, will declare: "I am the Resurrection and the Life; he that believeth in Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live." Comfort one another with these words.

THE familiar face of Dr. Talmage appears in a new setting in the picture inserted in this number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It is engraved from a photograph recently taken of the popular preacher in his uniform. As previously announced in these columns, the famous Thirteenth Regiment, which is Brooklyn's crack corps, decided last spring to invite Dr. Talmage to fill the post of regimental chaplain, made vacant by the death of Rev. Henry Ward Beecher. Dr. Talmage accepted, and has been formally installed.

The ceremony of inducting the new chaplain was the occasion of a gala night at the Hanson Place Armory. Both the galleries were filled by ladies and gentlemen who were interested in the evening's entertainment, and the main drill-room had to be called into requisition to make room for the large number of people present. The reviewing stand was tastefully decorated, and the band, under the leadership of W. C. Bowen, gave a concert for half an hour preceding the military programme. The regiment turned out ten companies of sixteen files front, and, under command of Colonel Austen, were put through a battalion drill, embracing manœuvres in company, battalion, and division movements. After the drill, which occupied three-quarters of an hour, the battalion was dismissed, and shortly thereafter reformed for dress parade. At this parade there were on the floor: The regiment, four hundred strong; the veteran corps, thirty-five strong, and the new company from the Brooklyn Tabernacle, forty-two strong.

Swearing the Chaplain.

After the men had been brought to parade rest, Colonel Austen escorted Dr. Talmage to the front, and said: "It is with great pleasure I welcome you as chaplain and captain of the soldiers of this regiment. May the teachings you give us enable us to take higher rank in the armies of the future. While, in accepting the command, you sacrifice some things, yet we hope to show you and the people of Brooklyn that we will discharge our duties as becomes the members of the Thirteenth Regiment."

Then Colonel Austen swore in Dr. Talmage as chaplain, after which he presented him with his commission.

In accepting the commission, Chaplain Talmage said: "Colonel Austen, men of the Thirteenth Regiment, and all their friends here gathered—I take this commission in my hand with two feelings—an appreciation of the honor done me, and a realization of the new duties that with it will roll upon my already busy life. Why do I accept it? Because I like to be intimately associated with public-spirited men, and believe it is another door of useful opportunity opened. I want to do my humble part toward hastening the time when Brooklyn, which is commonly called the best city of the Union, shall be recognized as second to none.

The First Time He Took the Oath.

"But, oh, the contrast between the first and second taking of the oath of office as chaplain! On the first occasion the North and South were in rage of battle, our institutions seemed going into eternal dismemberment, and in the barns and farm-houses around Sharpsburg and Hagerstown, all turned into hospitals, I saw scenes of suffering that I will not try to recount now. All that compared with the brilliant and lovely spectacle to-night, when the land is full of peace, and there is no prospect that any of these soldiers will ever be called to draw the sword or shoulder the musket in the defence of our institutions. And the occasion is adorned by the presence of womanhood, without whom life would not be worth living."

Then Chaplain Talmage introduced the new company, which he hoped would in a short time be one of the strongest in the regiment.

After the chaplain had finished his address, he was presented by Colonel Austen to the field and staff officers, and then the dress parade took place. Chaplain Talmage, however, failed to follow the officers when the parade was dismissed, and upon this being remarked, said that if there were any mistakes in drilling, he had not made any, for he took care to drop out before any drill took place.

A CHILD'S CRIPPLED FOOT CURED.

A REMARKABLE case of Divine Healing is related by Mrs. Brodie, of British Honduras, in this month's number of Thy Healer.* She says: "I have a precious testimony from Liverpool, which I have been asked to give out. When God took me there some weeks ago, I went to the house of a woman that had a little fellow two or three years of age under her care. He was not well, and she was anxious, because he was not her own, and she had promised, in case of anything coming to this child, she would have a doctor immediately, though she believes in the Lord's Healing. She was much troubled, and I asked her what was the matter. She said that a week before I got there, the little fellow began to limp and said that his foot hurt him. She had the day before called in a medical man and he had said the tendons were getting diseased, and this had increased her anxiety. I said, 'Let us put him into the Lord's hands,' and we did so. I went to the little fellow's cot and prayed for him. I have since received this letter, in which she says: 'My heart is full of praise to Him who loved us, and gave Himself for us. On Friday morning my dear little "Sonnie" got up on the sofa on which he had been sitting, and said: "Sonnie can walk." Kate, who was with him, said: "No, darling, you must sit still;" but in a moment he was on the floor, standing quite straight, with his heel down on the ground, and, before he could be prevented, he ran along the hall to tell "mamma," "Sonnie quite better.' Praise His holy Name, He has glorified His Name in this case. When the doctor called in the afternoon, the dear child ran to meet him. I felt I must give my Lord all the honor; so I told him of your visit and of having asked the Lord to heal him. The dear man had a long talk with me about means, about our Lord using the clay; so I said: "Well, sir, I do praise Him for what He has done." "So do I," he said, "for I can assure you I came this afternoon with great misgivings." "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and all that is within me, bless His holy Name!'"

DR. SUMMERS IN AN EPIDEMIC.

Two interesting letters have been sent home by Dr. W. R. Summers, from the Congo. His many friends in New York will be concerned to learn that he has been suffering from pleurisy and septic fever. At the time of writing, January 3, 1888, he was recovering after five weeks' suffering. In the course of his letter he refers to an epidemic of small-pox, which carried off a native king and led to barbarous cruelty, in accordance with African rites in such cases. He says: "Lieutenant Le Marinel, of the Belgian service, in the Congo Free State, has returned from Nyangwe, his immense caravan burdened by about eight hundred slaves, bought either by the Bashilange tribes or by the Angola carriers, who were tacitly allowed to do this business in return for the poor payment they received. Of course, with such a caravan, the lieutenant could not stop the traffic, if he had tried. His return journey was made quickly, but hundreds died of small-pox, or of great ulcers, on the road, and many of the slaves fled. When the caravan arrived here it was in a miserable condition, as, in addition to sickness, they had had much hunger on the road. No doubt most would have died of small-pox had not Lieutenant Le Marinel acted with praiseworthy caution, in making a second caravan of small-pox cases, and ordering this to remain a good distance behind the others. I had much work with these people. A small-pox reservation was made on the other side of the river Lulua, and all new cases were immediately sent there. Chinguengue, the king second in importance, was attacked by the pest, and refused to cross the river, and in a few days died. His body was placed on a bedstead, and five slaves built a mud and wattle house over it. His principal wife was then beaten to death by sticks, and her body cast into the Lulua, while the five slaves were beheaded, and their remains left to guard the body of Chinguengue. Chinguengue was by far the most intelligent man of the Bashilange, and his death was felt by all."

A PHYSICIAN'S ANGEL.

THE writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews in enjoining hospitality to strangers, reminds his readers (Heb. 13: 2) for their encouragement that "some have entertained angels unawares." There are some, too, whose kindness to the poor and afflicted have, much to their own surprise, led to rich reward. An illustration is furnished by the life of Sir Andrew Clark, who was recently elected President of the Royal College of Physicians in England and who has probably the largest and most lucrative practice in London. It appears that he owes the first step into public notice, which is always the most difficult for a young physician, to the persistency of an old pauper woman in a charity hospital, to whose case he gave gratuitously the most constant thought and attention. The old woman was deeply grateful and was greatly impressed by his skill and kindness. One day Mrs. Gladstone visited the hospital where she lay, accompanied by her son Herbert, then a little boy and in very delicate health. The poor woman reciprocated Mrs. Gladstone's kindly interest in her by a keen anxiety about the youthful Herbert, and begged Mrs. Gladstone so persistently to let her doctor see the boy that at last she won her point. "But who is your doctor?" asked Mrs. Gladstone. "Young Mr. Clark," replied the woman. And so it came about that "young Mr. Clark" obtained an introduction to the Gladstone family, treated his young patient with success, and at once became famous among the London aristocracy. The now celebrated and wealthy physician himself related the story at a meeting of the organizers of the Hospital Sunday Fund in the Mansion House, London.

A FUGITIVE CHILD-WIFE.

IN a letter from India which Miss Gardner sends to the Missionary Link, she tells a pathetic story of a fugitive girl who, with her mother, is now under the care of the missionaries in Calcutta. The girl, whose name is Ahmadi, was married according to the native custom when she was seven years old to a boy of twelve. The boy took a dislike to her from the first, and would strike her frequently as they played in the house of his father. But as time went on, and the boy grew older and stronger, the beatings became more and more frequent, and the cries of the little girl more pitiful, if there had been anybody to be moved with pity for her, but there was not. As she grew older, she was delicate and sickly, the constant state of fear in which she lived not being a good way to bring about a healthy physical condition. Her father-in-law joined with his son, and lent the energy of his stronger arm when that of the younger man seemed not sufficient for their cruel purpose. At length, however, the poor child's condition reached the ears of her mother, and the mother-heart, moved with love and pity, went to her child, and finding things even as she had heard, she took her little one away, back to her own home. But this did not suit the brutal instincts of the young husband. He must have her near him. The mother refusing to let the little one go back, he took the case to law and lost it, being bound over to "hold the peace" for six months. During this time Ahmadi lived with her mother, enjoying her care and love.

But by and by the six months passed away, and again the going back stared them in the face. They could not bear the thought; the child clung to the mother and cried, "Don't let me go!" But what could she do? The law could no longer afford them a protection. If they stayed where they were, the husband would claim his wife, and go she must. So they resolved to go away, and helped by the missionaries, who had been their friends through all this heavy trial, they fled to Calcutta, to them a foreign land. Here she is, with her mother, and has been here for the last two months. The little Ahmadi is getting to be bright and cheery, but the mother carries about a weary, sad face, that it makes one's heart ache to see. She has not learned of Christ, and of course the burden of this great affliction must seem heavy indeed.

A PATHETIC PROTEST FROM AN AFRICAN.

THE heart of every Christian must be touched by the pathos of an appeal sent for transmission to England. The Mohammedan emir of Nupe, West Africa, has sent the following stirring message to Bishop Crowther, of the Niger mission:

"It is not a long matter; it is about barasa (rum). Barasa, barasa, barasa! It has ruined our country; it has ruined our people very much; it has made our people mad. I beg you, Malam Kip, don't forget this writing, because we all beg that he [Crowther] should beg the great priests [committee of the Church Missionary Society] that they should beg the English queen to prevent bringing barasa into this land.

"For God and the prophet's sake, for God and the prophet his messenger's sake, he must help us in this matter—that of barasa. We all have confidence in him. He must not leave our country to become spoiled by barasa. Tell him, may God bless him in his work. This is the mouthword from Malike, the emir of Nupe."

A SISTER MISSED.

IN the course of an address at a recent convention, Dr. A. J. Gordon, of Boston, quoted an incident related by a minister, who said: "I knew two sisters, one of whom was saved, but the other was not saved, and the saved one could not help thinking, again and again, of the words 'the one shall be taken and the other left,' and she said, 'I shall be taken and my sister left.' And she was so impressed by this that she could not help telling her sister about it. They retired to rest, but each of them had only a troubled sleep, because of the great thought which had taken possession of their hearts. Sleep at length came to the unsaved one, and then her sister rose from her couch and began to plead with God to change her dear sister's heart. Presently the sleeping one awoke, and, missing her sister, was greatly troubled, and she said, 'It is midnight, and the Lord has come. He has taken my sister and I am left.' She sprang from her couch, and then she saw her kneeling in prayer; she threw her arms around her, and they prayed together. Then they went back to their couch and slept peacefully until the sun rising came forth as a bridegroom from his chamber. And peace through believing now filled the heart of the sister who had been unsaved, and she said: 'Dear sister, if the Lord comes to-day we shall both be taken, and neither will be left.'" Let the truth sink into your hearts. May God lead you to Christ, so that when He comes there may be no separation between you and those you love.

THE SEAMAN'S GUIDE.

MARKING the marinsr's way is an occupation in which the Coast and Geodetic Survey Department of the Government has been for some time engaged. The volumes resulting from its efforts are now nearly ready for publication. The greater part of the data for the Atlantic coast has been collected, and in accordance with instructions of F. M. Thorn, Superintendent, is rapidly being placed in a comprehensive shape. Thus in giving sailing directions for any harbor or river, an effort has been made to include them in a continuous statement, carrying the navigator from entry to his destination. Much practical information will also be given, the most important concerning the greatest draught of vessels which are actually taken to particular places; the depth of water in channels; depth alongside wharves; pilots, whether necessary and where obtained; the best anchorages, most available harbors of refuge; harbor regulations, anchorage limits, if fixed by regulations; the ports at which supplies, fresh water, coal, &c., can be obtained; hospitals available for mariners, and other information of value to seamen. These facts have been collected at enormous labor and expense, and will doubtless be appreciated by the captains of vessels. They will be useless, however, to any captain who merely carries the volumes with him but does not study them. That is the case with many who are in danger of making shipwreck on the voyage of life. They do not study the Book which God has given them to guide them safely to the heavenly shore. (II Tim. 3:16.)

THE SEVEN PROPHETIC PARABLES.

By G. H. Pember, M. A., author of "Earth's Earliest Ages," "The Great Prophecies," etc.

THE seven parables as given in the thirteenth chapter of Matthew's Gospel, are not primarily intended for practical teaching—in the other gospels they are so intended, but in Matthew they are a great prophecy of the history of the Church—that is the professing Church, within which are found the true members of Christ. They appear to be arranged in chronological and consecutive order, and to trace in outline the entire course of the Church's history. Let us glance at them briefly.

I. The Sower and the Seed.

The parable of the sower represents the first period of the Gospel age. The sowing is the preaching of the Word by the Lord and His disciples, perhaps to the end of the first century. The showers of blessing were then copious; there has been nothing like them since, until our times, in which the latter rain warns us of the approaching harvest. How rapidly the Gospel was spread in those early times is indicated by Paul when he tells the Colossians that the Gospel "is preached to every creature under heaven." I do not wonder at it. You will remember how active Paul and the other apostles were; and how converts no sooner accepted the Gospel than they were off to preach it to others. The church at Colosse was so founded, and Paul had never seen it when he wrote his letter to it. So also was it with the Church at Rome. Paul had never been there when he wrote the Epistle to the Romans; but when he was on his way as a prisoner to the great city, and saw the brethren coming to meet him, he thanked God, and took courage. The spread of Christianity was so rapid that even the heathen writers noticed it. Tacitus speaks of an "immense number of Christians" at Rome itself, and that only a year or two after the date of the Epistle to the Romans. And a few years later Pliny speaks of the temples of Bithynia and Pontus being forsaken, because such multitudes had received the Gospel.

II. The Tares and the Wheat.

The next parable is that of the tares sown upon the wheat. It seems to refer specially to the history of the second and third centuries, the great time of heresy. When Satan saw what the preaching of the gospel was accomplishing everywhere, he adopted the most effective measures to undo the work. A flood of insidious false doctrines was let loose upon the Church to such an extent that all the heresies of later times, in whatever guise they appear, are merely revivals of those of this period. Two books which have come down to us contribute their evidence to this fact. One is a volume "Against Heresies," written by Irenæus of Lyons, a disciple of Polycarp, who himself had sat at the feet of the Apostle John. The other is from the pen of Hippolytus, a pupil of Irenæus, and entitled, "A Refutation of all Heresies." Satan seems to have put forth all his ingenuity and all force in endeavoring to poison the fountain of truth. Alas! the taint remains to this day in the tenets of many of the sects. And strange to say, this time of heresy was also a time of terrible persecution. Satan knew what he was about. He subtilely devised errors not easily distinguished from truth, and held out the hope of escaping persecution to those who would accept them. Nothing is said respecting the persecutions in this parable, but their occurrence is indicated by a warning to the Lord's people not to retaliate upon their persecutors. Though the tares are the children of the wicked one, His servants are not to root them up from the field, which is the world, not to put to death those who propagate error. Even at the harvest, it is the angels who are to be the reapers and to gather out the tares; we shall not have that sorrowful task.

III. The Mustard-Tree.

The third parable is that of the mustard-tree, which seems to deal with the fourth century. The mustard plant is a pot-herb and an annual, but, like other annuals in Palestine, it sometimes becomes perennial, and so grows into a tree with great branches, which afford shelter to the fowls of the air. But by this development beyond the limits of its kind it violates the creation-law of the third day. What the fowls of the air represent is indicated by our Lord in His explanation of the parable of the sower.

Now all this exactly corresponds with what happened in the fourth century, when the Church, having passed through ten persecutions, and having only increased and become stronger, was assailed by Satan in another way. Constantine, who checked the last persecution, became the patron of the Church. He has been generally represented as a Christian; but that is a perversion of history. He never was a Christian at all—at least, not until within a few days of his death. He simply put Jesus of Rome, together with the other gods, and did this in deference to his soldiers, many of whom were professing Christians. But the Lord Jesus will not accept this. He claims sole worship and allegiance. Constantine's religion was no Christianity. This is obscured through the falsification of Church history, but many facts remain to attest it. The very names of the days of the week remind us of it; for the first of them is called "Sunday," an extremely Pagan appellation connected with Apollo, the Sun God. Constantine had observed that the chief difference between Christian and heathen lay in the observance of the first day of the week, and as his object in patronizing the Church was to amalagamate her with heathenism, he issued a decree that the heathen were to keep the first day of the week in honor of the sun, while the Christians devoted it to the worship of Christ. Hence the name; and very soon Christ and Apollo came to be identified, more or less. The worship of the Sun God came from Babylon. In this way, then, the mustard seed, contrary to the law of its existence, became a great tree—or, in other words, the Church became great and popular, and instead of the presence of the Holy Spirit, the wicked spirits of the air found lodgment in her branches.

IV. The Leaven in the Meal.

But we must pass on, leaving you to study out these thoughts. The next parable is that of the leaven. Strangely enough some have interpreted the leaven as a good influence. How any readers of the Bible could entertain such an idea seems inexplicable. Not once in the whole of the Scriptures is leaven used for anything save corruption, for, as known to the ancients, it was itself something which had become corrupt. It was indeed put into bread, but the bread had to be carefully baked, else it would have become sour. Indeed, the Hebrews spoke of unleavened bread as "sweet," of leavened bread as "sour." Leaven was expressly forbidden to be offered in any sacrifice. The parable seems to be founded on the meat offering; and the woman, representing an apostate church, mingles it with fine meal, thus rendering the latter unfit for an offering to the Lord. The parable thus seems to have reference to the Apostate Greek and Latin Churches.

V. The Treasure Hid in the Field.

At the close of the parable of the leaven there is a pause: our Lord retires with His disciples into a house. The remaining three parables are spoken to the disciples alone, and, therefore, perhaps, had a more restricted meaning. The first is that of the treasure hid in a field. Many think that Christ is the husbandman, and the Church the treasure; but surely our Lord did not light by accident on His Church when He was about some other business! The husbandman is ploughing or digging, and his spade or plough strikes against something. He digs and finds treasure; for the sake of which he gives up all that he has and buys the field. The Lord seems to be describing the conditions of the Churches of the Reformation, upon which a strange deadness fell soon after their establishment. Each of them had the treasure, the Gospel of the Lord Jesus, surrounded by a larger or smaller field of other doctrines; and each of them had their doctrines sharply defined, like a fenced field. In one of these communities a man would hear the gospel preached, and, for the sake of it, would embrace all the tenets of the sect at whatever cost to himself.

VI. The Pearl of Great Price.

In the next parable the condition of things is altered. The treasure is not hid in a sharply defined field, but beneath the shifting waves of the sea: it sinks as a pearl to the bottom. That seems to me to represent the state of things upon which we are now entering. A man may say he belongs to this or that sect, but his statement is no indication of his opinion of doctrine. Every man has his own ideas. The countless creeds, sects, heresies and philosophies are all mingled in a confused and ever-shifting mass like the waters of the sea. Soon the truth of God will not be lighted upon accidentally as it were, but only by patient search—the merchantman is "seeking goodly pearls." But even in these perilous times of the end God will always have witnesses who will be able to bring up the priceless pearl from beneath the waters of human speculation and to offer it to those who are honestly seeking the truth. But perhaps it may not be long before he who would obtain it will have to give up all that he has for the prize.

VII. The Net Cast Into the Sea,

The last parable is that of the drag-net, which represents the circle within which the Gospel is preached; while the shore is the end of the age. A net does not inclose all the fish of the sea, and when the Lord returns there will be many who will not have heard of His name nor seen His glory, and with them He will not deal in final judgment. But we may notice that, although the net contains all sorts of fish, only two classes are recognized when they are separated. The good are gathered into vessels and the bad cast away. The good are first picked out, and to some this has seemed a contradiction of the parable of the tares. It is not so, however: for there is no note of time in the latter. The apparently contradictory command should be rendered, "First collect the tares, and then bind them in bundles to burn them; but as to the wheat, gather that into thy barn."

In these seven parables the Lord reveals the whole history of the Church, from the first sowing to the gathering of His coming.

CURRENT EVENTS.

A New Treaty with Mexico to Prevent border troubles has been negotiated. Mr. Secretary Bayard and Don Matias Romero have had under consideration a scheme to obviate for the future the difficulties which have frequently arisen in the past through the passage of unguarded grazing cattle across the border line from Mexico to this country, or oftener from the United States into Mexico. In such cases the return of the wandering cattle raised claims for duties. The new treaty is expected to enable cattle owners on both sides to avoid trouble hereafter. The Senate will have no compunction about ratifying such a treaty.

The Evils of the Present Immigration System have at length compelled the attention of Congress. On Thursday last the House unanimously adopted a resolution, introduced by Mr. Ford, of Michigan, that "the Speaker shall appoint a committee of five members who shall, within thirty days after the adjournment of this House, begin an investigation into the causes and methods of excessive, artificial, and injurious immigration to the United States, and the effect of such immigration upon the general health and prosperity of the several State commonwealths. The committee may employ counsel, a clerk, an interpreter and a stenographer. The committee shall report, at the next session of the Fiftieth Congress, a bill to correct and control the evils arising from the present conditions and methods of immigration." There is no intention to restrict legitimate immigration, but only to check the operations of padrones, agents of transportation companies, and other persons who make a business of stimulating and assisting immigration from selfish motives.

The Submission to the States of a Prohibition amendment to the Constitution is advocated in a report of the Senate Committee on Education presented by Senator Hoar on July 9. The Committee says: "The agitation for national legislation for the extirpation of the traffic in alcoholic poison made and sold to be used as a beverage will never cease to disturb, and finally to destroy, the great political parties until they submit to the States the question of the enlargement of national, constitutional jurisdiction, so as to include control of the subject. When decided, if adversely to the ratification, the subject will be eliminated from national politics, at least for many years. If, on the other hand, the proposed amendment should be ratified, and become a part of the national law, the chief curse of the world would be summoned to the block of national justice, and die by the hand of the only power which can wield an axe big and sharp enough to cut off its hydra head. Then we shall have peace." The Committee is over-sanguine about the elimination of the question, if the amendment is not ratified. The Prohibitionists are not the people whom one failure discourages.

An Important Extension of the Civil Service Reform Rules has been made. They are now to operate in the appointment of all employees in the Federal and District Governments, except unskilled laborers, and in the Customs and Postal Service outside Washington. Hitherto, all offices in which the salary was over $2,000 or under $900 were not filled by competitive examination, but in future they will be filled as other offices are, except in a few specified cases where the service required is of a technical character. The extension is a practical testimony to the value and efficacy of the much-maligned law, and is a safe indication that the Departments in which it has been operative have benefited by the system. It has now been so long in force that if it had failed to secure its object in providing the Government with efficient employees the failure must have been discovered. The curtailment of patronage which it assures is a distinct gain, and this extension implies that it promotes efficiency also.

Over a Million Dollars Damage was Done last week by the sudden rise of the River Monongahela. The freshet extended from the head of the river to below Pittsburg, Penn. It commenced so suddenly on July 9, as to take the river-men unawares, and they were not prepared when the great volume of water burst upon them. Millions of feet of lumber, scores of coal craft, fences, out-houses and coal tipples floated down the swift current during the following two days. At every point between Greensboro and Pittsburg the low lands were under water, and the residents were compelled to live in the upper stories of their houses; and in some cases to seek the hills for safety. Many had not time to remove their goods, as the water rose at the rate of a foot an hour, and at Greensboro thirty-two feet of a rise was recorded in less than twenty-four hours. Among the wreckage was a sawmill with all its machinery, which was swept from Belle Vernon, Penn., to a point sixty miles below Pittsburg. It is feared that several persons must have been drowned, and that others will die from damp and exposure. The Valley River also overflowed its banks on July 10, and caused much damage at Grafton and Wheeling, W. Va.

The German Physicians who were Consulted in the case of the late Emperor Frederick, have issued a medical report strongly condemnatory of Dr. Mackenzie, the English physician. They assert that as far back as May 15, 1887, Dr. Gerhardt pronounced the illustrious patient's disease to be cancer, and his opinion was confirmed by other German physicians. After a consultation they recommended an operation. They consented, however, to await the examination of Dr. Mackenzie, who at that time expressed his doubts as to the accuracy of their diagnosis, and was opposed to an operation until the disease should be proved to be cancer. They submitted the decision to the then Crown Prince,, who declined to subject himself to the operation in the face of Dr. Mackenzie's opinion. They then appealed to the Prince's father, Emperor William, who said that his son was old enough to judge for himself, and refused to interfere. Later, when the cancer was clearly proved, it had spread too far to be extirpated by the knife. The report of the physicians shows a strong animus against the English physician, and not a little detracts from its value as a scientific document. Dr. Mackenzie has made no formal reply. He hints that he maintains silence in deference to the wishes of august persons, presumably the ex-Empress and her mother. He declared, however, that he has an elaborate answer prepared, which will be published at the proper time, and will show the German report to be "a tissue of falsehoods." The Doctor speaks also of disgraceful scenes in the patient's sick-room, and of one occasion when his chief assailant came to perform his duties in a state of intoxication.

An Earthquake Shock was Felt in Several districts of Canada on July 8, about seven in the evening. It was most severe in the district between Belleville and Kingston. In the vicinity of Napanee and Deseronto the earth vibrated and houses shook so vigorously that people were awakened, and hastily fled outside. Accompanying the shock was a low rumbling roar as of far off thunder. It was accompanied by a rattling sound that filled people with fear. Goods in stores were knocked off the shelves by the violence of the quake. Similar shocks were experienced at Enterprise, Newburg, Moscow, and Yarker. At Northport and Picton the residents thought that there had been an explosion.

Mr. Parnell's Scheme for the Government of Ireland is on the Federation principle, which has long been advocated by statesmen who are not Irishmen. In an interview published in the Pall Mall Gazette, the Irish leader sketches his chief features. His idea is that England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales shall each have a Parliament for the administration of local affairs. Thus the London Parliament will become purely an English, the Cardiff Parliament a Welsh, the Dublin Parliament an Irish, and the Edinburgh Parliament a Scotch body. The House of Lords, however, will be replaced by a congress of members from all the four kingdoms and from each of the colonies to form an imperial Parliament which will legislate on all national affairs. This plan is practically that of the Constitution of the United States so far as legislation is concerned. It has often been suggested before as a practical solution of the problem, but the Irish party has never been authoritatively committed to it, and Mr. Parnell in thus speaking out has answered a great many questions, particularly concerning the retention of the Irish members at Westminster, to which no one could obtain a satisfactory response hitherto.

The Duel in France on Friday last between General Boulanger and Prime Minister Floquet is discreditable alike to the two men and to their country. That the two most prominent statesmen in the nation should quarrel like two schoolboys, and should afterward meet in murderous combat, argues not only a low type of statesmanship, but a deplorable lack of morality. The example thus set to the people cannot but be pernicious. The fight grew out of a scene in the Legislature on Thursday. General Boulanger, whose inordinate vanity has made him the laughing-stock of Europe, proposed the dissolution of the Chamber. He grandiloquently declared that the country was trembling with emotion at always having presented to it as an enemy a citizen who only desired the welfare of the Republic. M. Floquet, in his reply, taunted General Boulanger with being a lingerer in sacristies and the ante-chambers of princes. The taunt went home, and Boulanger responded by calling out the usual retort of a blackguard, "It is a lie." The Chamber rejected his motion, and Boulanger thereupon resigned his seat. At ten o'clock the next morning he met Floquet by appointment in a retired spot about two miles out of Paris, and there a duel with swords took place. General Boulanger proved inexpert with the soldier's weapon, and his antagonist, though a civilian, succeeded in wounding him severely in the throat. The soldier fell to the ground unconscious, and was ignominiously carried from the field. His wound is said to be serious.

The Pan Presbyterian Council in London closed its sittings on Thursday last. The council adopted a proposal made by Professor Charteris, of Edinburgh, that women be enrolled under the kirk session and the sanction of the Church courts, as deaconesses, and set apart by the Presbytery to assist in the service of the church. The subject of a liturgy for the church was revived by Dr. T. G. Apple, of Lancaster, O. In the course of the discussion on the question, the Rev. Donald Fraser, of London, suggested that the Westminister directory be thoroughly revised and rendered suitable to modern times. The services should be so arranged as to be complete without sermons, and the number of short prayers should be increased. The congregation should utter the responses and join audibly in the prayers. The council decided to appoint a permanent Secretary in London, and Dr. G. D. Mathews, of Quebec, was elected. Dr. W. H. Roberts, of Cincinnati, was elected Secretary for America.

An Improvement on the Practice of Closing the churches during the hot weather has been made this year by several pastors, and it may be hoped will be widely adopted. Rev. W. E. Needham, of Westchester, Pa., has closed his church on Sunday evenings and taken the congregation into the open air. The result has been highly gratifying. Vast audiences have gathered to hear the word. Men and women who rarely go to a place of worship have flocked out and listened attentively to the story of the Cross. Rev. Thomas Needham has pitched a large tent on Broad Street, Philadelphia, for the summer months.

An Actress was Wounded on the Stage at Staten Island, N. Y., on July 11. A play is being performed there in which a gladiatorial combat occurs. A girl who takes one of the parts interposes at one stage of the combat, to plead for the life of her lover, who is one of the gladiators. Failing in this, her part requires her to fling herself into the arms of her brother, another gladiator, and entreat him to kill her, that she may die with her lover. The actress who usually takes this part was sick on Wednesday night, and another actress, who has understudied the part, took her place. She was somewhat nervous and excited, and at the critical time anticipated the action, and threw herself into the arms of the gladiator before he was aware of her intention. The dagger which he held in his hand was poised at the moment, and instead of pretending to stab her, he really did so inadvertently. The weapon entered her side, inflicting a severe wound, which bled copiously, and necessitated her removal to the infirmary. The daily journals say that the performance went on as if no catastrophe had occurred, and the spectators thought that the girl's shriek was only that required by her part. There are many besides professional actors and actresses who regard the solemn realities of life and death as a fit subject for mockery and sport. To such death will bring an awful disillusion. They will then learn how serious are the matters that they have treated with levity. (Prov. : 25, 26.)

A Woman's Interference in a Quarrel led to her death in Long Island City, N. Y., on July 7. It appears that a large building in that city is let out to a number of families, who occupy two or three rooms each. A widow and a widower who lived in the building decided on getting married, and they invited all their fellow-occupiers to a wedding supper. Both bride and bridegroom were well known in the building, and one or two of the guests had reasons for being disappointed by the marriage. Considerable liquor was consumed, which did not foster reticence about grievances. Finally a quarrel was evolved, and from angry words the men passed to fighting. Two of the men engaged in a desperate battle which seemed likely to end in the death of one of them. They left the room where the wedding festivities had been held and continued to fight in the hall-way, where the noise attracted the attention of the woman who owned the building. She had not been at the reception and did not know the cause of the fight; but fearing that murder would be done, she rushed between the combatants to part them. They both resented her interference, and their wrath turned upon her. They took her up and flung her into the area, where, falling upon her head, she broke her neck and died instantly. This is not the first time by many that peacemaking has proved a dangerous vocation. Doubtless, anxious as the woman in this case was to make peace, she would not have interfered could she have foreseen the fatal result of her effort. It was not so with the great Peacemaker by whom men may attain eternal peace. He voluntarily laid down His life that the world through His death might be reconciled with God. (Eph. 2 : 14–16.)

A Beauty Doctor is Gaining a Lucrative Practice in New York. Every day she has patients coming to her to be treated for ugliness. They may be in perfect health, physically, but not quite at peace in their minds because of defects which they think render them unpleasing in the eyes of their fellow-mortals, and as far as possible she undertakes to eradicate the complaint of plainness. Women go to her to be made thinner or stouter, to have their color heightened or reduced, to be treated for ugly complexions, red eyes, thin hair, round shoulders, and all the physical faults which make the difference between beauty and the lack of it. This "Beauty Doctor," as she is called, has effected some wonderful cures of plainness by a course of diet and exercise, and in several cases has taken entire charge of a woman for six months, with the result that at the end of that time her friends scarcely knew her, so greatly had her appearance changed. Some of her patients complain of the rigor of her treatment, but they undergo it cheerfully for the sake of the result. One can but wish that there was the same anxiety to attain beauty of character, the imperishable beauty which is a blessing to the possessor and to the world. For this there is an infallible recipe. (1 Peter 3 : 3, 4.)

An Extraordinary Epidemic of St. Vitus' dance is reported to exist in Duquoin, Ill. The press despatch on the subject, received in New York, caused some doubts as to the truth of the report, that disease not being regarded as one that could become epidemic. A reporter, therefore, was sent to interview Dr. Spitzka, a physician who has made nervous disorders a special study. He said that St. Vitus' dance might certainly be epidemic, and he had known cases in which it had become so in public schools. If a child afflicted with it was not isolated, but allowed to continue at school, then an epidemic is quite apt to follow from imitation. Sometimes the other children will imitate the one suffering from St. Vitus's dance from pure mischief, and will find that they have lost the power to control their own movements. But more often the imitation is of that unconscious sort which makes a whole school restless from the presence of a single restless individual, or which makes you inclined to yawn when the man with whom you are talking yawns. The defect of stuttering, which is a kindred disorder, is often caught in that way. We have Scriptural authority for the fact that a still worse disorder may come from association. The man who associates with wicked men is apt to become wicked. (1 Cor. 15 : 33.)

Seventeen Dead Voyagers for China Were despatched from New York last week. On July 9 three Chinaman arrived in the city from San Francisco, and having made proper application to the health authorities, proceeded with an undertaker and a Chinese laborer to the Cemetery of the Evergreens. There a grave was opened and the coffin lifted out. The Chinese assistant removed the lid, and disclosed a skeleton which must have been interred many years ago. The bones were taken out of the coffin, and placed in one of a number of oblong tin boxes which the party had brought with them. Some Chinese hieroglyphs were scratched upon the box, and it was closed. It was noticed that while American laborers were employed to do the digging, they were not allowed to touch the coffin or to handle the bones. This part of the work was done by the Chinese laborer whom the party had brought them. When the work was done they proceeded to another grave, where the same process was gone through. Seventeen graves in all were opened, and the skeletons removed. The tin boxes had evidently been made to contain just one skeleton without crowding and no more. They were stacked upon the wagon, and taken back to the city, where they were expressed to San Francisco to be there shipped to China. The three Chinamen who superintended the exhumation and removal were representatives of "the Six Companies," who conduct Chinese emigration. A superstition prevails among the Chinese that if their dead bodies are buried out of China their souls cannot enjoy happiness in Paradise, hence every Chinaman insists upon having a contract from responsible persons to carry his bones back to China within a specified time after his death, if he should die abroad. It is a pity that men who are concerned about their happiness after death should not know how that object may really be attained. Among ourselves those who have that knowledge, too often feel so little concern about their eternal state that they neglect to make use of it. (Matt. 7 : 24–27.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Absinthe drinking is said to be increasing to an alarming extent in New York.

A large party from Dr. Talmage's church will go to Europe for their annual trip. It is proposed to spend seven weeks in visiting Great Britain, France, Germany, Austria, and Italy. The expense will be about $250 for each person. Dr. Talmage's lecture engagements will not permit of his accompanying the party.

MOSES: HIS FAITH AND DECISION.

"By faith Moses, when he was come to years, refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter; choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season; esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt: for he had respect unto the recompense of the reward."—Hebrews 11: 24-26.

A Correction in the Idea of Moses—Not a Representative of Law Only—I. Moses had Faith—Believed in God—Believed Israel was His People—Believed in a Future Judgment—II. His Clear Decision—What He Gave Up—A Princely Status—Natural Affection—Apparent Leading of Providence—Opportunities of Doing Good—Prisoners in a Bishop's Coal-Hole—Moses' Choice of Affliction—III. Moses to be Imitated—A Personal Declaration.

We generally picture Moses with beams of glory rising from his brow, and the two tables of the law in his hand; a stern man holding forth a sterner law. But we must correct our idea. Moses is as much an example of faith as he is a representative of law. What he did was as much due to his faith as were the acts of Paul or John. In describing Moses, the summary must begin "By faith," as much as if we were describing Abraham. Continue to regard Moses as a representative of the law, but also view him as a man of powerful faith.

I need scarcely remind you that the faith of Moses was peculiarly active and operative. I might apply the words of James to him, and say, "Likewise also was not Moses justified by works when he refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter, and chose to endure affliction with the people of God?" The faith of Moses was what ours must be, a faith which worked by love—even love to God, and love to His people. It was no mere belief of a fact; but that fact had an overpowering influence upon his life. Moses believed, believed firmly and intensely, believed for himself, so that he took fast hold of that which is invisible. Moses showed the reality of his faith in his life, by what he refused to do, and by what he chose to do. Both the negative and the positive poles were made right by his faith. Everything about Moses proved the vigor of his faith in God.

I. First, then,

Moses had Faith.

It is very clear that Moses believed in God. He was learned in all the learning of the Egyptians, he had been brought up in the very best academies of the period; but he had not been seduced from faith in his God. There were gods many in Egypt; but Moses worshipped the one God, the God of his fathers; and though he may have known comparatively little of Him, he knew enough to have no other God but the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. I would that all of you believed in the living, personal, working, ever-present God! In these days many do not believe in a personal God, but in some sort of force or mystic energy, they know not what. This is virtually to have no God at all. To Moses the existence and ruling power of God were the greatest facts of life. Although the pomp and power and glory, and wisdom of the ruling nation were all on the side of idols, Moses worshipped the one God; for in His power and Godhead he solemnly believed.

In the next place, Moses believed that the Israelites were the chosen people of God. This, of course, he had learned from his parents, and he heartily believed it, though it certainly did not look to be true. For this cause Moses loved them, and desired to be numbered with them. Certainly, they were not in themselves a very lovable people: there was much about them that must have saddened the heart of Moses. They were ignorant, while he was educated: they had been debased by slavery, while he was of that brave disposition which is nourished in freedom. When he himself attempted to be their champion, they did not receive him. He found two of them striving together, and when, with gentle words he would have made peace between them, one of them replied, "Who made thee a prince and a judge over us?" Yet Moses said, "Whatever they may be, they are the people of God, and I will be one of them."

Even to this day the Lord has a chosen people, a remnant according to the election of grace.

of God, we soon detect much that is faulty, many shortcomings and many grievous evils; yet the church of God is God's choice, and we may not despise it. If they are good enough for God, they are good enough for me. If you never join a church till you find a perfect church, you must wait till you get to heaven; and if you could go there as you are, they would not receive you into fellowship. Consider who are the people that acknowledge God in their lives, who hold the truth as it is revealed, who believe the Holy Scriptures, and worship God in the Spirit, having no confidence in the flesh. Cast in your lot with these people, however poor and commonplace they may be.

Next, dear friends, note this—Moses had faith in a future judgment. He looked beyond the present; for he "had respect to the recompense of the reward." It is dangerous to be always looking at things from one point of view. If we could go quite round, and see things from the future, looking back upon them rather than forward to them, how differently they would appear! "Oh!" said a lady to her minister, "I find great pleasure in going to the play. There is the pleasure of anticipation, there is the pleasure of enjoying it, and there is the pleasure of thinking it over afterwards." "Yes," said her minister, "I know all that, madam; but there is one pleasure you have forgotten, namely, the pleasure of meditating upon it on a dying bed." She shrugged her shoulders; she could see no pleasure there. I wish that men would estimate their pleasures by that rule How will they look when we lie dying? How will they appear when we stand before the judgment-seat of God?

Let me not quit this point till I have said that Moses had a personal faith by which he realized the whole business for himself. His faith led him on to personal action. He did not say, "I am placed by Providence in the palace of Pharaoh, and so I am not called upon to suffer like the rest of my race." No, no, but he refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter. He did not say, "I am so circumstanced that I need not suffer, and, therefore, I will keep out of the general trouble as well as I can." You know how men feel, that there is nothing like keeping on the warm side of the hedge. Moses resolved that he would suffer affliction with the people of God.

This was the faith of Moses, a real personal faith, Come, dear friends, ask yourselves, have you all such a personal faith in God? I tell you, if your faith is not personal and practical faith, it is not worth two-pence. It will do you no good, either here or hereafter. It will leave you lost to God if it leaves you still a friend to the world, and an alien from the people of God. Oh, that you may say from your heart, "This God is my God for ever and ever. He shall be my Guide even unto death."

II. Our second point is this: Moses exhibited

A Clear Decision.

Note, first, the time of his choice: "When he was come to years." We do not know the exact time to which this refers. When he was forty years of age he visited his brethren, but his mind may have been made up long before. It was "when he was come to years." I suppose that means early in life, so soon as he was of full age. Still, it is said, "when he was come to years," as much as to say, that whatever his decision was while he was yet young, that decision was carried out more practically when he was come to years. We do wish to see young people converted, but we wish it to be as thoughtful a conversion, as clear and deliberate a change, as if they were advanced in age. We trust that their following years will confirm what they do in their youth. Moses decided for God early in life; but he decided also when he was capable of forming a mature judgment.

Moses went about arranging his life like a man of business, and decided wisely; but we must note well

The Prospect which He Gave Up.

He "refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter." To be the son of Pharaoh's daughter made him a prince of Egypt. Some have thought that the Pharaoh then reigning had no other child but this daughter, and that her son Moses would have succeeded to the throne of Egypt. We cannot be sure of that, though it may have been so. The son of a princess had noble rank and grand opportunities. Wealth was evidently to be had; the treasures of Egypt were before him. Honor was his already, and as he grew older, titles would multiply upon him. But "He refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter."

A great many would say, What a fool he was to give up what others covet! I fear that many of you professors would not lose a situation for Christ. Some of you could not lose a shilling a week of extra pay for the Lord. Ah me, this is a miserable age! Go with a lancet throughout these Isles, and you could not get enough martyr-blood to fill a thimble.

Backbones are Scarce, and grit is a rare article. Men do not now care to suffer for Christ; but they must be respectable, they must vote in the majority, they must go with the committee, and be thought well of for their charity. As to standing up and standing out for Christ, it is looked upon as a eccentricity, or worse.

For a moment, I will show you some of the arguments which Moses must have had to meet In his own mind, when having come to years he began to think the matter over, many arguments would arise and demand reply. The first argument would be, "You will be acting very unkindly to your adopted mother—What will she say? She drew you out of the water when you might have been drowned; she took you home when she saw that you were nursed and cared for, she has had you trained and educated. She has spent no end of money on you; there is nothing you could wish for but what she has supplied in her heart is entwined in yours: and now, having come to years, if you refuse to be called her son it will be a very sad return for her love." Natural affection has often proved a serious difficulty in the way of grace. The Lord Jesus has said, "He that loveth father or mother more than Me is not worthy of Me; and many are thus unworthy." Moses thus proved his faith to be stronger than that of many who are mastered by family ties, and held captive by the bonds of earthly love.

Next, there would come before the mind of Moses the plausible argument, "Providence has led you where you are, and you ought to keep your position." When he looked back he saw watching over him in the ark of bulrushes, and bringing the Egyptian princess down to that particular part of the Nile to bathe. How singular that she should see the ark, and save the life of the weeping babe! Could he fly in the teeth of providence by relinquishing the high position so specially bestowed? Thus would flesh and blood reason. How often have I heard people excuse themselves for doing wrong by quoting what they call providence! Arguments from providence against positive commands are ingenious deceptions. Providence is of God, but the lesson which we draw from it may be of the devil. When Jonah wanted to flee to Tarshish he went down to Joppa, and found a ship going to Tarshish. How providential! Nothing of the sort. Whenever a man wants to do wrong he will find opportunities at hand; but let him not excuse his wickedness by the apparent opportunity for it. Be afraid of that kind of providence which makes sin easy. Our rule of life the commandment of the Lord, not the doubtful conclusions which may be drawn from providences.

Yet another argument may have met Moses, or it is one which I have heard repeated till I m sick of answering it. Moses could do a deal f good by retaining his position. What opportunities for usefulness would be in his way! See ow he could help his poor brethren! How often he could interpose at the court to prevent njustice! Moreover, what a bright light he ould be in his high position: his example ould commend the faith of the true God to the ourtiers and great ones; nobody could tell hat an influence would thus be exercised upn Egypt. Pharaoh himself might be convertd, and then all Egypt would bow before Jehoah. Thus have we met with brethren who say, Yes, I am in a church with which I do not gree; but then,

I can be Useful."

I know that a certain religious Union is fosteing evil; but then, I can serve the cause by taying in it." Another is carrying on an evil rade, but he says, "It is my livelihood; and esides, it affords me opportunities of doing ood!" This is one of the most specious of hose arguments by which good men are held n bonds of evil. As an argument, it is rotten o the core, We have no right to do wrong, rom any motive whatever.

But, dear friends, do you not think that Moses ight have made a compromise? That idea is ery popular. "Now, then, Moses, do not be oo strict! Some people are a deal too particuar. Those old-fashioned puritanical people re narrow and strait-laced: be liberal and ake broader views. Cannot you make a comromise? Tell Pharaoh's daughter you are an sraelite; but that, in consequence of her great indness, you will also be an Egyptian. Thus ou can become an Egypto-Israclite—what a ne blend! Or say an Israelito-Egyptian—with he better part in the front. You see, dear riends, it seems a simple way out of a difficulty, o hold with the hare and run with the hounds. t saves you from unpleasant decisions and seprations. Besides, Jack-of-both-sides has great raise from both parties for his large-heartedess. I admire this in Moses, that he ut first he refused to be called the son of Phaoh's daughter; and, secondly, he made a deberate choice rather "to suffer affliction with he people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures f sin for a season." My hearers, come out, I ray you, one way or the other. None of your rimming. It will go hard with trimmers at he last great day. When Christ comes to diide the sheep from the goats, there will be no iddle sort. There is no place for trimmers. Iodern thought is trying to make a purgatory, ut as yet the place is not constructed, and, eanwhile, you border people will be driven own to hell. May God grant us grace to be ecided!

Notice the lot which Moses chose. He refused o be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter, but e chose to take his portion with the oppressed, eproached, and ridiculed Israclites. I want you o see the terms in which his judgment is exressed; for no doubt the Holy Spirit tells us xactly how Moses put it in his own mind. He hose rather to suffer "affliction with the people f God." Does not that alter it wonderfully? Affliction" nobody would choose; but "afflicon with the people of God," ah, that is another usiness altogether. "Affliction with the pecle of God" is affliction in glorious company. was reading the other day the life of John hilpot, who was shut up n Fulham Palace. There he and his friends ng psalms so merrily that the Bishop chided em for their mirth. They could have quoted postolical authority for singing in prison. hen there were seven of them, Philpot wrote: I was carried to my Lord's coal-house again, here I, with my six fellow-prisoners, do thank od, as others do in their beds of down." To e with the people of God, one would not mind eing in the coal-hole. No one wants to be in Bonner's coal-hole; but better be there with the martyrs than up-stairs in the palace with the Bishop. "With the people of God"; that is the sweet which kills the bitter of affliction.

Now, notice what he said about the baits upon the other side: "Choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season." See! he calls the pleasures of the court "the pleasures of sin." Why, Moses, you need not fall into vice. You could be an Egyptian, and yet be chaste and honest and sober and just and good. Yes, but he regards his proposed life as the son of Pharaoh's daughter as full of "the pleasures of sin." Now, mark this: If you believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, it becomes your duty decidedly to come out and stand on His side; and if you do not do so, the pleasures derived from your sin of omission will be the pleasures of sin. You are living a life of disloyalty to Christ, and that is a life of sin. Then note the word, "For a season." Did you hear the tolling of a bell? It was a knell. It spoke of a new-made grave. This is the knell of earthly joy—"For a season!" Honored for doing wrong—"For a season!" Merry in evil company—"For a season!" Prosperous through a compromise—"For a season!" What after that season? Death and judgment.

III. I want, in the last place, to say that Moses Should be Imitated.

First, brethren we should have Moses' faith. The things which Moses believed are true; and therefore ought still to be believed. They are as important to-day as when he believed them; let us lay hold upon them, and feel their practical bearings this very morning. Young men especially, I entreat you to believe in God, and in His work of grace among His people, that you may be numbered with His chosen now, and in the day of His appearing.

Next, we must imitate Moses in this, that if we do believe we must come out on the Lord's side. Now that you have "come to years," do let it be seen on whose side you are. Let there be no doubt, no hesitation, no vacillation; but let those who see you in the house or in business know that you are on the Lord's side. Let me exhort you also to see things in the eternal light. Do not look at things in their bearings upon to-day, or to-morrow, or the next few years. Judge by eternity. For the present the good man may be a loser. You must look further than your foot. Take the measuring line of the sanctury, and use it when you judge of spiritual things.

Note another important matter: I pray that you may get into fellowship with Christ. Oh to know Christ and love Him, to have Him to be your Saviour, and then to feel that you can wear the reproach of Christ as a chain of gold! This is a great help in the life of a tried child of God. Dear friend, if you are a believer in Christ, give yourself up to God without reserve: say. "I will follow thee, my Lord, through flood or flame. I will follow thee up hill or down dale. I will follow wherever the Lord shall lead the way. I will follow at all cost and hazard." Say this in your soul.

If you do this, you cannot tell what God has in store for you, nor need you give it a consideration. Moses, after all, by his self-denial. He became King in Jeshurun, and was more than a monarch in the wilderness. He refused to be Pharaoh's son, but in the Book of Exodus God said to him; "See, I have made thee a god to Pharaoh." Egypt's haughty monarch feared his plagues, and entreated his intercession. The Lord made Moses so great, that among those who are born of woman he ranks among the first unto this day. Even in heaven he is remembered; for they sing "the song of Moses the servant of God and of the Lamb." Young man, if you give yourself unto the Lord, you can little guess what He will do with you. What you lose will be a mere trifle compared with what you will gain. As to honor, all honor and glory lie in the service of the Most High.

Was Not a Loser

I am come to this pass, my brethren—whether I sink or whether I swim, I am the Lord's! By His grace I will believe His word and cling to its inspiration, whether the Lord shall roll away my reproach or not. I would say with the three holy children, "Our God whom we serve is able to deliver us from the burning fiery furnace, and He will deliver us out of thine hand, O King. But if not, be it known unto thee, O King, that we will not serve thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up." With Job my heart has said: "Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him." Be this the resolve of each one, for Christ's sake. Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

A WISE MOTHER.*

THE boy was neither her pet nor slave; nor was he her prisoner. She allowed him all proper freedom; gave him opportunity for the exercise and development of his power of will and to have his way. While she compelled him to do things to which he was disinclined for the sake of submission to authority, she allowed him to do things he relished for the sake of his good ambition. While she plied the stimulus of command, even of the rod when necessary, she never failed to use the sugar of inducement with every unpalatable morsel of performance or endurance when she could. She endeavored so to connect good conduct with things relished, and evil things with things disrelished, that he would come to know that virtue and goodness always pay, and vice and badness never. But most of all she sought to fix in him those greatest and best of motives which in their measure are boundless, such as the fear of God, the love of virtue, the desire of happiness, and endless rewards. And this she did so well that his conscience came to such growth that, irrespective of all mere earthly considerations, he could commit no moral offence without feelings of remorse.

Helen's Pearls.

Helen opened the paper her mother gave her and read: To Helen Newton, from her mother. A birthday gift of pearls to be worn by her so long as she shall live: I. Be patient; II. Be truthful; III. Be dutiful and trustworthy; IV. Be kind to all; V. Control your temper; VI. Control your tongue; VII. Be happy by making others so.

Helen was silent, and a shade of soberness gathered on her features. Like most girls at her age, she was coming to prize things according to their cost as well as good appearance; and while not inclined to discontent, or to be unhappy in disappointments, she for a little was chilled in feeling by finding imaginary instead of real pearls before her.

"Well, dear, what do you think of ma's pearls?"

"Ma, I don't really know what to think. Tell me, please, how I'm to wear them." This was said in a way that indicated thoughts not specially pleasant in relation to her wearing her mother's gift.

"Would you be delighted, dear, if you could grow up to be a strong, influential, happy, and much-loved woman?"

"Indeed, I would, and, what is more, I mean to."

"Without trying?"

"Oh no! Of course I must try. But it's awful hard to be good, ma. Isn't it?'

"Yes, indeed. We need all the help we can obtain, and even then succeed but poorly at times. Now it is to assist you to such a life as you desire that mother presents you these pearls. You wish to know how to wear them. I will tell you, Practice, dear, everywhere, always practice them. If, at times, you seem to fail, still keep trying. Even though you think you are getting worse instead of better, still keep trying. Ask God to help you. Don't forget that. We are often sickest when nearest recovery, and often near glorious success when ready to despair. Keep trying, and the time will come when these pearls will be seen in your eyes, on your cheeks, on your lips, in your ways and manners. And these are the pearls none can steal, and which last and shine forever. Will you try to wear these, dear?"

"Yes, ma, I'll try."

Four years from that night, in the same room, at the same hour, on the same lounge, the two were again together. How the girl had grown! She was now sixteen, and advancing to womanhood. Many times, in those four years, her mother had despaired of success. "Either, she has forgotten the pearls," the mother thought; "or she has abandoned all effort to wear them." Hot temper, impatience, impulsiveness, had been among her faults, to which she sometimes yielded, with an abandonment that seemed to say, "There, I don't care! I'll try no more." Then again it was evident that her pearls were in her mind. Never had her mother alluded to them, or questioned her concerning her purposes. But now, when her sixteenth birthday had come, the pearls were where she had wished them to be, and shining more brightly than she dared to hope for.

DOROTHY'S CHARGE.

(See Illustration.)

It was a poor little cottage, old and weather-beaten, but its interior was scrupulously clean, and the garden around it was trimly and neatly kept. Dorothy Winter—or Widow Winter, as her neighbors called her—was not the woman to allow dirt or disorder to exist within her reach. She was a stout, motherly body, of middle age, poor, but with a heart large enough to help all who were in need around her. Money she could not give, but she was the first thought of in the village if sickness, death, or trouble of any kind, came upon a household. Her quiet, ready helpfulness had relieved many a burdened heart of the strain of attending to ordinary duties in a time of sorrow.

Dorothy need not have lived all alone in the poor old cottage. When her husband died, after two years of married life, and frequently since that time, Mr. Nicholls, her former employer, had urged her to return to the service she had quitted to be married. He had known her from boyhood, when, a young immigrant, she first landed in America, and came as a hired girl into his father's family. It was mainly through the blessing of God on her humble efforts, and her prayers, that he was led to look to Christ for salvation; and he often reminded her that he owed her a debt he could never repay. Dorothy, however, preferred to remain in her own home, and all Mr. Nicholls could do was to get her promise that, if she needed money, she would apply to him.

Some years had passed when, one day, to Dorothy's surprise, Mr. Nicholls paid her a visit. "I have come," he said, after he had satisfied her inquiries about his family, "to get help from you, Dorothy."

The good woman looked up in wonder. What help could she render to the wealthy merchant? She smiled in incredulity, but said: "I am sure if I can do anything to oblige you, sir, I shall be only too glad."

"I want you to take charge of a little girl, Dorothy, and see if you can do her any good. She is a particularly hard case; but, poor little thing! it is not all her own fault. Her father and mother have both gone wrong, and she seems bent on going the same sad road, if she is not stopped. Her father was a good hand; he was in my place, and was doing well till he got married. The foolish man lost his heart to a pretty face that belonged to a very bad woman. He began to deteriorate right away. She tempted him to all kinds of evil, and eventually he began stealing to gratify her demands. I forgave him three times, but at last I had to prosecute him, and he is now serving a term of imprisonment. His wretched wife has gone off somewhere, leaving their little daughter behind. I have tried to do something for her, but the child seems to have a taint in her blood. She is perverse, wild, and disobedient. I do not know if she can be saved from ruin, but if any one can do it, you can. I want you to see wh you can do. What do you say?"

"God helping me, I will try, sir," said Do othy. "There is nothing too hard for the Lor

The preliminaries were easily settled, a han some remuneration agreed upon, and next d Mr. Nicholls took the little girl down to the v lage where Dorothy lived. As they approach the cottage they saw Dorothy outside, broom hand, sweeping away the fallen leaves.

"This is Ellen Smartt, Mrs. Winter. She come to stay awhile with you," said Mr. Nic olls, his hand resting on the child's shoulder.

Dorothy perceived that this was a formal i troduction for the behoof of the little girl, wh stood somewhat sullenly, without raising h eyes to see the person to whom she was intr duced. Dorothy held out her hand to the litt girl in friendly fashion, saying, "You are we come, my dear; we shall be good friends, I hope

"You are a servant," said the child, glancin at the broom in Dorothy's hand. "I do n shake hands with servants."

Dorothy started as if a snake had stung h and held up her hand, which the child woul not take, as if overcome with amazement. Ev dently a difficult task was before her. "Wel my dear," she said, "never mind shaking hands but we will try to be friends for all that. W shall both be the happier if we do."

Mr. Nicholls looked on gloomily, still keepin his hand on Ellen's shoulder, but half regre ting, for his old friend's sake, that he had im posed the burden upon her instead of sendin the child to a public institution. Then he o fered his own hand to Dorothy, and gave hers hearty shake as a practical reproof to the child "You see what she is," he said, when, havin entered the humble cottage, Ellen had gone t make an exploration of the garden; "are yo still willing to keep her?"

"Oh, yes!" said the good woman, "that i only silly pride; very likely her poor misguide mother put that in her mind. God has melte many proud hearts before to-day. I trust in Him

"O woman, great is thy faith!" quoted Mr Nicholls, looking at her admiringly. "By a means keep it; you will have need of it all."

The good widow spent a long time in praye that night over the work she had undertaken She took her Bible and read passages from th tory of God's patience with srael in the wilderness, and neditated on the patience of Christ as exemplified in His life nd His dealings with His peo-le. Then again she prayed for he child, and before she retired o rest her heart was full of love nd pity for the poor little waif whose heart was prematurely lled with the evil that God aily bears with in children of arger growth.

Ellen would have been a worse hild than she was if she could ave resisted the love and gen-leness that Dorothy showed to-ard her. She melted day by ay under the benign influence, nd the good woman succeeded, hough not without some diffi-ulty, in getting her morning nd evening to offer a prayer to od, which was formal at first, ut under Dorothy's teaching on became sincere and earnest. o message or inquiry ever came om the erring mother, for hich Dorothy was thankful. he father wrote at first occa-onally, but after a time regular-and frequently. He was sin-erely penitent, and was glad learn that his child was eing cared for by a Christian oman.

It was less than a year after-ard that Mr. Nicholls paid an-ther visit to the cottage and itnessed the amazing change the child. "How on earth id you succeed?" he asked, in stonishment.

"I have not succeeded," said orothy simply. "It is the Lord's ork, and He knows how to eal with proud and stubborn hearts. Ah me! e have all given Him experience in that work."

A Street Scene in Alexandria, Egypt.

A STREET IN ALEXANDRIA.

(See Illustration.)

IN striking contrast with a street scene in one our western cities is that depicted in the ustration on this page. Its characteristics e those of Oriental life such as we read of in e Bible. In the foreground is the indispensa-e water-carrier bearing a skin filled with water. his is the Oriental "bottle," the mention of hich in Matt. 9: 17 has often puzzled readers familiar with eastern customs. The old and w "bottles," according to our understanding the word, would be of equal strength, and the w wine would be as secure in one as the her; but when the bottles are made of skins, e age of the receptacle is a matter which it is t safe to overlook. In the rear is a lady on ass out for an airing attended by her servant. er features are hidden by a veil which con-als all but her eyes. This custom prevails all rough the East, and is alluded to in Solomon's ng 4: 3 and 6: 7 (Rev. Ver.) "Thy temples e like a piece of pomegranate behind thy il." A woman in Oriental lands appearing in blic without this concealing veil would to is day be regarded as immodest. On the left, an elevation, are two of the traders of the y. Their establishments are of the simplest aracter. A few poles so arranged that a ece of matting can be spread over their heads the hottest part of the day are sufficient to m a store. They bring their wares in baskets d sit smoking while they wait for customers. The city of Alexandria, of which this street is art, is not the ancient city founded by Alex-der the Great, which was built on the main-id, but the more modern city, which is built on e ancient island of Pharos, now connected by isthmus to the continent. It has 212,000 abitants and is the second city of Egypt. Cairo, the capital, is 112 miles to the southeast of it. It is now in a somewhat dilapidated condition, the Government having as yet failed to repair the damages wrought by the bombardment of the British fleet in 1882, and the ravages of the troops of Arabi Pasha, who made desperate attempts to burn the city.

THE EPOCHS OF A LIFE.

By Rev. L. S. Keyser.

A Knightly Rescue.

THE next morning Hadley put on his exploration-suit, threw a book-bag over his shoulder, provided himself with pencil and note-book, preparatory to an excursion to the fields and woods.

This time he determined to explore the country west of the town. When he came to the railroad, he followed it northward a short distance, crossing the river that flowed near the town, by a narrow trestle-bridge. The bridge, which was an uncovered one, had no railing or walk for the convenience of foot-passengers. The ties extended about two feet beyond the iron rails on each side. Underneath there was a solid flooring of some kind, so that any one venturing across could not fall below into the river, if he kept between the rails.

"Rather a dangerous bridge to cross," thought Hadley, "especially if a train should come wheeling unexpectedly around the curve at the foot of yonder hill."

Having crossed the bridge he turned an oblique angle to the right, and clambered up the hill from the summit of which he could look down upon the broad valley which lay beneath, with the town nestling among the trees in the foreground and the well-cultivated farms stretching off in the distance toward the south and east. The young man drank in the glorious beauty of the autumnal scene, as he stood for a moment gazing upon it from his elevated position before continuing his walk through the woods in search of interesting specimens of the local fauna and flora. The silence and shade of the forest had a calming influence on Hadley's mind. Scarcely a feathered songster's note was to be heard; the "dim religious light," with the pensive rustling of the leaves in the breeze, produced a more tranquil feeling in the heart of the young man than he had felt for many a day. He was filled with an emotion that was almost worshipful. If it is true generally that "the universe takes its hue and tone and meaning from the inner experience and consciousness of the observer," it is also true that at times the aspect of the world around him exercises a potent influence upon his emotions, stirring him almost involuntarily to worship and reverence. It is difficult for any man, be he theist, atheist, or agnostic, to stand in the sanctuary-shadows of "God's first temples," and not feel that there is, or ought to be, a God.

Unfortunate indeed is the soul-condition of that man who cannot see the suggestions of deeper and diviner meaning in nature than those that appear upon the surface, who cannot see traces of the invisible in the visible. Unhappy, too, is the man whose doubts overwhelm him, who does not know, and yet who has sufficient spiritual earnestness to care to know. How tantalizing to him must be these limits of divinity in nature, that are constantly eluding him!

This was Hadley's mental condition, for what ever other faults may have clung to him, he was earnest. As he sat on a bowlder in the dim solitude of the forest, he seemed at times to hear the divine voice, and then it would again relapse into silence. By his speculations he had eliminated God from nature, and yet what would he not have given to be certain that there is a God! Without Him nature was only a blind force. There was no point upon which the mind could posit itself. There was no significance in all nature's mysterious beauty and mechanism; all her operations were devoid of purpose; her origin and destiny were shrouded in a mystery that appalled the mind. Evidences of design were all around him—in the veined leaves, in the solitary notes of a warbler in the distance — all things proclaimed the divine worker, and at times he felt that he was on the brink of a great discovery; then it would elude him, as the ignis fatuus eludes the bewildered traveller, and his mind was left dazed and blinded. Altering Huxley's agnostic paragraph to suit the trend of his thoughts, he said:

"If any man should tell me that there is a God, I should say to him, How do you know it? If he were to say to me, There is no God, I would still be compelled to repeat the question, How do you know that? I seem to be," he continued, "surrounded by an all-pervasive personal Presence. But I cannot grasp it. The proof is not absolute. It is shut off from me by an opaque veil of mystery. I cannot deny the existence of a personal Creator, neither can I assert it. Yes, Herbert Spencer is right in maintaining that what is beyond the cognition of our senses is unknown and unknowable. I am an agnostic, and must acknowledge my ignorance. Yet it would be a satisfaction to have certainty. It would give some stay to the soul —if there is such an entity. What are those lines I read from Tennyson's 'In Memorian' the other day?

'So runs my dream: but what am I?
An infant crying in the night:
An infant crying for the light:
And with no language but a cry.'"

Not a very satisfying doctrine, even to the young Pyrrhonist himself. His agnosticism diminished his enjoyment of nature. Could he have felt a spiritual contact between his soul and the Over-soul, in such a way that there would have been an assurance of personal communion, the world around him would have worn a different aspect. Pity he could not say with the poet:

"Father, thy hand
Hath reared these venerable columns; thou
Didst weave this verdant roof."

Or with the Psalmist:

"In His hand are the deep places of the earth; the strength of the hills is His also. The sea is His and He made it; and His hands formed the dry land. O come, let us worship and bow down: let us kneel before our Lord and Maker."

So pre-occupied was Hadley's mind with these speculations that a little brown-creeper flitted about among the twigs and leaves directly above him, and yet bird-lover as he was, he did not notice it. Presently he brought himself back to consciousness by a vigorous gesture of impatience, which frightened the little bird to a more distant twig. The fluttering feathered form attracted his attention, and he was once more on the alert. With excited pleasure he watched the bird for awhile, and then he renewed his explorations. As long as he occupied himself in active observations of nature, he was conscious of a spring, an exhilaration, of all his energies. It was only when he got into the speculative mood that the mysteries of life and nature oppressed him and filled him with disquietude.

When the noon hour came, he found a spring of clear, cold water, gushing from the foot of a steep, rocky bluff by the bank of the river, and here he sat down to eat the lunch with which he had provided himself. His walk had been so long and vigorous that he ate with hearty relish, and could not remember when he had enjoyed a repast so much; the spot was so sequestered and the rippling of the fountain mingled so melodiously with the wash of the river.

"Why, I could almost love my worst enemy," he exclaimed, springing to his feet. "No one can commune with nature in her calm, pensive moods without becoming a better man. I wonder whether, in spite of all the dogmatism of the theologians to the contrary, nature has not in herself the power to regenerate humanity. It is impossible for me to hate even that despicable divinity student with the rancor I felt toward him last night."

Yes; because nature is the handiwork of God, she possesses some of the morally renewing potencies that belong to her Creator.

On his return late in the afternoon, after he had made an extended tour, he at last stood upon the brow of the hill from which he had viewed the town and valley in the morning. The oblique rays of the western sun wrapped the whole scene in a mellow glow. Unless he cared to walk a mile and a half out of his way to the carriage-road, it was necessary for him to cross the river where he had crossed it earlier in the day. His limbs were tired, and he concluded to follow the more direct route across the bridge.

As Hadley sauntered down the hill, his attention was caught by the figure of a woman moving leisurely along the railway not far from the river and toward it. He stopped in surprise. He could not be mistaken. That lithesome form and graceful carriage would have been recognized by him at a greater distance. It was Miss Winters. His pulses bounded in him, and he involuntarily quickened his pace.

What object had the girl in view in coming to this out-of-the-way place? Ah! it was easy to conjecture. She had a bunch of wild-flowers in her hand and a book under her arm. Evidently she, too, was a lover of nature and outdoor life, and had found a quiet place in which to read, and analyze the flowers which she had gathered.

It was with some misgiving that he saw her start across the bridge. She hesitated a moment before she set her foot upon it; but it was evident that many people crossed it afoot, and of course, it was safe as long as there were no trains, for the ties were close together and, as has been said, the solid flooring underneath made it impossible for the pedestrian to fall through into the stream. The girl seemed to have little fear, although she selected her steps carefully upon the wooden ties.

When Hadley had reached the end of the bridge, she was almost half way across it. He had taken but a few steps upon the structure, when he heard a sound that froze the blood in his veins to cords of ice and almost paralyzed him. It was the whistle of the fast express train as it swept around the curve at the foot of the hill only a short distance away. With quick intuition he saw that he could easily make his escape by springing back from the bridge before the train came up; but as the girl was now just at the centre of the long span, it would probably be impossible for her to reach the other end before she was overtaken by the swiftly rushing engine. It was a moment of terrible suspense. The whistle of the locomotive had attracted the girl's attention, causing her to turn quickly and look back. In a moment she realized the danger. Hadley saw that her face turned white with terror, and for a moment she lost her power of movement. Then she started to run.

Meanwhile the engineer of the train had taken in the appalling situation. A quick succession of piercing sounds from the engine rent the air, and the brakes were immediately put on. But Hadley feared that it would be impossible to stop the train in so short a distance. For a moment he stood undecided, looking alternately at the approaching train and at the moving figure of the girl. But alas! her rapid pace prevented her now from choosing her steps carefully, so that her foot slipped between two of the ties, and she fell. "She is lost!" he cried.

Could he save his own life and allow the girl to perish? Could he rescue her if he tried? If she were beyond the power of human help, why should he throw away his own life in a futile effort to rescue her? These questions flashed with more than telegraphic speed through his mind. Suddenly, like an intuition, a plan by which he might save her, if he could reach her in time, came to him. It would involve a great risk, but he had no time for mental debate. His decision was made.

Then the terrified spectators on the engine saw the young man start forward and run with almost superhuman speed towards the prostrate woman's form. When Hadley reached Miss Winters, he found that she had just wrenched her foot loose from its fastening. As he rushed to her, she glanced up at him with an appealing look, but said not a word.

"Miss Winters, I will save you if I can," said he. "You must submit entirely to me."

Bending down, he lifted her outside of the track and laid her down near the ends of the cross-ties, parallel with the rails.

"Lie down here," he said, authoritatively, "and cling to the ties for your life."

She could not be injured if she remained in that position. He had just succeeded in securing her safety when the train came bearing down almost upon him. He made a quick leap to the ties that hung over the river in mid-air. The swaying motion of the bridge, and the too great momentum with which he had projected himself forward, caused him to lose his equipoise and he swayed outward a moment, and then seeing that he could not regain his balance, he allowed himself to drop from the bridge into the stream nearly twenty feet below.

Miss Winters saw him fall, and in her terror she relaxed her hold upon the ties. The oscillating movement of the bridge caused her to sway outward, and the next moment she too rolled off into the stream below, near her brave rescuer.

Once when Hadley was a lad, he and some of his playmates were bathing in a creek near his country home. By some mishap he got beyond his depth, and would have been drowned had not some of his more dexterous associates swam to him, and piloted him safely to shore. As soon as he had recovered his presence of mind, he formed a resolution to learn to swim, not knowing when a certain amount of aquatic ability would be necessary for the preservation of his life. Having carried out his resolve, he had become a dexterous swimmer.

It was to this acquired skill that he owed his safety and that of Miss Winters when they fell from the trestle-bridge into the river; for there was abundant scope for his dexterity just then. Fortunately both of them had struck the water in a vertical position, so that the harshness of their fall was broken. Divesting himself of coat and boots Hadley swam to the unfortunate girl, who had by this time sunk once, and was just coming again to the surface; and seizing her firmly, he instructed her not to throw her arms about him so as to impede his movements, and then struck out bravely for the shore, allowing the current to bear him and his charge down the stream below the bridge. With admirable presence of mind, the girl permitted him to pilot her through the deep water. In a few minutes he had reached shallow water, and by the time the frightened train-men had stopped the train, and had come to the river-bank, he and his dripping protégée were wading toward the shore.

Miss Winters did not faint or fall helplessly into any one's arms when she was at last deposited on terra firma. The only evidence of perturbation was her preternaturally pale face. Her seeming composure contrasted strangely with the terrible experience through which she had just passed. With a faint smile she said to Hadley before the wondering passengers who had hastened to the scene:

"Mr. Madelling, you are a real hero! You have saved my life, at the risk of your own. I have not words to thank you as I ought, but I shall never forget how much I owe you."

"Do not speak of it," said Hadley, bowing and blushing like a girl. "I am thankful I happened to be near enough to see your danger in time to save you. It was quite a chance that any one was there, and I am glad the opportunity of rendering you a service fell to my lot."

"I thank God," said Miss Winters. "that in the moment of peril, the man who did see me was a man so brave as to think less of his own danger than of mine. If you had not come when you did I must have been killed." The color mounted to her cheeks as she looked gratefully and admiringly at her preserver, who simply took the hand she held out to him, and grasped it fervently, without making any reply.

Of course the railroad men and passengers who had gathered around, were loud in praise of Hadley's feat, and eager in their offers of help. A coat and hat were thrust upon him, and a lady insisted on Miss Winters accepting a hat in place of the one now floating down the river. A countryman who had been drawn to the scene by the standing train and the unusual commotion, was despatched to get a carriage, on the arrival of which Hadley and Miss Winters were driven to their homes.

"I hope we shall be friends, Mr. Madelling," said Miss Winters, as they approached her destination; "it was a strange introduction, but I am not likely, for my part, ever to forget it."

"You make too much of it, Miss Winters. Any man in my place, worthy the name of man, would have done as I did. In offering me your friendship, you make me feel that I am much overpaid. Believe me, it is a privilege I value very highly. Good-bye," Hadley said, as he saw Miss Winters safe in her room: "I trust you will suffer no ill effects from your immersion." Then, re-entering the carriage, he was driven to his own rooms, where he had to give minute explanations to Dane of his drenched condition.

"AND I heard a great voice out of heaven, aying Behold, the tabernacle of God is with nen, and He will dwell with them, and they hall be His people, and God Himself shall be vith them, and be their God." (Rev. 21 : 3.) The tabernacle was to be God's witness that He welt with His people; that He was not like he false Gods of the heathen—afar off. Some eople treat God simply as a referee to be called pon in extreme and unusual emergencies; but hese do not really know Him at all. Others, nd they are God's children, rejoice in His presnce sometimes; but at others they would rather eep Him at a distance. But those who live in ommunion with God dwell in God and God in iem. Each child of God may be a little tabernacle with its outer court of the body, its holy lace of the soul, and its Holy of holies in the pirit where God is specially manifest. "What, now ye not that your temple is the temple of he Holy Ghost, which is in you?" (1 Cor. 6 : 19.) : is in hat we find the altar of burnt offering, "before ic door of the tabernacle," for if the body is ot presented "a living sacrifice, holy, acceptble to God, which is our reasonable service" Rom. 12 : 1), we cannot become the dwelling-lace of God. On the altar of burnt offering the wards of the sin offering were also offered in ie outer court, where Jews and Gentiles alike ad access. God wills that our bodies should e a witness that sin is put away and atoned for. he open countenance which says, "There is herefore now no condemnation to them which e in Christ Jesus." (Rom. 8 : 1.) The new song thanksgiving to our God (Ps. 40 : 3), the unesitating step and erect gait of one who has ist his burden upon the Lord, the healing of ie body as well as the soul with His stripes—l this is in the outer court of the tabernacle, hich answers to the body.

Again, we find the laver in the outer court. he priests must be cleansed there before they n enter into the holy place. "Thou shalt set laver between the tent and the altar of burnt fering." It is in the outer court that greedi-ss, laziness, self-indulgence, etc., are cleansed. nd then within the holy place there stands e table with "the bread of thy God, the ndlestick, for "Ye are the light of the world" Matt. 5 : 14), and the altar of incense continual mmunion—all signifying intercourse with od. But within, beyond the veil, there was e ark and the mercy-seat with the glorious ckinath; God filling the Holy of holies with imself, represented by the candlestick in the ly place which yet no eye but that of a priest ight see, and approached by the blood upon e altar, the witness to a whole world that sin is atoned for.

But while the tabernacle is a type of our dies, it is before all things a type of the urch of Christ, the many in one. "For as we ve many members in one body, and all mems have not the same office, so we, being any, are

d every one members one of another. (Rom. 12 : 4–5.) God ordained that the tabernacle should be moveable, easily erected, and easily taken down, but the parts made so perfectly to fit one into the other that one board, one socket, one pin, one hook, one fillet, one tache, one ring wanting, and it would be imperfect. God would have us not only to fit into Him, but into one another, so that if one member suffer, all the members suffer. (1 Cor. 12 : 26). In the erection of the tabernacle, there were parts which formed the frame-work, such as the pillars and boards; there were others, and few of them, which were seen from without, such as the curtains, which were four thicknesses. Many a child of God wants to do some great thing, or to be some great one, prominent before the eyes of all men. Yet only one of the curtains was seen from without, and that the roughest one, of badgers' skins. At the door of the tabernacle, a little part of the other curtains might be seen, but the innermost were for the eye of God and His priests alone. "The King's daughter is all glorious within." (Ps. 45 : 13.) Some would willingly be like pillars, but while these were comparatively few in number, the smaller parts were very, very numerous. The pillars and the board were only overlaid with gold, while the sockets, the pins, the rings, the taches, the hooks, and all the little parts which went to make up the unity of the whole were of gold, silver, or brass, which would stand wear or fire, as the overlaid boards and pillars could not. Let us be content, however small our place is, so that we are ministering to the unity of the Church of Christ.

The people were so happy in the giving of their free-will offerings and their free-will service, that they continued to bring offerings every morning, until there was "much more than enough for the service of the work which the Lord commanded to make," and Moses was obliged

To Restrain the People from Bringing!

Bezaleel joined the parts together, and "it became one tabernacle," just as in the Church of Christ there is "one Lord, one faith, one baptism"; and it is our privilege and duty to "keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace." (Eph. 4 : 3–5.)

On the first day of the first month, Moses was commanded to erect and furnish the tabernacle. "Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness." (Matt. 6 : 33.) Moses did not seek to improve upon the pattern which God had shewn him; he followed out the plan of God. The ark was placed within the Holy of holies, and covered in with the veil. Then there was the table garnished with the shew-bread, in token that we have the privilege to minister to God, and the candlestick placed and lit—type of Christ as the Bread of Life and the Light of the world. And then came the golden altar with its smoke ascending before the veil—a type of Christ's constant intercession for us. The altar of burnt offering and the laver were set up in the outer court, and there Moses took the anointing oil. God had commanded that none should be made like it: "Upon man's flesh it shall not be poured; neither shall ye make any other like it, after the composition of it; it is holy, and it shall be holy unto you." (Ex. 30 : 32.) As a type of God the Holy Ghost, the anointing oil was most holy, and everything which had been made by man must be anointed with it in order that the tabernacle might be the dwelling-place of God, "Thou shalt take the anointing oil, and anoint the tabernacle and all that is therein, and shalt hallow it and all the vessels thereof: and it shall be holy." The altar and its vessels, and the laver too, must be sanctified, or set apart, for God by the holy anointing oil. No ceremony, no sacrament, no worship, can be accepted by God except it is anointed by the Holy Ghost. "God is a Spirit, and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth." (Rom. 4 : 24.) Then Aaron and his sons must be anointed: first washed, then clothed with holy garments, then anointed. Jesus, our great High priest, being baptized, and praying, the heaven was opened, and the Holy Ghost descended in a bodily shape, like a dove upon Him." (Luke 3 : 21, 22).

He as Man was Anointed.

When the anointing oil was poured upon Aaron he bore upon his shoulder the signets of onyx stones, graven with the names of the children of Israel, and on his heart he bore the breastplate engraven with the same names. No man saw on the breast of Jesus those precious stones and names engraven, but most surely He bears our names upon His heart, and the government of every one who trusts Him is surely placed upon His shoulders. But Aaron's sons must also be anointed. "He shall see his seed." (Isa. 53 : 10.) As Adam begat a son after his likeness, so Christ has a seed after His likeness: "He made us to be a kingdom, priests with His God and Father. (Rev. 5 : 6, R. V.) Moses was commanded, "Thou shalt anoint them as thou didst anoint their father, that they may minister unto Me in the priests' office; for their anointing shall surely be an everlasting priesthood throughout their generations." "Thus did Moses, according to all that the Lord commanded him, so did he." Seven times in this chapter it is said that Moses did "as the Lord commanded Moses." It was no hard task to him to carry out the mind of God; it was perfect joy and delight; it was the way of wisdom, whose "ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace." (Pro. 3 : 17.) "So Moses finished the work." But the chief thing of all had yet to happen. The tabernacle was made, set up, joined together, a glorious type of perfect unity; it was sanctified, but it was yet empty. "Then a cloud covered the tent of the congregation, and the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle." It was the supreme moment—

God had Taken Possession.

Moses was no longer busily going in and out; his work was done, and he stood outside. "Moses was not able to enter into the tent of the congregation, because the cloud abode thereon, and the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle." O how many there are who make every provision for a life consecrated to God! they anxiously seek to know His will, and just as earnestly accomplish it when it is known; they offer themselves, with all they are and have, to God; but because they do not go outside, and leave to God what they have given to Him, the cloud of glory does not fill them. Self, with all its energy and zeal, with all its anxiety and care, with all its fear and unrest, must give place before an indwelling God. Self must be without for God to be within. "I want," "I think," "I hope," "I feel," "I can," "I can't," and all the other "I's" have to go outside, that what God wants, what He thinks and plans and purposes, may take the place of self. When God came in He took the entire responsibility; Moses had not the management; God took it all. "When the cloud was taken up from over the tabernacle, the children of Israel went onward in all their journeys; but if the cloud were not taken up, then they journeyed not till the day that it was taken up." "For the cloud of the Lord was upon the tabernacle by day, and fire was on it by night, in the sight of all the house of Israel, throughout all their journeys." God dwelt with them.

"I have learned in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content."—PHIL. IV; 11.

HAVE I learned, in whatsoever
State, to be content?
Have I learned this blessed lesson,
By my Master sent,—
And with joyous acquiescence
Do I greet His will,
Even when my own is thwarted,
And my hands lie still?

Surely it is best and sweetest,
Thus to have Him choose,
Even though some work I've taken,
By this choice I lose.
Folded hands need not be idle,—
Fold them but in prayer,
Other souls may toil far better
For God's answer there.

They that reap receive their wages,
Those who work, their crown,
Those who pray, throughout the ages
Bring blest answers down:
In "whatever state" abiding
Till the Master call,
They at eventide will find Him
Glorified in all.

What though I can do so little
For my Lord and King,
At His feet I sit and listen,
At His feet I sing.
And whatever my condition,
All in love is meant;
Sing, my soul, thy recognition!
Sing, and be content!

Christian Work in Mexico.

Through the reading of the Holy Scriptures translated into Spanish some earnest souls in Mexico have, by God's blessing, been led to a clear knowledge of the Gospel. From their numbers able preachers of the Christian faith in its primitive purity have been raised up, around whom congregations have been gathered from among the humble poor, who have been the first to publicly welcome and defend the pure Gospel in Mexico. The members of these congregations, rich in faith, have worked earnestly and bravely for Christ and His truth among their fellow countrymen in that beautiful Southern portion of North America called Mexico. Schools have been established by them, in which large numbers of bright boys and girls have received a good secular education and have been carefully taught the Christian faith. From the children thus educated faithful Christian workers have been raised up. A Mexican Branch of the Church of Christ, that maintains the faith in its purity and integrity, has been organized among these native Christians in the Republic of Mexico. The members of this Mexican Church of Christ, though gathered mostly from among the poor, are yet doing a most important Christian work. To continue that work, we need to pay a few leading workers small monthly salaries, and also to defray some current expenses. To raise the needed funds we have formed a society with an office at 43 Bible House, New York, U. S., and should be pleased to have many of our fellow Christians join this society by becoming regular contributors to its treasury. We are trying to secure monthly or quarterly contributions to meet the regular monthly expenses of the work. In order to continue and extend the work, we wish to raise four hundred dollars a month, by endeavoring to have four hundred persons each give on an average one dollar every month to this object, leaving the donors to give less or more as they may be able and willing.

We earnestly invite all who will, to join us in this systematic effort in behalf of the cause of Christ in Mexico, by becoming monthly subscribers to this fund. We have already regular subscribers whose gifts amount monthly to over eighty dollars, and a growing circle of friends who are forwarding us occasional donations.

This Mexican Church of Christ is a very effective instrumentality through which to do Christian work among the many millions on this Western Hemisphere who speak the Spanish language, comparatively few of whom have ever had a Bible in their hands. A beautiful church building has been secured in the City of Mexico as the centre of the activities of this Mexican Church of Christ. Through the workers connected with that centre more than forty congregations have been gathered from among the poor in different parts of the Republic of Mexico. We have some faithful and able preachers now in the field, but more young men need to be trained for the ministry. Multitudes of Protestant children in Mexico, some of them orphans, need to be educated. We make three requests of you, Christian reader: first, that you will, if possible, become a monthly or quarterly subscriber in behalf of this Christian work; second, that you will try and induce your friends also to contribute to it; third, that you will remember this precious work in Mexico in your prayers.

We most sincerely thank all who are already generously contributing to this Christian work for their timely and generous gifts, and we earnestly invite many others, to unite with us in aiding it by also becoming monthly subscribers in its behalf. Those who may not feel that they can give as much as a dollar a month are earnestly asked to give what they can, whenever they are able—EVERY LITTLE HELPS. Fellow Christian, if you will generously consent to contribute a dollar a month or more or less to the work, will you kindly inform me of the fact? Contributions either large or small can be mailed directly to my address as follows:

THE RIVAL CANDIDATES FOR THE PRESIDENCY—THE WHITE HOUSE.

THE RIVAL CANDIDATES.

THE great quadrennial struggle between the two political parties for the control of the Government is this time to be waged on questions of principle and policy rather than on personal qualities. That is a decided advantage to the country. The bitter personalities which characterized the campaign of 1884 will never be forgotten, and the social dissension and ill-feeling they evoked have not even yet been allayed. Campaign speakers devoted their eloquence to the denunciation or the defence of the moral character of the candidates, and to a discussion of scandals which were an offence to the public ear. This year there is reason to hope that the speeches will be of a higher order. The voters will have to be instructed. What they need to know in order to make an intelligent decision between the rival candidates is the effect of an economic principle. On the one side is the Republican candidate, who holds that our national prosperity demands for its maintenance and development, that goods imported from foreign countries shall pay certain duties, with the avowed object of raising their price in order that producers of the same articles at home may not be undersold in our own markets by foreign producers who pay low wages. On the other side the Democratic candidate contends that the duties should be abolished in some cases, and lowered in others, in order that the masses of the people may purchase their goods at the lowest price attainable.

That these two platforms open a very wide field for discussion is evident. They affect the interests not only of manufacturers and producers, but of wage-earners and tradesmen, and it will become every citizen to study them carefully before casting his vote. At this crisis his affiliation with his party will be of less importance to him than the right settlement of this question of national policy. A discussion of this momentous question would be out of place in these columns; but from the campaign documents of the rival parties, and from the speeches of the rival statesmen, abundant opportunities will be afforded for gaining information on the subject.

The fact that this struggle will during the next three months be the all-absorbing subject of interest throughout the nation is not to be ignored. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, therefore, in conformity with its usual custom of dealing with live topics, this week presents its readers with portraits and brief sketches of the lives of the rival candidates. This is done without political bias, and with less apprehension of invidious construction than there would have been had the personality of the men been a more prominent feature of the campaign.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND.

GROVER CLEVELAND, the Democratic candidate for the Presidency, was born at Caldwell, N. J., on March 18, 1837. He is, therefore now in his fifty-second year. His great-grandfather, Aaron Cleveland, who was a native of Norwich, Conn., was, in 1779, a member of the Legislature. He afterward became a Congregational minister, and died at New Haven in 1815. Richard Cleveland, the father of Grover Cleveland, was born in Norwich in 1804, and was a graduate of Yale College. He taught school in Baltimore, studied theology, spent some months at Princeton, and in 1828 was ordained a Presbyterian clergyman. Grover Cleveland, who was the fifth of nine children, was educated at the public schools of New Jersey, and at an academy in Clinton, Oneida County, N. Y.

At the age of sixteen he became a clerk in the New York Blind Asylum. There he happened to meet a young man who prevailed upon him to seek his fortunes in the West. They started for Cleveland, O. On their way they stopped at Buffalo, N. Y., where young Cleveland paid his respects to his uncle, Mr. Lewis F. Allen. This gentleman was very favorably impressed with the young man, whom he then saw for the first time. As much to dissuade his nephew from the western venture as anything, Mr. Allen told him that he was in need of a clerk, and if he would stop in Buffalo, he should have the situation. The offer was accepted; but after a short time the young man persuaded his uncle to let him study law, and consent was given. He was articled to a law firm in Buffalo, and served them so much to their satisfaction, that they voluntarily paid him a handsome salary. In 1859 Mr. Cleveland was Admitted to the Bar.

He continued, however, with his employers for four years afterward. He was then appointed Assistant District Attorney for the county of Erie, which position he filled for a period of three years. He was nominated by the Democratic County Convention, in 1865, for District Attorney, to succeed Mr. Torrance, but was defeated at the polls by Lyman K. Bass. Mr. Cleveland then formed a law partnership with the late I. V. Vanderpoel, on the 1st of August, 1866, which was continued until January, 1869. He then became a member of the firm of Laning, Cleveland & Folsom, the late A. P. Laning and the late Oscar Folsom—whose daughter he married on June 2, 1886—being his associates. The firm remained in existence until Mr. Cleveland retired therefrom to assume the duties of Sheriff of Erie County, to which office he was chosen at the election in November, 1870. At the expiration of his official term as sheriff, he became a member of the firm of Messrs. Bass, Cleveland & Bissell, with Lyman K. Bass and Wilson S. Bissell as associates. From this Mr. Bass soon retired, owing to ill-health, and the firm became Cleveland & Bissell. In 1881 Mr. Cleveland was elected by an unprecedented majority, running five thousand ahead of his own ticket! The following year he was nominated for the governorship of New York, The disaffection between the stalwart and half-breed sections of the Republican party was then at fever heat, and this election afforded an opportunity for the gratification of revengeful feelings that had been smouldering for some time. Many Republicans voted for the Democratic candidate, and he was elected by the large majority of 192,854.

Mayor of Buffalo

The Presidency.

Two years later came the Presidential election. The nomination by the Republican Convention of Mr. James G. Blaine was made with the knowledge that it was distasteful to certain Republican leaders; but so strong was the candidate and so enthusiastic were his friends, that it was believed that the opposition to him would be counterbalanced. That conviction very nearly came true—but not quite. Mr. Cleveland did not carry New York by the former enormous majority in 1884, but he did carry it, and it gave him the Presidency. During his administration some of his fiercest opponents have been men of his own party, but there can be no question that in the main the party has been satisfied with him, for his renomination on June 7 last by the Democratic National Convention was made with an enthusiasm and a unanimity almost unprecedented in political history.

GEN. BENJAMIN HARRISON

THE Republican candidate for the Presidency was born at North Bend, Ohio, August 20, 1833, and is therefore fifty-five years of age. Among his ancestors, one especially gained distinction in history. He was hanged for the part he took in helping to deliver Great Britain from the tyranny of King Charles I. In the well known diary of Samuel Pepys, the following passage occurs, under date of October 13, 1660: "I went out to Charing Cross to see Major-General Harrison hanged, drawn and quartered, which was done there; he looked as cheerful as any man could do in that condition. He was presently cut down, and his head and heart shown to the people, at which there was great shouts of joy. It is said that he said that he was sure to come shortly at the right hand of Christ to judge them that now had judged him, and that his wife do expect his coming again. Thus it was my chance to see the King beheaded at Whitehall, and to see the first blood shed in revenge for the King at Charing Cross." General Harrison had signed the warrant for the execution of Charles I., and had been appointed by Oliver Cromwell, to convey the captive king from Windsor to Whitehall, for trial. When, therefore, Charles II. came to the throne, and began to take vengeance for his father's death, Harrison was not overlooked. He died a martyr to his country. The descendants of the patriot of the Commonwealth came to America soon after the hanging at Charing Cross, but the family did not come prominently into view until just before the Revolutionary War.

His Family.

Benjamin Harrison, of Virginia, the great-grand-father of the candidate, was one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, and was prominent in public affairs from 1774 until his death in 1791, being for four years a member of Congress and three times Governor of Virginia. General William Henry Harrison, his son, served his country almost continuously from 1791 to 1841, both in military and civil positions. He fought the battle of Tippecanoe in 1811, was a member of Congress, a United States Senator from Ohio, and for one month (March 4 to April 4, 1841, when he died), President of the United States. His son, John Scott Harrison, who was a member of Congress from 1853 to 1857, died in 1879 or 1880, at his home in Cincinnati.

The youth of the candidate was a studious one. He acquired the rudiments of education at home, and then went to a private school at Cincinnati to be prepared for college. In 1852 he graduated from Miami University, Oxford, Ohio, fourth in a class of sixteen. He immediately commenced the study of law in the office of Judge Storer. The next year he married the daughter of Rev. J. W. Scott, of Oxford, O., and with the small sum of $1,000, part of which was a legacy from an aunt and part given him by his father, commenced married life at twenty years of age. He shortly afterward removed to Indianapolis, where his painstaking labor soon won him a fair Practice at the Bar.

A remarkable murder case was left unexpectedly on Harrison's hands about a year after his admission to the bar. The prosecuting attorney was called away, and Harrison had to take charge of the case with only one night for preparation. It was a case of poisoning, and he sat up all night with a physician studying the nature of poisons. The next day his speech showed so complete a command of the subject that he won the case, and Mr. Wallace, the counsel opposed to him, offered him a partnership. This firm continued business until 1860, when Wallace became clerk of the Circuit Court, and Harrison Supreme Court Reporter. It was in that year that Harrison first became prominent in politics. Thomas A. Hendricks was stumping for the Democratic nominee in the Presidential election of 1860, and his friends challenged Harrison to a debate with him. Harrison accepted, and Hendrick's friends exclaimed: "What a headlong fool the young man must be!" But the story goes, that Hendricks was worsted in the battle of logic and appeal, and that the Chairman of the meeting remarked: "I never heard a man skin an opponent as quickly as Ben Harrison did Hendricks that day."

On the Outbreak of the War

Mr. Harrison, at the suggestion of Gov. Morton, recruited a regiment, and, after being a second lieutenant and then captain, he was made colonel of the seventeenth Indiana. After garrison duty in Kentucky and Tennessee, he went into the thick of the fight, and at the battle of Resaca, May 15. 1864, he led the assault, rushed at head of his regiment over to the enemy's lines, and captured both men and guns. For his charge at Resaca he was brevetted brigadier-general. Again, at Peach Tree Creek he was publicly complimented for his bravery.

He continued to do gallant work in the field, and served till the end of the war.

After the war General Harrison was re-elected Supreme Court Reporter, and served till 1868 Then he gave himself up to the law altogether for eight years. He kept out of politics until 1876, when Godlove Orth, the nominee for Governor, having declined the honor, Harrison took it. He made a hot contest, but he was beaten. In 1880 he was rewarded for his services to his party by being elected United States Senator.

At once he went to the front in that body as a forcible debater. He also took a prominent share in the labors of the Committee on Foreign Relations. In 1887, the Indiana Legislature was Democratic, and Gen. Harrison lost the opportunity of being his own successor. He then retired to private life in Indianapolis.

Gen. Harrison is not an orator in the popular sense of the word, but he is a very forcible speaker. His voice is somewhat shrill, but not unpleasant, and his enunciation is so clear that he is easily understood. In stature, he is under the average size. A massive head, short neck, broad shoulders, rather robust chest, and short legs, make him a noticeable man. He is an active member of the Presbyterian Church, and for several years conducted a Bible-class in the Sunday School.

THE WHITE HOUSE.

THE Executive Mansion is on the west side of the city of Washington, and is one mile and a half from the Capitol. It is two stories high, 170 feet long, and 86 feet deep, with a portico on the north supported on eight Ionic columns, and a semicircular colonnade on the south of six Ionic columns. It is of free-stone, and is painted white, from which circumstance it is popularly known as the "White House." The corner-stone was laid in 1792, and the edifice was occupied by President Adams in 1800. It was burned by the British in 1814. In 1815 Congress authorised its restoration, and it was again occupied in 1818. The grounds lie between Fifteenth and Seventeenth Streets, and extend to the Potomac, comprising about 75 acres, of which about 20 are enclosed as the President's private grounds, are handsomely laid out, and contain a fountain.

The mansion is furnished with the magnificence becoming the abode provided by the people for the Chief Executive. The numerous suites of rooms are handsomely decorated, and, in many cases, beautifully frescoed, while oil paintings of great rarity and value adorn the walls. The President and his family occupy the western wing, while the eastern side is mainly devoted to reception rooms and offices, the Great East Room being the principal saloon where the President holds his great receptions. The other saloons are called the Green, Blue, and Red Rooms, after the color of their furniture and fittings.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Janet's Melancholy Cured.—Mr. Davison, speaking at a revival meeting, said: "On one occasion I was asked to visit an aged woman, who, though a Christian, was a joyless one, and apparently always sunk in the depths of melancholy, unable to find in Christ that precious sense of satisfaction for which every believer yearns. I called upon her and read to her that verse, 'This is My beloved Son in whom I am well pleased.' 'Now,' I said, 'you see that God is well pleased with Christ; is He not sufficient to satisfy you?' Janet looked up with tears in her dim eyes and, clasping her hands, said, 'Yes, from this hour I shall rest satisfied with Christ.' Her melancholy is now a thing of the past, and she looks the picture of contentment."

The Midnight Letter.—An Evangelist Remarks: "I had a very peculiar experience not long ago. Upon retiring to bed one night, though tired, I was unable to sleep, and at last, yielding to an unaccountable and irresistible influence at midnight, I arose, and taking out a sheet of paper, proceeded to write to a friend these words, 'Where, oh where will you spend eternity?' I addressed the letter and laid it aside, and going again to bed soon fell fast asleep, the uneasiness being now entirely removed. I mailed the letter the first thing next morning, and I learned soon afterwards that my friend received it just twenty minutes before he died and was ushered into eternity. Whether he had taken heed to that momentous question I know not for certain, but I believe he did: but it was most assuredly a very special call."

Cause of a Mother's Anxiety.—A Friend relates: "A lady residing in the country, and whose son was about to begin business in a great northern city, visited her clergyman and asked him to pray for her boy, that God might keep him and preserve him from the power of temptation. 'I am not afraid of his falling into sin,' said the lady, 'but what I fear is his getting into a circle of Christians who drink wine.' Christians and wine drinkers? Does it not seem as if there were a contradiction in the very terms? Yet it is too true that in nominally Christian society a young man is often induced for the first time to take wine, and continuing to take it, as he says, in moderation, and what is the frequent result? A lost character, ruined health, and ultimately a drunkard's grave. No wonder the mother felt solicitude for her son!"

How an Early Martyr Died.—Rev. R. F. Horton said: "I recollect reading that when the first missionary went into the country which is now called Prussia, in the tenth century—St. Adelbert—a country which was then quite as heathen as China is to-day, he went barefooted and in a serge gown, and he walked through the streets of the villages, and along the high-roads, and he talked to them all about the love of Christ, and at last, his biographer tells us, he came into the grove of the gods, where the priests rushed out upon him in fury, and clubbed him to death, and he fell down and died, saying, 'Lord Jesus, receive my spirit,' and he fell upon the earth in the form of a crucifix. If we are to call this world to Christ, we must bring before the people the cross of Christ, and we can do that only by ourselves becoming crucified with Him who died for us."

The Memory of "Father David."—Mr. A. T. Swann, of The Good News mission vessel, Lake Tanganyika, Central Africa, said: "Moffat is dead, Livingstone is dead, but God liveth and reigneth, and shall reign in spite of all His enemies. He has been at work on all our mission fields. What has He done in Central Africa? Well, He has started by taking to the Great Lake a small boat called The Morning Star. Men said we were all fanatics—well, they very often say that when we get enthusiastic over the work of God. But to-day she floats, a living witness to what can be done by men who have got the work of God at their very hearts. I well remember standing at Ujiji, that historic town, and looking at the very spot where Stanley met Livingstone. Why, I felt it was sacred ground, and I thought, 'Well, if that good man was as good as we read he was, he has left some trace behind him.' I said to one gray Arab, a slave-hunter, a man who is the cause of the death of some hundreds of Central African people every year, 'Did you know Dr. David Livingstone? do you remember him?' He said, 'No.' My heart went down. I said, 'Don't you know the man who used to wear the peaked cap, and who had the box of medicine, and who used to go about looking for the rivers and the mountains?' 'Oh!' he said, 'you mean Father David.' That is the impression that a godly life left on one of the blackest men that ever walked Central African ground. And I am proud to think that God has given me the privilege of walking in some of Father David's footsteps."

An Instance of Moral Suicide. A Minister says that "a little time ago a City Missionary was called upon to visit a man who was dying. He read and prayed with him, and strove to comfort the dying man by showing him Christ the only true way of salvation; but all to no effect. At length the poor unhappy man roused himself up and, turning to his visitor, said, 'See here, young man; it is no use your wasting time with me: you can do no good. I know the way of salvation as well as you, and I should like to enter it but I cannot; listen to my story. In the year 1860 it was a time of great revival, and I, among others, was urged to give myself to Christ, but I would not. Many times the Holy Spirit renewed His strivings, and I felt constrained to yield, yet I steadfastly set my face against it. From that time God's Spirit left me, and though I would come I cannot, and I am going into the internal world a lost sinner.' 'God's Spirit will not always strive with man.'"

Standing Like a Daniel.—Mr. Hamilton says: "I remember a young fellow of seventeen years, employed in the office of a professional gentleman, a manager in a fashionable city church, being sent by him to another gentleman, a brother manager, requesting him to take his turn at the collection plate. While the messenger waited his reply, the gentleman offered him a glass of spirits. My young friend, being an abstainer, declined; he next offered him wine, but again getting a refusal, he said, 'Then surely you will take a glass of stout?' But the lad stood firm to his principle. The gentleman, looking slightly disappointed, said, 'Well, I like to see a young man with strict principles.' But it is certainly a strange way to show appreciation by trying to overcome principles which you admire. What can be expected of young men when they see their elders, their leaders in business and religion, not only themselves taking liquor, but urging it upon young men."

An Unexpectedly Bright Sunset.—Mr. Stewart says: "It is wonderful how Christ lights up the dark passages in our life and makes the rough places smooth; even the valley of the shadow of death He irradiates with His smile. I knew a man who had been a drunkard for over twenty years, but at length was brought to Christ, and remained a consistent Christian for seventeen years. During all that time the recollection of his evil days seemed to cast an habitual gloom upon him and constituted a great burden on his mind. This would be the last man one would expect to show a joyous spirit in the face of death, yet I, who was a witness to that death-bed, can testify that a more glorious one I never saw. What a glorious difference came over him before the end! The smile from the Father's face was reflected upon that of the dying man. All the while his mind was perfectly clear, though living in an ecstasy of joy. He quoted with great accuracy long passages of Scripture bearing upon his salvation. Just immediately before the end those who watched were surprised to hear him beginning to sing that beautiful hymn, 'I do believe, I will believe, that Jesus died for me.' Nothing but the veritable presence of the Saviour could have illumined that death-bed and made it glad with the unutterable gladness of heaven."

THE USES OF STRATAGEM.

MEN of the Thirteenth Regiment, and their friends here gathered, of all occupations and professions, men of the city and men of the fields, here is a theme fit for all of us.

One Sabbath evening with my family around me, we were talking over the scene of the text. In the wide-open eyes, and the quick interrogations, and the blanched cheeks I realized what it was. There is the old city, shorter by name than any other city in the ages, spelled with two letters—A, I.—Ai. Joshua and his men want to take it. How to do it is the question. On a former occasion, in a straightforward, face to face fight, they had been defeated; but now they are going to take it by ambuscade. General Joshua has two divisions in his army—the one division the battle-worn commander will lead himself, the other division he sends off to encamp in an ambush on the west side of the city of Ai. No torches, no lanterns, no sound of heavy battalions but thirty thousand swarthy warriors moving in silence, speaking only in a whisper; no clicking of swords against shields, lest the watchmen of Ai discover it and be a failure. If a roystering soldier in the Israelitish army forgets himself, all along the line the word is "Hush!" Joshua takes the other division, the one with which he is to march, and puts it on the north side of the city of Ai, and then spends the night in reconnoitring in the valley. There he is, thinking over the fortunes of the coming day, with something of the feelings of Wellington the night before Waterloo, or of Meade and Lee the night before Gettysburg. There he stands in the night, and says to himself: "Yonder is the division in ambush on the west side of Ai. Here is the division I have under my especial command on the north side of Ai. There is the old city slumbering in its sin. To-morrow will be the battle. Look! the morning already begins to tip the hills. The military officers of Ai look out in the morning very early, and while they do not see the division in ambush, they behold the other division of Joshua, and the cry,

"To Arms! To Arms!"

rings through all the streets of the old town, and every sword, whether hacked and bent or newly welded, is brought out, and all the inhabitants of the city of Ai pour through the gates, an infuriated torrent, and their cry is: "Come, we'll make quick work with Joshua and his troops." No sooner had these people of Ai come out against the troops of Joshua, than Joshua gave such a command as he seldom gave: "Fall back!" Why, they could not believe their own ears! Is Joshua's courage failing him? The retreat is beaten, and the Israelites are flying, throwing blankets and canteens on every side under this worse than Bull Run defeat. And you ought to hear the soldiers of Ai cheer and cheer and cheer. But they huzza too soon. The men lying in ambush are straining their vision to get some signal from Joshua that they may know what time to drop upon the city. Joshua takes his burnished spear, glittering in the sun like a shaft of doom, and points it toward the city; and when the men up yonder in the ambush see it, with hawk-like swoop they drop upon Ai, and without stroke of sword or stab of spear take the city and put it to the torch. So much for the division that was in ambush. How about the division under Joshua's command? No sooner does Joshua stop in the flight than all his men stop with him, and as he wheels they wheel, for in a voice of thunder he cried "Halt!" One strong arm driving back

A Torrent of Flying Troops.

And then, as he points his spear through the golden light toward that fatal city, his troops know that they are to start for it. What a scene it was when the division in ambush which had taken the city marched down against the men of Ai on the one side, and the troops under Joshua doubled up their enemies from the other side, and the men of Ai were caught between these two hurricanes of Israelitish courage, thrust before and behind, stabbed in breast and back, ground between the upper and the nether millstones of God's indignation. Woe to the city of Ai! Cheer for Israel!

Lesson the first: There is such a thing as Victorious Retreat.

Joshua's falling back was the first chapter in his successful besiegement. And there are times in your life when the best thing you can do is to run. You were once the victim of strong drink. The demijohn and the decanter were your fierce foes. They came down upon you with greater fury than the men of Ai upon the men of Joshua. Your only safety is to get away from them. Your dissipating companions will come around you for your overthrow. Run for your life! Fall back! Fall back from the drinking-saloon! Fall back from the wine-party! Your flight is your advance. Your retreat is your victory. There is a saloon down on the next street that has almost been the ruin of your soul. Then why do you go along that street? Why do you not pass through some other street rather than by the place of your calamity? A spoonful of brandy taken for medicinal purposes by a man who twenty years before had been reformed from drunkenness, hurled into inebriety and the grave one of the best friends I ever had. Retreat is victory!

Here is a converted infidel. He is so strong now in his faith in the gospel, he says he can read anything. What are you reading? Bolingbroke? Andrew Jackson Davis's tracts? Tyndall's Glasgow University address? Drop them and run. You will be an infidel before you die, unless you quit that. These men of Ai will be too much for you. Turn your back on the rank and file of unbelief. Fly before they cut you with their swords, and transfix you with their javelins. There are people who have been well-nigh ruined because they risked a foolhardy expedition in the presence of mighty and overwhelming temptations, and the men of Ai made a morning meal of them.

So, also, there is victorious retreat

In the Religious World.

Thousands of times the kingdom of Christ has seemed to fall back. When the blood of the Scotch Covenanters gave a deeper dye to the heather of the Highlands, when the Vaudois of France chose extermination rather than make an unchristian surrender, when, on St. Bartholomew's Day, mounted assassins rode through the streets of Paris, crying, "Kill! Blood-letting is good in August! Kill! Death to the Huguenots! Kill!" When Lady Jane Grey's head rolled from the executioner's block; when Calvin was imprisoned in the castle; when John Knox died for the truth; when John Bunyan lay rotting in Bedford Jail, saying, "If God will help me, and my physical life continues, I will stay here until the moss grows on my eyebrows rather than give up my faith"—the days of retreat for the church were days of victory.

The Pilgrim Fathers Fell Back from the other side of the sea to Plymouth Rock, but now are marshaling a continent for the Christianization of the world. The Church of Christ falling back from Piedmont, falling back from Rue St. Jacques, falling back from St Denis, falling back from Wurtemburg castles, falling back from the Brussels marketplace, yet all the time triumphing. Notwithstanding all the shocking reverses which the Church of Christ suffers, what do we see to-day? Three thousand missionaries of the cross on heathen grounds; sixty thousand ministers of Jesus Christ in this land; at least two hundred millions of Christians on the earth. All nations to-day kindling in a blaze of revival. Falling back, yet advancing until the old Wesleyan hymn will prove true:

"The lion of Judah shall break the chain,
And give us the victory again and again!"

But there is a more marked illustration of victorious retreat in the life of our Joshua, the Jesus of the ages. First falling back from an appalling height to an appalling depth, falling from celestial hills to terrestrial valleys, yet that did not seem to suffice Him as a retreat. Falling back still further from Bethlehem to Nazareth, from Nazareth to Jerusalem, back from Jerusalem to Golgotha, back from Golgotha to the mausoleum in the rock, back down over the precipices of perdition, until He walked amid the caverns of the eternal captives and drank of the wine of the wrath of Almighty God, amid the Ahabs, and the Jezebels, and the Belshazzars. Oh, men of the pulpit, and men of the pew, Christ's descent from heaven to earth does not measure half the distance! It was from glory to perdition. He descended into hell. All the records of earthly retreat are as nothing compared with this falling back. Santa Anna, with the fragments of his army flying over the plateaux of Mexico, and Napoleon and his army retreating from Moscow into the awful snows of Russia, are not worthy to be mentioned with this retreat, when all the powers of darkness seem to be pursuing Christ as He fell back, until the body of Him who came to do such wonderful things lay pulseless and stripped. Methinks that the city of Ai was not so emptied of its inhabitants when they went to pursue Joshua, as perdition was emptied of devils when they started for the pursuit of Christ, and He fell back and back, down lower, down lower, chasm below chasm, pit below pit, until He seemed to strike the bottom of objurgation and scorn and torture. Oh, the long, loud, jubilant shout of hell at the defeat of the Lord God Almighty!

From Throne to Manger;

But let not the powers of darkness rejoice quite so soon. Do you hear that of Arimathea? I hear the sheet rending! What means that stone hurled down the side of the hill? Who is this coming out? Push him back! the dead must not stalk in this open sunlight. Oh, it is our Joshua. Let him come out. He comes forth and starts for the city. He takes the spear of the Roman guard and points that way. Church militant marches up on one side, and the church triumphant marches down on the other side. And the powers of darkness being caught between these ranks of celestial and terrestrial valor, nothing is left of them save just enough to illustrate the direful overthrow of hell and our Joshua's eternal victory. On His head be all the crowns. In His hands be all the sceptres. At His feet be all the human hearts; and here, Lord, is one of them.

Lesson the second: The triumph of the wicked is short. Did you ever see an army in a panic? There is nothing so uncontrollable. If you had stood at Long Bridge, Washington, during the opening of our sad Civil War, you would know what it is to see an army run. And when those men of Ai looked out and saw those men of Joshua in a stampede, they expected easy work. They would scatter them as the equinox the leaves. Oh, the gleeful and jubilant descent of the men of Ai upon the men of Joshua! But their exhilaration was brief, for the tide of battle turned and these quondam conquerors left their miserable carcasses in the wilderness of Bethaven. So it always is. The triumph of the wicked is short. You make $20,000 at the gaming-table. Do you expect to keep it? You will die in the poorhouse. You made a fortune by iniquitous traffic. Do you expect to keep it? Your money will scatter, or it will stay long enough to curse your children after you are dead. Call over the roll of and see how short was their prosperity. For a while like the men of Ai they went from conquest to conquest, but after a while disaster rolled back upon them and they were divided into three parts: misfortune took their property, the grave took their body, and the lost world took their soul. I am always interested in the building of theatres and the building of dissipating saloons. I like to have them built of the best granite and have the rooms made large, and to have the pillars made very firm. God is going to conquer them, and they will be turned into asylums and art galleries and churches. The stores in which fraudulent men do business, the splendid banking institutions where the president and cashier put all their property in their wives' hands and then fail for $200,000—all these institutions are to become the places where honest Christian men do business.

How long will it take your boys to get through your ill-gotten gains? The wicked do not live out half their days. For a while they swagger and strut and make a great splash in the newspapers, but after a while into a brief paragraph: "Died suddenly, July 22, 1888, at thirty-five years of age. Relatives and friends of the family are invited to attend the funeral on Wednesday, at 2 o'clock, from his late residence on Madison Square. Interment at Greenwood." Some of them jumped off the docks. Some of them took prussic acid. Some of them fell under the snap of a Derringer pistol. Some of them spent their last days in a lunatic asylum. Where are William Tweed and his associates? Where a Ketcham and Swartwout, absconding swindlers? Where is James Fisk, the libertine, and all the other misdemeanants? The wicked do not live out half their days. Disembogue, O world of darkness! Come up, Hildebrand and Henry II. and Robespierre, and with blistering and blaspheming and ashen lips hiss out; "The triumph of the wicked is short."

Lesson the third: How much may be accomplished by lying In Ambush for Opportunities.

Are you hypercritical of Joshua's manœuvre? Do you say that it was cheating for him to take that city by ambuscade? Was it wrong for Washington to kindle camp-fires on New Jersey Heights, giving the impression to the opposing force that a great army was encamped there when there was none at all? I answer, if the war was right then Joshua was right in his stratagem. He violated no flag of truce. He broke no treaty, but by a lawful anbuscade captured the city of Ai. Oh that we all knew how to lie in ambush for opportunities to serve God. The best of our opportunities do not lie on the surface, but are secreted; by tact, by stratagem, by Christian ambuscade, you may take almost any castle of sin for Christ. Come up toward men with a regular besiegement of argument and you will be defeated: but just wait until the door of their hearts is set ajar, or they are off their guard, or their severe caution is away from home, and then drop in on them from a Christian ambuscade. There has been many a man up to his chin in scientific portfolios which proved there was no Christ and no divine revelation, his pen a scimetar flung into the heart of theological opponents, who, nevertheless, has been discomfited and captured for God by some little three-year-old child who has got up and put her snowy arms around his sinewy neck, and asked some simple question about God.

Oh, make a flank movement;

Steal a March on the Devil;

cheat that man into Heaven! A five-dollar treatise that will stand all the laws of homiletics may fail to do that which a penny tract of Christian entreaty may accomplish. Oh, for more Christians in ambuscade, not lying in idleness, but waiting for a quick spring, waiting until just the right time comes! Do not talk to a man about the vanity of this world on the day when he has bought something at "twelve," and is going to sell it at "fifteen." But talk to him about the vanity of the world on the day when he has bought something at "fifteen," and is compelled to sell it at "twelve." Do not rub a man's disposition the wrong way. Do not take the imperative mood when the subjuntive mood will do just as well. Do not talk in perfervid style to a phlegmatic nor try to tickle a torrid temperament with an icicle. You can take any man for Christ if you know how to get at him. Do not send word to him that to-morrow at 10 o'clock you propose to open your batteries upon him, but come on him by a skilful, persevering, God-directed ambuscade.

Lesson the fourth: The importance of Taking Good Aim.

There is Joshua, but how are those people in ambush up yonder to know when they are to drop on the city, and how are these men around Joshua to know when they are to stop their flight and advance? There must be some signal—a signal to stop the one division and to start the other. Joshua with a spear on which were ordinarily hung the colors of battle, points toward the city. He stands in such a conspicuous position, and there is so much of the morning light dripping from that spear-tip, that all around the horizon they see it. It was as much to say: "There is the city. Take it.

God knows and we know that a great deal of Christian attack amounts to nothing simply because we do not take good aim. Nobody knows and we do not know ourselves which point we want to take, when we ought to make up our minds what God will have us to do, and point our spear in that direction and then hurl our body, mind, soul, time, eternity at that

One Target.

In our pulpits and pews and Sunday-schools and prayer-meetings we want to get a reputation for saying pretty things, and so we point our spear toward the flowers: or we want a reputation for saying sublime things, and we point our spear toward the stars; or we want to get a reputation for historical knowledge, and we point our spear toward the past; or we want to get a reputation for great liberality, so we swing our spear all around; while there is the old world, proud, rebellious and armed against all righteousness; and instead of running any further away from its pursuit, we ought to turn around, plant our foot in the strength of the eternal God, lift the old cross and point it in the direction of the world's conquest till the redeemed of earth, marching up from one side and the glorified of heaven marching down from the other side, the last battlement of sin is compelled to swing out the streamers of Emanuel. Oh Church of God, take aim and conquer.

I have heard it said: "Look out for a man who has only one idea; he is irresistible." I say: Look out for the man who has one idea, and that a determination for soul-saving. I believe God would strike me dead if I dared to point the spear in any other direction. Oh, for some of the courage and enthusiasm of Joshua! He flung two armies from the tip of that spear. It is sinful for us to rest, unless it is to get stronger muscle and fresher brain and purer heart for God's work. I feel on my head the hands of Christ in a new ordination. Do you not feel the same omnipotent pressure? There is a work for all of us. Oh, that we might stand up, side by side, and point the spear toward the city! It ought to be taken. It will be taken. Our cities are drifting off toward loose religion, or what is called which is so liberal that it gives up all the cardinal doctrines of the Bible; so liberal that it surrenders the rectitude of the throne of the Almighty. That is liberality with a vengeance. Let us decide upon the work which we, as Christian men, have to do, and, in the strength of God, go to work and do it.

It is comparatively easy to keep on a parade amid a shower of bouquets and hand-clapping, and the whole street full of enthusiastic huzzas; but it is not so easy to stand up in the day of battle, the face blackened with smoke, the uniform covered with the earth ploughed up by whizzing bullets and bursting shells, half the regiment cut to pieces, and yet the commander crying "Forward, march!" Then it requires old-fashioned valor. My friends, the great trouble of the kingdom of God in this day is the cowards. They do splendidly on a parade day, and at the communion, when they have on their best clothes of Christian profession; but in at the first sharpshooting of scepticism, they dodge, they fall back, they break ranks. We confront the enemy, we open the battle against fraud, and lo! we find on our side a great many people that do not try to pay their debts. And we open the battle against intemperance, and we find on our own side a great many people who drink too much. And we open the battle against profanity, and we find on our own side a great many men who make hard speeches. And we open the battle against infidelity, and lo! we find on our own side a great many men who are not quite sure about the Book of Jonah. And while we ought to be massing our troops, and bringing forth more than the united courage of Austerlitz and Waterloo and Gettysburg, we have to be spending our time in hunting up ambuscades. There are a great many in the Lord's army who would like to go out on a campagn with satin slippers and holding umbrellas over their heads to keep off the heavy dew, and having rations of canvas-back ducks and lemon custards. If they cannot have them they want to go home. They think it is unhealthy among so many bullets!

I believe that the next twelve months will be the most stupendous year that heaven ever saw.

now with the coming of God. It will be a year of successes for the men of Joshua, but of doom for the men of Ai. You put your ear to the rail-track and you can hear the train coming miles away. So I put my ear to the ground and I hear the thundering on of the lightning train of God's mercies and judgments. The mercy of God is first to be tried upon this nation. It will be preached in the pulpits, in theatres, on the streets, everywhere. People will be invited to accept the mercy of the Gospel, and the story and the song and the prayer will be "mercy." But suppose they do not accept the offer of mercy—what then? Then God will come with His judgments, and the grasshoppers will eat the crops, and the freshets will devastate the valleys, and the defalcations will swallow the money markets, and the fires will burn the cities, and the earth will quake from pole to pole. Year of mercies and of judgments. Year of invitation and of warning. Year of jubilee and of woe.

Which Side are You going to be on? With the men of Ai or the men of Joshua? Pass over this Sabbath into the ranks of Israel. I would clap my hands at the joy of your coming. You will have a poor chance for this world and the world to come without Jesus. You cannot stand what is to come upon you and upon the world unless you have the pardon and the comfort and the help of Christ. Come over. On this side is your happiness and safety, on the other side is disquietude and despair. Eternal defeat to the men of Ai! Eternal victory to the men of Joshua!

MEXICAN MOTHERS AT SCHOOL.

AN encouraging school work is being done in New Mexico. In a letter to the Church, from Mrs. A. M. Granger, who dates from Capulin, that lady says: "Last week, a Mexican came from his ranch with his ten-year-old boy to put him into school. His ranch is twenty-four miles from Capulin. He spent all day in the school-room, and was much pleased with all the exercises, especially the writing. He put him in the school for five years, and said he should come to the Sabbath-school, which he joined last Sunday. He is a man of so much influence among the Mexicans that our people feel much pleased over this accession to the school. I have four married women pupils in the school; two of these started last November, the other two since Christmas. One of these is a young woman who lost her little boy last winter, and the other is a young woman who entered the school with a baby in her arms six weeks old. It is now four months old. The mother and baby have not missed school one day since they started. She brings two pillows, which she puts in a chair, and it lies there and sleeps most of the time. All these are members of my class in Sabbath-school. One of these entered the school in November. Her husband never came with her to Sabbath-school until last Sunday. He is much older than she is, and I found could talk some English. He took his seat near the organ, and seemed much interested in all our exercises. We always stay after Sabbath-school and sing. He stayed, and was one of the last to leave the church. When he bade me good-by he said he would come next Sunday. Two young girls gave evidence of becoming Christians.

A LIVING NATIONAL EMBLEM.

AN instance of punishment, as lawless as the offence punished, is reported from Chicago. It shows, however, on the part of the wrongdoers, a patriotic veneration for the emblem of freedom which it is much to be wished that the subjects of the King of kings would show when His glory is outraged by His enemies. (Mark 8: 38.)

A despatch from Chicago states that on July 5 a well-known Anarchist was seen at the door of a cigar store waving a red handkerchief attached to a cane and shouting "Hurrah for anarchy." Then he began to tear down the Stars and Stripes that decorated the door-post. Half a dozen young Americans in the cigar store heard the insult to the flag. Some dragged Kintz inside, and others brought pots of red, white and blue paint from a neighboring paint store. The Anarchist's face was painted a deep blue, and bespangled with white. His clothing was painted white, and red streaks were daubed on the white background, from his head to his feet. He had three of his tormentors arrested. Justice Lyon rallied the Anarchist in court about seeking the protection of a law in which he disbelieved, but he insisted upon his rights. The boys were dismissed with suspended fines.

A MILLION DOLLAR LIFE INSURANCE.

IN an article on Life Insurance in a Philadelphia daily journal the statement is made that the death of a prominent citizen would call for the payment of a million dollars from certain life insurance companies. It says: The greatest achievement in the history of life insurance has been made by Mr. John Wanamaker, who is now paying premiums on $1,000,000 to twenty-nine different companies. The last policy issued on his life was received by him on Thursday last, and so far as is known, there is no other man in the world whose life is insured for such an enormous amount. There are a number of men in this city who have been trying for years to achieve the point just gained by Mr. Wanamaker, but they have so far failed, although one manufacturer has succeeded in getting policies on his life amounting to $750,000. He is desirous of putting the amount up to a round million. But Mr. Wanamaker is not the only man in this city upon whose life big risks are issued. Two other citizens are insured for $100,000, another is insured for about $150,000, a fifth is insured for one-tenth of a million, and his partner for twice that amount. These facts show that wealthy men do not forget that they must die, and leave their riches behind them. Some of these, as in the case of the million dollar insurer, are Christian men, who do not neglect the higher preparation for the great change; but in too many cases the men who thus recognize the inevitable event, and make provision for it in one way, fail to make that provision which would ensure their own safety. (Luke 12: 20, 21.)

INFIDELITY IN UTAH.

IT would appear from the report of a Christian missionary in Utah that there is a growing revolt in the Mormon Church against its tyranny and superstition. Unhappily it is not tending toward Christianity, but to infidelity. The missionary says that he meets with a large number of these infidels, who are unusually strong in argument and opposed to all religious teaching. Their experience has been such that they are apt to hate the very name of religion. Generally, too, the infidel has been a member of a Christian church, and honestly joined the Mormon Church because he thought it was purer, more spiritual, than his own Christian church. When he gives up Mormonism, therefore, he thinks there is nothing left. He has tried all and found them wanting. He thinks the experience of all others in religion is similar to his own, except that they have not found out their mistake yet. With few exceptions, these infidels will not attend our meetings. Occasionally, especially when a new man preaches, the novelty will attract them. They do not object to their children coming to our Sabbath-school or meetings; but if the children tell the parents what they have heard, the parents will do their best to prevent it from having any influence over them.

THEATRE PREACHING IN JAPAN.

AN extended tour in northern Japan has been taken by six missionaries, of whom three were ladies. They traveled in jinrikishas about two hundred and twenty-five miles, being without beds, chairs, and other home comforts, living on the floor, and part of the time on Japanese food, speaking at least once a day on the average, for ten days, to audiences ranging from three to twelve hundred. Most of these preachings were in theatres, which were the only buildings the missionaries could hire large enough for the audiences.

In the course of an account of this tour sent to the Missionary Herald, by Mr. Albrecht, who was one of the party, he says: "Wherever we went we met with audiences crowding the largest theatres in the city, listening with Japanese eagerness and responsiveness to three or four speakers each evening. While undoubtedly the better classes of the people are generally not found amongst them, we noticed on this trip more intelligent faces, evidently officials and professional men, than during former visits. In Shibata, we spoke by invitation of two prominent lawyers. In Murakami, the town officials occupied the front seat in the church during the dedication services. In Nagaoka, many of the teachers of the various schools of that city were present. In Kashiwazaki, Buddhism rallied its forces to withstand the first aggression of Protestant Christianity, interrupting the speakers with sounds of jeers and taunts, Buddhist priests vying with each other to hurl ridicule and contempt at them; but as the speakers proceeded undaunted, and were able gradually to gain the attention of the better class of hearers, the interrupters were silenced by their own people, and the truth was pressed home to their conscience.

In Shibata brother Nakai is working most effectively. The brethren there have hired a pleasant room for holding services, and are gaining in power and numbers. By giving lessons in English, Mr. Nakai is gathering twenty-three soldiers of the garrison stationed there, bringing them under the influence of the gospel. One young sergeant, the only one of all that large garrison, was recently baptized, and spends his daily hour of furlough in reading the Bible with a friend a young merchant who, when he was converted, destroyed all wines and liquors which were a part of his stock in trade.

A HINDOO DOCTOR'S CONVERSION.

IN January of last year there was living in Dera Ghazi Khan, in the Punjab, a Hindoo doctor named Mir Alam Khan, who was following his profession, when one day a Hindu friend of his said to him, "You should go to Keenjur; you will find something there." Not caring to do this, he consulted some magical books for guidance, and got the following direction: "You must to Keenjur." So to Keenjur he went, and day after day sat in the bazaars, wondering what he was to get there. On February 14 the Rev. T. Bomford and Munshi Talib Masih ("Seeker after Christ") arrived in the place and went to the bazaar to preach. Mir Alam Khan had heard Christian preaching in Dera Ghazi, and had read some Christian books, but now, for the first time, he felt drawn to Christianity, and came to every preaching, and also to the missionary. Mir Alam Khan came at seven next morning to announce his intention of becoming a Christian. That day the missionaries left Keenjur for Mozuffergarh, and arrived there on Friday the 18th. On Saturday the 19th, Mir Alam Khan came in, having walked twenty-four miles. He could not, he said, rest; he must be baptized. He acknowledged sins committed in his past life, and professed his faith in Christ as his Saviour. He was accordingly baptized on Sunday, February 20. His baptism caused no little stir in Dera Ghazi Khan. Since then he has been living with Talib Masih, studying the Bible and working with him. Meeting Talib Masih one day after having not seen him for some months, the Rev. T. Bomford asked how Mir Alam Khan was going on. "Very well," was the answer, "but he is not the man you knew." "What do you mean?" "I never saw any one alter so much through reading the Bible; he is quite a different man." That is good testimony to the reality of the change in him. The latest news is, that one of his friends intends to follow his example, and that his father has asked for a Bible.

LITTLE GIRL WAIFS IN CHINA.

VALUABLE work is being done in China among the despised female children by the devoted missionary ladies who are laboring there. Dr. Mary Gale, who writes to the Missionary Link from Shanghai, tells the story of two slave girls whose maladies were treated in the hospital, and who were deeply touched by the kindness they received. "One of them," says Dr. Gale, "is about twelve years of age, and attends the school in the native teacher Mrs. Day's house in the morning, and in the afternoon is a bright little helper in the hospital. You would wonder, to see her anticipate the doctor's wants so quickly, and would smile at her air of authority over the patients. Miss McKechnie made her face perfectly radiant one day by telling an inquisitive invalid that she was our assistant. She is an affectionate child, and never tires of waiting on others. You would certainly praise her amiable disposition, and would not be at all prepared for the change that comes over her on the appearance of her mistress. She will not look at her, and her face is black with scowls, while she grumbles all kinds of hard things about her! But one day she had to go home, and there were agonizing leave-takings, thanks and sobs mingling in a truly distressing chorus. The child was not well, and the bad little thing tore the bandages off, after she got home, would not have the sores dressed, refused to eat, and altogether conducted herself in such a way that the mistress brought her back in despair, and left her. We hope her stay will be permanent, for she will make a good helper for the hospital.

"Another little girl, a poor paralyzed child of eight, was picked up from the road where she had been left to die. There was nothing pretty about her, pale faced with prominent teeth, and both limbs helpless. I do not know how many days it was before a smile could be won from her. Only a cowed, frightened look would greet one. But gradually the face brightened and the limbs grew strong, till at length she was walking about well, and full of mischief. She was a little tease, but it made one happy to see the change in her. She became quite a little needlewoman, and plans had been matured for putting her in the school, when the woman who owned her pounced upon her and took her away. Poor little soul! She did not rage like the other, but her face haunts me still as I saw it last, pale, sad, and patient."

PROPHETIC EVENTS BETWEEN 1889 AND 1901.

THE FIRST RESURRECTION.

Mr William Birch's 775th Printed Sunday Sermon, Delivered in Free Trade Hall, Manchester, England, March 11, 1888.

"Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the First Resurrection; on such the second death hath no power, but they shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with Him a thousand years.

"And I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God; and the books were opened; and another book was opened which is the book of life. And whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire.—Revelation 20: 6, 12, and 15.

The Impending Storm of Trouble—The Half-Starved Heathen at Home—The Coming War the Greatest Ever Known—The Rise of the Napoleonic Antichrist Between 1891 and 1893—The First Angel Message—The Red Horse of Anarchic War—The Great Tribulation—The Battle of Armageddon in April, 1901—The Last Week of this Age, April 4 to 11, 1901—Remarkable Personal Experiences.

WE live in critical times. The End of this Age is coming almost within view. In the lifetime of some of us, the First Resurrection will probably take place, and our Lord come again to call His people home.

The evidences around us point to the conclusion that Europe will shortly enter a storm of trouble such as the world has never seen. The competition in trade is at the height of cunning in attempts to climb to wealth; and machinery and inventions are pushing out human labor. Our towns are crowded with half-starved men and women, and it is no fable to say that the majority of the population of Europe are neither comfortably fed nor properly clothed. Many of the laboring population are being jostled through life in crowded slums, sunless and godless. It is true that the churches send an occasional lifeboat to pick up a few stragglers, but the great proportion of the population of Europe live without knowledge of the true God, and die as if no man cared for their souls.

Fifteen years ago, I appealed to the churches and to rich men to remember that the poor had both feeling bodies and never-dying souls, but it was said that I was setting class against class, and seeking to turn the world upside down. The neglected classes with anti-Christian socialists at their head will before long, I fear, take the law into their own hands, and our present race of kings and aristocracy be driven from their thrones and palaces, red-republicanism then becoming the ruling force of Europe. Some of you who hear and many who read this statement may laugh at what they consider the foolish idea of an alarmist; but what I have said is clearly foretold in God's written word, and if so will surely come to pass.

Between 1888 and 1891 Daniel's seventh chapter shows that will burst upon Europe, and its map be wholly changed. More than twenty kingdoms or states that are now lying within the countries of Cæsar's old Roman Empire will be reduced into a confederacy of ten kingdoms, prefigured by the Wild-beast with ten horns and the Image with ten toes in Daniel 2: 31 and 7: 24. France will apparently extend its boundary once more to the river Rhine, so as to include Belgium and the remainder of the left bank of that river within its frontiers. Then Europe west of the Rhine and south of the Danube, together with Britain, will crystallize into the form of seven kingdoms, Britain, France, Spain, Italy, Austria, Greece, Balkan States, with three others, namely, Turkey reduced in size, Syria made independent, and Egypt, amounting altogether to ten.*

Subsequently, between 1891 and 1893, we may look for a man of Napoleon name or nature, whom God's Word calls "the Little Horn" and "Antichrist," to become ruler over a little state in Greece or Turkey, and to "wax exceeding great," and become "King of the North" (Syria), and make a seven years' covenant or league with the Jews in Jerusalem from Passover Week (April 21–28), 1894, to Passover Week, 1901, which will lead, among other things, to the restoration of their morning and evening sacrifices several months later, in November, 1894.

When true Christians shall see these phenomenal events come to pass, there will be a great expectation of our Lord's appearance.

The Midnight Cry

will go forth, "Behold, the Bridegroom cometh!" and there will be an extraordinary religious revival, prefigured by ALL the virgins arising, and by the travail of the Christian Church (Matt. 25: 1–10; Rev. 12: 2, 5.)

The Jewish daily sacrifices are indicated in Daniel 8: 14, and 12: 11, 12, to be renewed in Jerusalem 2,345 literal days before this Age ends on the last day of Passover Week, Thursday, April 11, 1901, and therefore to be renewed about November 8, 1894. A future command to rebuild Jerusalem is also to go forth upon the same day, and sixty-nine weeks of literal days afterward (namely, about March 5, 1896, eight years from now) there may be expected, according to Daniel 9: 25, Rev. 14: 4, and 1 Thess. 4: 17, the Coming of Messiah the Prince as a Bridegroom, to raise all "the dead in Christ," and together with them to translate to Himself into the aërial heavens 144,000 living watchful Christians, like Enoch and Elijah, without dying. The heavenly Jerusalem, their future home, descends perhaps at that time into the aërial heavens, as predicted in Rev. 21: 2, although it does not become visible to the earth until just before the Millennium.

"The Lord Himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first; then (afterward) we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord." (1 Thess. 4: 16, 17; I Corinth. 15: 51, 52; Rev. 12: 5.)

"This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." (Acts 1: 11.)

"And I looked, and, lo! the Lamb stood on the Mount Zion, and with him an 144,000, having His Father's name written in their foreheads. . . . And they sang, as it were, a new song before the throne . . . These were redeemed from among men, being the FIRST-FRUITS unto God and to the Lamb."

Then after several months of world-wide Gospel preaching, during the First Angel Message and First Seal, of red-republican war will ride through the earth during the first half of 1897, and the ten kingdoms become Red Republics with the Church of Rome, as ruling chaplain, sitting upon them, and making herself drunk with the blood of faithful Christians, in fulfillment of the prophetic emblem of inebriated with the blood of martyrs, seated boastfully upon the Ten-horned Scarlet Wild Beast, in Revelation 17, exclaiming, "I sit a Queen." (Rev. 14: 6; 6: 2, 4; 17.) The Imperial Antichrist will then presently stop the Jewish sacrifices, and set up his own image in Jerusalem and in every town of the Ten Kingdoms as if he were a god, while the ten kings "will give their power and strength to him" during his reign as Emperor for "forty-two months," or three and a half years, from about August, 1897, to January, 1901. Millions of foolish virgins and other Christian converts will, however, flee into the wilderness shortly before those three and a half years, and so escape the martyrdom that will afterwards befall multitudes of subsequent converts everywhere throughout Christendom, who will be beheaded on huge public scaffolds for refusing to worship the Antichrist as their god, or bow down before his image, or receive his mark, 666.* (Dan. 9: 27; Rev. 17: 13; 12: 13.)

"The Red Horse"

Meanwhile famine, pestilence and other plagues and woes of the Seals and Trumpets in Revelation 6 to 11 will everywhere distress mankind. This is of which our Lord speaks in the twenty-fourth chapter of Matthew. Our Lord may finally be expected in Passover Week, 1901, to raise to life all true Christians who shall have died or been slain since the resurrection, about five years previously, and to take them up to heaven together with all His true people found alive on earth, and then in a few days He will descend with them to destroy Antichrist at the battle of Armageddon. In that battle, the armed men of Europe and of "the whole world" will be gathered to battle at Jerusalem; but a tumult will arise amongst them, hatred and jealousy burst forth, and every man will fight against his comrade. Mounted on horses suddenly blinded, the cavalry soldiers, like mad fiends, will attack their companions as if they were foes, until the battle-field becomes a shambles, and as foretold, "the blood shall come up even unto the horses' bridles by the space of a thousand and six hundred furlongs." The imperial Antichrist together with his chaplain, called in the word of God the false prophet, will be destroyed. (Zech. 14; Ezek. 38; Rev. 14: 20; 19: 19.)

The Jews will then be converted by this personal appearance of their long rejected Messiah, and will go about preaching the gospel to those who are left alive among the nations of the earth, and Christ shall reign for a thousand years, during which He will have "the heathen for his inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for His possession." At the end of that period,

The Periodical Visits of our Lord will suddenly cease; and the nations released from the restraint of His beneficent government, will again allow themselves to be deceived by Satan, who will be "loosed for a little season," after which Gog and Magog will be gathered to battle against Jerusalem, when fire from God shall devour them. (Rev. 20; Isaiah 66.)

(To be concluded.)

* It is not unworthy of observation that the 1882 years insisted by Professor Piazzi Smyth, Astronomer Royal for Scotland, to be indicated by the Great Pyramid of Egypt, to elapse from the Birth of Christ to the commencement of Daniel's Troublous Times—if dated from A. D. 6, which seems from the late Duke of Manchester's "Times of Daniel" to be the true date of Christ's birth, will coincide in its termination with the close of 1888, as the commencement of the Troublous Times. (See "The Pyramid Pointing to 1888-9."—Id.)

* The fact of 666 being found in the requisite dative dedicatory form of Napoleon has been long ago pointed out by expositors, thus:

N 50, α 1, π 80, ο 70, λ 30, ε 5, ο 70, ν 50, τ 300, ι 10=666.

It is also remarkable that it is contained in nominative E. (the initial of Ernest) Boulanger, who thus may be indicated to be the Initiator of the coming wars that shall form the Ten-kingdomed Confederacy, and the Forerunner who shall prepare the way for the coming Napoleon:

Ε 5, Β 2, ο 70, υ 400, λ 30, α 1, ν 50, ζ 7, ε 5, ρ 100=666.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Crucial Clause of the Mills' Tariff measure reached a vote on July 16. The action of the Republican National Convention distinctly marked the proposal to put wool on the free list as the one most obnoxious in the bill. The Democrats in the house joined issue on that question, and refused to compromise. The result was that the clause passed the House by a vote of 120 to 102. Only three Democrats voted with the minority. They were Mr. Wilkins and Mr. Foran, of Ohio, and Mr. Sowden, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Randall was absent, through severe illness, or he would doubtless have voted on the same side. The only Republican voting with the Democrats was Mr. Anderson, of Iowa.

An Important Reform in the Telegraphic system is proposed in a bill which was favorably reported to the Senate on July 18. It places the telegraph regulations under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commision, on the same principles as now govern the railroad rates. In its present shape it gives even greater powers to the Commission over the wires than are confided to it over the railroads. It says that rates shall not be unreasonable or exorbitant, though the determination of what is unreasonable and exorbitant, is left with the Commission. It forbids discrimination in rates between similar classes of matter. It permits telegraph companies to give special rates to the Federal, State, and municipal Government. It forbids discrimination between press companies. It also prohibits the present practice of charging higher rates for short distances where there is no competition, than for long ones where there is competition. Whether the "influence" that will be brought to bear upon Congress against the measure will be strong enough to effect its rejection does not yet appear, but it will doubtless be applied vigorously.

The Civil Service Commission Sent its Fourth report to the President on July 17. It is a bulky document of 731 printed pages. It covers not only the statement for the year ended June 30, but gives a résumé of results since the approval of the act in 1883. From this it appears that of every one hundred persons who successfully passed the examination of the commission more than 41 received appointments. It also shows that from July 16, 1883, to July 30, 1887, 33,343 persons were examined for all branches of the service, of which number 11,378, or less than one-half, failed to pass, and 21,965 passed; of these 8,612 received appointments. From January 16, 1883, to January 15, 1885, the number of appointments made to the departments at Washington was 480; from January 16, 1885, to January 15, 1886, 239; from January 16, 1886, to January 15, 1887, 392, and from January 16, 1887, to June 30, 1887, 150, making the total number of appointments to the departments at Washington since the approval of the law 1,266. Of this number 171 were women, the proportion of men to women being more than 6 to 1.

Valuable Suggestions as to the Treatment of criminals were made last week by the National Prison Association, which was in session in Boston. Among other reforms recommended were: The substitution of indeterminate sentences in all cases, even for minor offences, a sentence now almost universal in reform and industrial schools; the extension of this sentence into perpetual confinement for incorrigibles, making it merely restraint without penal features in cases of habitual drunkenness, insanity, or the like; the removal of criminal administration from all connection with politics or popular elections, and the speedy completion of the trial and the prompt execution of the sentence in case of murder or other cases of much popular interest.

The Discovery of Another Dynamite Plot in Chicago startled the country last week. On July 17 information reached the police that arrangements had been made to blow up the houses of the officials who conducted the trial of the Haymarket assassins. The victims were to be Judge Gray, Judge Grinnell, Inspector Bonfield, and Chief of Police Hubbard. The disclosure was made by a member of the anarchist group which had charge of the commission of the revolting crime. The police immediately went to the house of John Hronek, a Bohemian, who was the "number one" of the group, and surrounded it. As he was known to be a desperate man, and was reported to have dangerous explosives always at hand in his house, no attempt was made to raid the building. Soon after daybreak the man came out, and he was surrounded, and, after a desperate resistance, was made prisoner. The police then searched his house and found, in a corner of his bedroom, twelve dynamite cartridges wrapped in brown paper. A further search of the room disclosed, hidden in the bed, a large revolver and a dagger. Then, in almost similar fashion, visits were made at 498 West Twentieth Street, where Frank Chapek was arrested, and to a house in Zion Place, where Frank Chibowa was also captured. In both places arms and explosives were found. Hronek was an intimate friend of Lingg, the convict in the Haymarket affair who committed suicide to avoid hanging. The plans of the conspirators were fully matured, and the murder of the four officials was fixed simultaneously for July 18, the very next day to the one on which the capture was made. The police are now looking for other anarchists, who are known to have dynamite and Winchester rifles in their possession.

The Commission of Judges to Investigate the charges against Mr. Parnell, which were made by the English Attorney-General at the recent action of O'Donnell against the London Times, is formally constituted in a bill which has been read a first time in the House of Commons. Very large powers are vested in the commission, and power will be given them, if the bill passes in its present shape, to make a very thorough investigation of Mr. Parnell's relation with the Phœnix Park murderers and the Invincibles. The judges who will constitute the commission, are authorized to enforce the attendance of witnesses, and examine them under oath. The witnesses will be required to give evidence, even though their evidence may criminate themselves; but they will not be liable to prosecution on account of their own testimony. Every witness making a full disclosure is to be entitled to a certificate from the commission which will indemnify him if proceedings should be commenced against him at a future time in respect to any matter about which he may be examined in this inquiry. Finally, the commission may send a sub-commission to examine witnesses abroad. It would appear that more ample powers for discovering the truth could not be given, and if Mr. Parnell does not avail himself of the opportunity, his reputation with the English public will suffer.

The Emperor of Germany Set out on his Visit to the Czar on July 14. His departure from Kiel presented a spectacle, splendid beyond anything ever before witnessed on the German seas. The town and harbor were uniquely decorated. The route from the station to the harbor was lined with masts covered with oak leaves and adorned with weapons and banners. Triumphal arches and floral decorations, in which naval designs predominated, entirely transformed the aspect of the old town. The Emperor drove slowly toward the harbor, giving as he went special greetings to the guilds and corporations which lined the streets. The yacht Hohenzollern, in which he sailed, arrived at Cronstadt on July 19, accompanied by an imposing squadron of German war vessels. The Czar went out in his yacht to meet the Emperor, the Russian and German fleets pouring out thunderous salutes. The Emperor went on board the Czar's yacht, which then bore the German and Russian imperial standards, and the two monarchs were carried to Peterhof, where the Czarina met them. Banquets and reviews of troops were down on the programme for the next three days, after which the Emperor leaves for Stockholm.

General Boulanger's Condition is Causing anxiety to his friends. The wound in his neck which he received in his duel with Prime Minister Floquet, though not in itself serious, threatens dangerous complications. M. Floquet's rapier was driven into the flesh two inches deep, and passed between the jugular vein and the carotid artery. Had either of the two been cut, Boulanger would have died on the field. His physicians anticipate that if no complications arise he will be well in a week or ten days, though he is not as yet safe from lockjaw, or the less familiar complaint of embolie, caused by clots of blood in the bronchial tubes, or, still rarer, suffocation by hematuria in the respiratory channels. The duel does not appear to have injured the character of either man in the eyes of their respective friends, and M. Floquet has been overwhelmed with congratulations on his prowess. The fact, however, is not creditable to the French people, who, if they had more wisdom, would perceive that there can be little hope for the welfare of the Republic under such leaders.

Speculation About "The White Pasha" who was recently reported to be approaching Khartoum is still unsettled. No white traveller except Stanley is known to be in Africa with a following so large as to impress the native mind with the idea of his being a Pasha. That Stanley, however, should be on the way to Khartoum would indicate so wide a divergence from his route as to imply that he had abandoned his attempt to relieve Emin. The whole affair is shrouded in mystery, which only time can remove. The New York Herald has published an interview and a letter on the subject from Sir Richard Burton, the noted African traveller, which simply guess at a solution of the difficulty. He thinks that the white Pasha is Emin himself pressing northward, though he intimates that it would not surprise him to learn that it was General Gordon, of whose death he is not assured. If, however, it should turn out to be Stanley, then Stanley is attempting to divert the ivory trade to the Congo from the Zanzibar route. Sir Richard is evidently jealous of Stanley's fame, and, while faintly praising him, attempts to depreciate his ability.

The Rev. W. F. Re Qua writes that he is olding a camp meeting at South Canadian, dian Territory, from July 17 to 24, for Indians d believing whites. His work in the Terri- ry grows rapidly under his hands, and many plications for teachers who are Christian men ve come to him. The gospel tent for which and his good wife have been praying and lieving has been ordered, and is likely to ach them soon. They ask us to thank the nd friends who are contributing to this spe- al purpose, and also to their general work. lso, to say in answer to inquiries, one of hich, from a lady at Rock City, Ill., is anony- ous, that they have facilities for getting egues cashed. Any Christian friends who ally feel the responsibility of the Church for ission work among the Indians, and are will- g to help Mr. and Mrs. Re Qua in the self- nying effort they are making to reach those ho are without the knowledge of Christ, may sure that their gifts will be very thankfully ceived if sent to Rev. W. F. Re Qua, P. O. ox 14, McAlester, Choctaw Nation, Ind. Ter.

The First Anniversary of the Bethesda Mis- on at 29th Street and Eighth Avenue, New ork, was held July 14. A truly valuable work being done by this mission in a locality hich urgently needs it. A year ago Rev. Wil- am H. Childs and a few Christian friends mmenced the work in faith by hiring a build- g which had formerly been a Jewish syna- gue. They held evangelistic services, opened Sunday-school, and went around among the ck and destitute, working for Christ. During e year about 36,000 persons have been counted the various services on Sunday and week ays. Over four hundred persons have made a rofession of faith, as the result of God's bless- g on the work, and many are now anxiously eking Christ. The most noteworthy feature the enterprise is that no one connected with receives any salary, the services being carried by voluntary workers. The collections and onations from friends who know the character the work, nearly covered the expense of rent id gas last year. A small balance of $52.66 is e to the Treasurer, Rev. Stephen Merritt, o Eighth Ave., New York, to whom donations ay be sent.

New Counterfeit Bills were Circulated in rge quantities in New York last week. They ere of the one-dollar denomination, and the graving was so exquisitely done as to deceive acticed bank-tellers. Several money-brokers ok them without question, and ordinary citi- ns were easily victimized. The Government cret service officers in cautioning the public out the counterfeits, say that like the five- llar spurious bills, they cannot be detected by e engraving, which is absolutely perfect, but the paper on which they are printed. It is t "fibre paper" and therefore has not the rength of the genuine notes. Religious coun- rfeits have the same characteristic. The out- ard appearance is correct, and often deceives, t fibre is lacking and there is no strength in em. (II Timothy 3 : 5.)

A Victim of Mormon Fraud and Tyranny as found fainting in Chicago on July 15. She ld a pitiful story. She said her name was lizabeth Rutter, and she was a native of North ields, England. Six years ago her young son as cajoled by some Mormon missionaries there, id went with them to Utah, against the wishes his parents. His father heard reports which ndered him uneasy about the boy, and sus- cting that his letters were intercepted, resolv- l to go to Utah and rescue him. On his ar- val there he found that return was difficult, id he remained for a time working for a farm- . He wrote to his wife saying that he would turn as soon as he could, and giving a vivid count of the misery of Utah. The Mormons tercepted his letter, and forged one which ey sent in its place, urging his wife to come him. She suspected nothing and came. ortly after her arrival her husband was mur- red. He had imprudently revealed to a young Mormon his intention to escape, and his wife believes that he lost his life in consequence. The experience she had after his death so horrified her that she resolved to brave death rather than remain. She set out from Ogden, and walked the whole distance to Chicago, where, tired, and exhausted for lack of food, she fell fainting in the street. She was taken to the County Hospital, and when sufficiently recovered will be sent back to England. If Satan's victims, who are in bondage worse even than that of the Mormons, were similarly determined to escape they might be saved; for they are assured of the help of Christ. (Ps. 37 : 40.)

Buried Relics of Warfare were Exhumed in Broadway, New York, last week. A laborer digging in the trenches of the Phœnix Construction Company, which is laying electrical subway conduits, hit his shovel against a hard substance on July 18, in the excavation at Broadway and Warren Street. The hard substance turned out to be a six-pound cannon-ball incrusted with rust. The day before there were found in the same place an empty twelve-pound shell, two twelve-pound balls, two six-pounds shots, a trunnion ring eighteen inches across, and three inches thick, and an English penny. Each piece was thick with rust and hard deposits from the soil. Superintendent Robert R. Bushwick, who is in charge of the work, thinks there was a fort in ante-Revolutionary times along the present Warren Street line, and these projectiles were part of the stores which were not thought worth removal. The mementoes of past conflict were a strange spectacle amid the peaceful business surroundings of Broadway. They called to mind the fierce struggle waged for the freedom which we enjoy. The Christian, too, is liable to find in himself, even after Christ has delivered him from his bondage to Satan, traces of his enemy's occupation, in old appetites and desires, which were intended for his destruction. But unlike the British cannon-balls, they are still dangerous and have to be carefully watched against. (Galatians 5 : 1.)

An Octogenarian's Suicide was Reported in New York on July 16. Some eight years ago a prosperous farmer on Staten Island disposed of his farm and came to live in New York City. He invested a large part of the proceeds of the sale of his farm in setting up his son-in-law in business. The young man was not successful, and the ex-farmer continued making up the deficiency until all his property was gone. The son-in-law obtained a situation, and was able to support his family for some time, the father-in-law living with them. But he fell sick, and he and his wife died within a few months of each other. A Methodist church took compassion on the old man, who was now alone and penniless. They paid his rent for him, and in return he assisted the janitor of the church. That arrangement, however, was discontinued after a few months, through the old man's fault. Then he assisted the janitor of some offices in return for board and lodging, but last week he learned that the janitor was about to give up the charge of the offices, and was much depressed in consequence. He was eighty-six years of age, and was well aware how little chance there was of earning his own living. He said he thought he should starve. On July 17 he was found hanging from a beam in his room, quite dead. Bereft of family, and stripped of fortune, it was not surprising that the old man should have become depressed, but he would not have committed his terrible crime if he had trusted in God's promises. (Ps. 34 : 22.)

A City Belle's Death in a Poorhouse is Re- ported from Oxford, N. Y. A wealthy family in New York City was notified last week of the death of one of its most attractive members. She was a girl of great beauty and most winsome manners. Some years ago, while she was at a boarding-school at Richfield Springs, she made the acquaintance of a young man, far beneath her in position and education, and married him. She was ostracized by her family, but ultimately they relented and offered to forgive her and receive her back to her home if she would abandon her husband. She indignantly refused, and the couple, who were in extreme poverty, settled in a little shanty near Oxford. They managed to live by hard and menial labor until a few months ago, when both of them fell ill and were removed to the county poorhouse. The wife's relatives heard of it and went to her. They begged of her to return to her home, employing every inducement to get her to leave her husband and accept the comforts and luxuries they were ready to lavish upon her. She remaind true to her husband, however, and as the family would not invite him they had to return without her. In the poorhouse the wife stayed, but she grew worse, and on July 15 she died. Whatever her faults may have been it is impossible to withhold admiration for her fidelity to the husband she had chosen. Too often the Christian, who has far more reason than she to be faithful, is not proof against the allurements of wealth and luxury which Satan holds out to those who forsake their Lord. (Rev. 2:4).

The number of slaves set free in Brazil is estimated at over two millions. The Brazilian Legation at Washington has received despatches stating that the public rejoicing was most enthusiastic. The slaves, in the majority of cases, have arranged to work for wages in the employ of their former owners.

A new departure was taken on a recent Sunday by Rev. George T. Dowling, D. D., Pastor of Euclid Baptist Church, Cleveland, O., who invited all present who loved the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity and truth to unite with the Church at the Lord's table. Other Baptist ministers who have done this have been called to account for it, but it is thought that no action will be taken in Dr. Dowling's case.

SELF-INFLICTED WOUNDS.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"How long wilt thou cut thyself?" Jer. 47 : 5.

A Shocking Oriental Custom—Forbidden of God—I. A Question Asked in Despair—Of Church Members Doing Nothing for Christ—Of Backsliders—Of Men Neglecting Opportunities—Of Lost Souls—II. A Question Asked Hopefully—Of the Bereaved—A Quaker's Question to a Mourner—Of the Rebellious—A Conversation with a Gambler—Of the Jewish Nation—Of Souls Afflicted with Needless Fears—A Grandfather Demented by Despair.

TRAVELLERS in the East tell us that among the most melancholy scenes they witness is the following: Men inflict upon themselves very grievous voluntary wounds, and then exhibit themselves in public. They even disfigure themselves with gashes and cuts in the presence of excited throngs. I am speaking of what has occurred even within the last few years among the Moslems. When some great prophet or emir is coming that way, a certain number of fanatical Mahometans take swords, spears, and other sharp instruments, and gash themselves terribly therewith, cutting their breasts, their faces, their heads, and all parts of their bodies. Frequently they have taken care to dress themselves in white sheets, in order that, as the blood flows copiously from their bodies, it may be the more clearly seen, that they may become the more ghastly spectacles of misery, or the more fully display the religious excitement under which they labor. As everything in the East remains for ever the same, this carries us back to the olden times whereof we read in the Old Testament, when the priests of Baal, having cried in vain to their idol, cut themselves with lances and with knives. Thus they displayed their inward zeal, and thus, perhaps, they hoped to move the pity of their god. The Lord expressly forbade His people, the Jews, to perpetrate such folly. They were not even to shave the corners of their beards, or to hack their hair, as the Orientals do in the hour of their grief; and then they were further prohibited from injuring their bodies by the command, "Ye shall not make any cuttings in your flesh for the dead, nor print any marks upon you: I am the Lord." (Lev. 19 : 28.) Men in Eastern lands, not only in connection with fanaticism, but in reference to domestic affairs, will cut themselves to express their grief and anguish, or to make other people believe that they are feeling such grief and anguish. We congratulate ourselves that we are free from at least one foolish custom.

I. First, dear friends, I shall ask this question very despairingly: "How long wilt thou cut thyself?"—for very terribly, and will have to feel the wounds thereof for a long, long time; neither can we induce them to cease therefrom. I allude, first, to some professors of religion who have been church-members for ten, twenty, or more years, and yet have practically done nothing at all for the Saviour. If they were really to awaken to a sense of their neglect, I do not know how long they would be in anguish, or how deep would be their distress; for if Titus mourned that he had lost a day when he had done no good action for twenty-four hours, and he but a heathen, what would happen to a Christian if he were really to see his responsibility before God, and to feel that he has not only lost a day but a year—perhaps many years? Have not some of you well-nigh lost a whole lifetime?

Oh, if I am addressing such—and honestly in the sight of God I fear I am—then how long will you chasten yourselves for your neglect? It must be long before you can forgive yourselves for such wicked indolence. How long will you afflict yourselves to think that you should have suffered time which you can never recall, and opportunities which you will never enjoy again, to go by you wasted? Do I make you feel uncomfortable? I shall thank God if I do; and I shall be happy, indeed, if, instead of cutting yourselves with vain regrets, you lacerate yourselves with my sharp remarks as with spears and knives, and then gird up your loins, and say, "God helping me, there shall never be another wasted year, nay, nor another wasted day!"

The same may be applied, and applied very solemnly, too, to

Those who Backslide

—who, in addition to being useless, are injurious, because their example tends to hinder others from coming to Christ. Oh, if any of you that name the name of Jesus, and have been happy in His service, and have enjoyed high days and holy days in His presence, turn aside, I shall use this lamentation over you. The Lord will bring you back and save you, as I believe; but oh, how long will you cut yourselves? You will feel in after life how grievously you have injured your souls. David's great sin was put away so that he did not die, but he was never the same David as before. The Lord, out of very love to him, chastened him sorely, and pursued him with plague upon plague. His family became his dishonor and his sorrow. He went with broken bones to the grave—a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief. How grievously he had injured himself! How long he had to cut himself with anguish for that one sin!

What is true of David applies also to others who have in any great measure turned aside. Solomon, in a high degree, hurt himself by his terrible follies. In the New Testament, Peter is a conspicuous example. It is a tradition that whenever Peter heard the cock crow he used to weep; and I do not wonder at it. Alas! if you and I should ever be suffered to fall into grievous sin, it may be all done in ten minutes, but it cannot be got rid of in fifty years. We shall bear the scars of that ten minutes' sin until the Lord shall take us home, and permit us to wake up "without spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing," in the full likeness of our perfect Lord. Oh, my brethren, watch anxiously lest you have to mourn for years over the sin of an instant!

There is one thing which comes after these, and comes in connection with them. If you and I should know that souls have been lost—lost as far as we are concerned—how long should we cut ourselves on that account? A dear soul said to me yesterday, "My husband died. He had been a sad drunkard, but in his last illness, through the blessing of God upon those who visited him, I trust he found peace. He said he believed in the Lord Jesus, and there is my comfort. But oh, if he had died without finding Christ, I should have been indeed a widow! I know not what could have comforted me." I am grateful that our sister called in her Christian friends, and that, by their efforts and her prayers, she was spared the keenest edge of sorrow. "Surely the bitterness of death is past." But suppose you were to lose your son, and that, your son should die in sin which he learned of you; or in sin which you saw in him and never rebuked! Suppose I say, your son should die in his iniquity. Shall I tell you how you will behave yourself when the news comes to you that he is dead? You will get by yourself alone, and cry, like David, "O my son Absalom, my son, my son Absalom! would God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son!" You can lay your children down upon the bed all stark and cold, and follow them to the tomb, and even sing as you commit their mortal remains to the grave, when you know that they die in hope; but if they perish in their sin, guilty, red-handed, unforgiven, what will you say to yourselves?

A Tradesman's Self Reproach.

These are solemn things, but there is deep truth in them, and they ought to be considered by all of you who profess to be Christians. I knew one who used to have a man calling upon him in the way of business, and bringing certain articles which he bought across the counter. This tradesman said one day to himself, "I have dealt with that man for nine or ten years, and we have scarcely passed the time of day. He has brou in his work, and I have paid him across counter, but I have never tried to do him good. Surely this cannot be right. Provide has put him in my way, and I ought at least have asked him whether he is saved in Chri Well, the next time the man came, our g brother's spirit failed him, and he did not to begin a religious conversation. The n never came again, but a boy brought in the n lot of goods, "How is this?" said the sh keeper. "Father is dead," said the boy. friend, the shopkeeper, said to me, "I co never forgive myself. I could not stay in shop that day. I felt that I was guilty of t man's blood. But I had not thought of it fore. How can I ever clear myself from guilty fact that, when I did think of it, ungracious timidity prevented me from open my mouth." My own dear friends do not bri upon yourselves such cutting regrets!

Eternal Regret.

One other most solemn use may be ma of this question: God grant that it m never be so, but if any one of you should die his sins, how long will you regret it, think yo It looks dreadfully possible that some of you w perish for ever, since you have so often been treated to come to Christ, and have never con O souls, how long—how long will you grie and mourn when it shall come to this? Accor ing to my reading of that book—and I wou gladly read it otherwise if I did not feel th truth and honesty forbid me to do so—your lo your anguish will be for ever. For ever you w cut yourselves. For ever will you lament th when the opportunity was so near you, y put it away from you, and when Christ w ready to receive you, you would not be r ceived, but committed eternal suicide.

II. There I leave this very painful use of t text, to try and use it at greater length in happier sort, by way of consolation and hopef comfort to those who will, we trust, be soo brought to receive the Lord Jesus. "How lon wilt thou cut thyself?" I shall ask this que tion hopefully, trusting that in many the sorrow is nearing its end. This text may very profitably and prudently applied to tho who have been bereaved, and who, being bereave sorrow, and sorrow to excess. I hope that am not about to say a harsh word, but I woul deal faithfully with Rebellious Repining.

"Jesus wept," and he that does not weep whe he loses a dear one must be something less tha a man, and unworthy to be called a Christia But there is such a thing as carrying to a extreme our sorrow for those we lose, till becomes rebellion against God. You remembe the Quaker saying to the lady who was wearin very deep double mourning years after one her children had died, "Madam, hast thou n forgiven God yet?" And there is truth abou that remark; some do not forgive God for wha He has done. Their sorrow amounts to this—that they have a quarrel with God over His dis pensations. "How can He be good and hav taken away my mother?" said one to m "How can God be good and have taken awa my child?" cried another.

There is a want of faith, a want of reverence a want of love, a want of many sweet and plac graces, in such mourning as that; and, without dwelling long upon it, I beg to put that que tion to any mourner here who is mourning with the ungodly sorrowing of the heathen—as if there were no hope. "How long wilt thou cut thyself?" Is not thy child in Jesus' bosom? Has not thy friend gone among the angels, to join the sweet singers of God? Put away thy disputing and murmuring, and either, like Aaron, hold thy peace, or better still, like Job, bless the name of the Lord, and rejoice in thy God.

But now, turning to quite another character, I would use the same expression for another purpose. There are some persons with whom God is dealing in great love, and yet they are rebellious. They persevere in known sin, ough the evil way has become exceedingly to them. They seem as if they would over red-hot ploughshares to hell. I have n some who have found the pleasures h once delighted them to become a nuis-e, a trouble, a pain, a disgust, and a weari-; and yet they continue in their unprofit-course. They are following a wild course fe, and they are losing money at it, and they ikely to lose much more. They are plung-down. What are they thinking of? "How wilt thou cut thyself?" Already they have with great disasters and misfortunes; they meet with many more. When the dogs are hunting, they run in packs. The plagues Egypt are ten at least, and every one who s the Pharaoh may expect the full number.

A Gambler's Hope.

oke some time ago with the son of a very y man. He seemed to be an infidel out-t, and had taken to horse-racing, and the My inmost soul was grieved concerning : I could have wept. As he talked very ly, and mild words were lost on him, I said im, "Keep as many race-horses as you can, go in for gambling most heartily, for thus sooner you will lose all your money. Some ligals never come back to the Father's se until they sink as low as the pig's trough, that is probably the way for you. When get a hungry belly, I trust you will come e." you should be despairing, that you should be tempted to blaspheme, and all that. I know that some who have come to Christ have endured such misery, but I defy you to prove that it is any part of the gospel, and that we are to preach up such an experience as a necessary preface to believing in Christ. The case is far otherwise. Hear me, and be not obstinately wedded to your wretchedness. You are a sinner: you cannot question that fact. Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners. If you trust him—you are saved. This, in brief, is the glad tidings of salvation. This is

The Gospel Way.

Who has required at your hands that you should despond?

"Oh," said one to me, "I cannot think that the way can be so plain, for my grandfather was so miserable for years that they had to put him into a lunatic asylum, before he found the Saviour." You smile, but the good woman who told me this was in terrible earnest. I cannot help quoting what she said, for it was the natural and outspoken form of an error which lurks in thousands of minds. I believe that many think they must be driven near to madness, or they will not be able to come to Christ. But what benefit could this despair possibly be to you? If the gospel were, "Doubt and be saved," I would bid you doubt. And if it were, "Despair and be saved," I would preach up despair to you with all my might, though it might go a little against the grain. But it is not so written. The scripture is, "Believe: trust: confide: rely. Trust in Jesus—and you are saved."

A sick man is dying, and the physician says, "Here is medicine that will restore you; will you take it?" The dying man answers, "Sir, I believe in your medicine, but I will not take it till I feel better." If that man dies, who murders him? Shall the physician be blamed? Surely not. On his own head his death must lie. And recollect that it will be as certainly your ruin to refuse Christ because you want to be better, as it will be to refuse Him from any other reason. Any reason which leads you to reject the Lord Jesus is a bad one. One man refuses Christ because he hates Him, and he blasphemes Him; another refuses Him because he thinks that he must be a little better; there may be a difference in the motive, but the result will amount to the same thing. Take heed, I pray you, lest through your pride in refusing to receive the gospel just now, and just as you are, you should put it away from you till you get where there will be no gospel preaching, and no invitations to Christ, and you are cast away for ever.

Now let me ask you this question: what good have you got by all this up till now? O you, good sir, who always mean to have Christ by-and-by, how much farther have you got after all your good intentions and painful waitings? You used to sit in that pew, twelve, fifteen, twenty years ago, may.ap; and even then you had hopeful resolves. Are you any nearer Christ now than you were then? Say, does the preaching affect you any more than it did in those bygone days? "No" say you, "not so much." This is what does it mean? Has the preacher changed? I will take my share of the blame. I grow older, I know. Perhaps I get more stupid too; but still, when I sat yesterday to see the converts coming to join the church, I saw them till I had not physical power to see any more, for God had brought so many to come and tell me that I had led them to the Saviour. Therefore I think that there cannot be much difference in my preaching. It must be you that are getting hard! I fear you are getting chilled into indifference, and I pray that the deadly process may go no further.

Would to God that you, my dear hearers, would leave all things else, and just come and cast yourselves on Jesus! If you will not, I must again persecute each one of you with this inquiry, "How long wilt thou cut thyself?" How long must you go on with your piteous prayers, and get no answer? Must you have more tears, more groans, more cries, more despairs, more regrets, more broken vows? How long will you cut yourselves with these vain attempts to be your own Saviour? How long? How long? God end it ere you cross the portal of this house of prayer, and go down those stone steps, which will again conduct you to the level of a careless world! Stop here till you have yielded yourself to Jesus. I beseech you not to go home a stranger to eternal life. The Lord grant that you may now throw yourself into the arms of Jesus, for His dear name's sake!

THE REVIVAL IN GERMANY.*

THE remarkable wave of evangelical revival that has passed over Germany during the past few years, presents a very hopeful feature in the hold it has taken on the younger generation. In 1883 twelve Christian young men met in Berlin, and Herr von Schlümbach said, "Could we not organize a Young Men's Christian Association, as they have in England and America? We shall want men and money, but let us go to Him who can give us both." So these twelve disciples formed themselves into a Christian Association, which now numbers about a thousand members, and is doing excellent work in that great city. Similar associations have been formed in other towns in Germany, one of the most earnest and successful being at Cöthen, near Halle, which began with six members, and has now over a hundred. There they have erected a building of their own, and to assist in defraying the cost of this undertaking, Herr Pastor Westphal, of Cothen, secured the co-operation of eighteen of the ablest evangelical preachers in producing a volume of sermons, to be published on behalf of their "Evangelisches Vareinshaus," and do good work for the Master at the same time. Thus this volume came into existence.

Tholuck's Heroic Work.

These meditations on our Lord's sufferings have a special value in showing what the ordinary teaching in the evangelical pulpits of Germany is at the present day. The gospel is preached with fullness, with power, in all simplicity and faithfulness, and the Cross is the standard round which the soldiers of Christ are rallying. The influence of Strauss has been dead for many years in Germany, and the last nail driven into the coffin of the Tübinger theology. The life of Dr. August Tholuck affords an interesting illustration of this change. When appointed professor of theology in the University of Halle, in 1826, a protest was entered by all the professors, including such men as Gesenius, and the whole of the students except five (the only ones who believed in the divinity of Christ), the sole ground of their opposition being Tholuck's evangelical belief. The Government refused the prayer of the petition, but Perthes wrote of the young professor: "His adversaries are bold and cunning. A baptism of fire awaits him at Halle." So it proved; but in 1870 what did we find? Evangelical belief in the ascendency, and all Halle en fête for three days, to do honor to Professor Tholuck, whose Christian teaching largely wrought this revolution in the religious thought of the country. On the occasion of this jubilee, the universities poured congratulations and honors upon him; Court Preacher Hoffman brought him the salutations of the Ecclesiastical Council; the Emperor William conferred on him the Order of the Red Eagle. When, in 1878, the noble and sainted teacher was taken away, all Protestant Germany realized that a Prince had fallen in Israel.

The reaction against rationalism was not entirely owing to Tholuck's influence, but he was one of the greatest teachers that God ever raised up in a time of spiritual darkness, and did a work the results of which we see to-day in the Protestant pulpits of Germany. "I have had but one passion," said he, "and that is Christ, and Christ alone. Every one out of Christ I look upon as a fortress which I must storm and win."

How National Ruin Comes.

"Away with the Man, and release unto us Barabbas!" Where this cry is heard, where Christ is driven from heart and home, from country and nation, then that day it becomes darker, and they seek in vain for healing and salvation. Away with Him! This was proposed in France at the end of the last century. We will destroy and reform all things without Thee; we will be left alone with our reason. Leave our houses, our councils, our schools—away with Thee! Then we ourselves shall rule! "Your will be done'" said the Lord; and the world of existing states fell into ruins! "Away with this man, and release unto us Barabbas!" Away with all that is holy and noble, Divine and Christian. In our own nation also, we heard this cry from the depths, by many thousands of voices. We hear it now again from a neighboring country. God has warned us in good time: the wild waters are assuaged; the cries have become fainter.

MR. LEVI P. MORTON,

Republican Candidate for Vice-President.

THE Republican nominee for the Vice-Presidency, is the well-known New York banker, of the firm of Morton, Bliss & Co. He is sixty-four years of age, having been born at Shoreham, Vt., May 16, 1824. His father was Rev. Daniel O. Morton, a Congregational minister, and a lineal descendant of George Morton, one of the Puritan Fathers, who came to this country from England in 1623. The boy received only a common-school education, and early began business life as a dry-goods clerk, in Concord, N. H. He commenced business on his own account in that town in 1845, but four years later removed to Boston, and afterward to New York. In the last named city the firm became financially involved, and compromised with its creditors at fifty cents on the dollar. Some years afterward each of these creditors received from Mr. Morton an invitation to dinner, and each man found on his plate an envelope containing the amount he had lost, with interest. At that time Mr. Morton had commenced business as a banker, and was prospering. His partner in New York was Mr. George Bliss, and in London, Sir John Rose. The firm materially aided the United States Government in funding the Public Debt, and in resuming specie payments.

Mr. Morton did not enter political life until 1876, when he ran for Congress, but was defeated. Two years later he was again a candidate, and was elected. He took a prominent part in the discussion of financial questions, and rendered valuable service, independent of party, to the nation at large in that department. On the accession of President Garfield, Mr. Morton was made Minister to France, and while there, hammered the first rivet in the Statue of Liberty, presented by French citizens to the city of New York. On his retirement from Paris, he was highly complimented by the French Government and the American colony there. As is well known, Mr. Morton has made many munificent charitable gifts, one of the most conspicuous of which being a quarter of the cost of freighting the Constellation with corn for the starving poor of Ireland in 1880.

EX-SENATOR ALLEN G. THURMAN,

Democratic Candidate for Vice-President.

THE Democratic nominee for the Vice-Presidency needs no introduction to American readers. He has been so long in political life and has been so outspoken in his opinions, that he is among the best known of our statesmen. He is now in his seventy-fifth year, having been born November 13, 1813, at Lynchburg, Va. The family removed to Chillicothe, O., in 1819, where the boy was sent to the Academy. At the same time he gained a thorough knowledge of French from a little playmate, who with her father, a French refugee, were hospitably received in the Thurman home. After leaving the Academy, the boy studied law for three years in the office of his uncle, William Allen. Subsequently he became private Secretary to Governor Lucas. He continued his law studies, however, and in 1835 was admitted to the Bar.

Mr. Thurman's introduction to political life occured in 1844, when, without his knowledge, he was nominated for Congress and was elected. At the close of his term he was offered a renomination, but declined it and returned to his law practice. In 1851 he was elected to his second public office—that of Judge of the Supreme Court of Ohio, which he filled for four years, the last two as Chief Justice. He again declined renomination and returned to the Bar. His decisions as Chief Justice had added so much to his fame that his services commanded high fees, and for the first time in his life Mr. Thurman found himself with a competent income.

In 1867 Mr. Thurman ran against Mr. Rutherford B. Hayes for Governor of Ohio, but was defeated. A Democratic Legislature was however elected which sent Mr. Thurman to the United States Senate, and he was re-elected at the end of his term, serving till March, 1881, when John Sherman succeeded him. He wa member of the Electoral Commission of 187

OWEN LITTLE'S VINDICATION.

"THERE is a chance for you now, my bo said Mr. Little, a hard-working farmer.

"What is it, father?" Owen asked.

"Your uncle Hadleigh has offered to take into his store," said Mr. Little. "If you have, it will be the making of you. With son of his own to take to the business, you mi drop into a good thing there if he takes a fa to you. But he's a smart man, and he'll take fancy to you unless you work well and h your wits about you. That's so, isn't, mothe

Mrs. Little nodded her confirmation and not trust herself to speak. She knew t Owen would be on the way to fortune with brother and that he would never do any g on the farm; but she did not like to lose boy. Besides, he had recently shown a conc about his soul, and to send him away from Christian influence into the home of her broth who was a worldly man, engrossed in busin involved a danger she shuddered to think of

Two weeks later Owen was in Mr. Hadlei store being initiated into the rudiments of grocery business. All but one of the ot clerks lived out-of-doors, and he, a young n named Norris, conceived a dislike for Ow from the first as an interloper who by reason his relationship to Mr. Hadleigh would be lik to become a favorite.

The first few months of Owen's life in his cle's home passed uneventfully. Owen tried utmost to learn his duties, but mistakes wo necessarily arise from his inexperience, these Norris made the most of in his reports. M Hadleigh, too, disliked the boy. She was judiced against religion, and at once percei that Owen was "infected" with it. About an hour later, Mr. Hadleigh, having handed Norris over to the police, paid another visit to the sick boy. No doctor nor doctor's medicine could have done so much for the sufferer as did that visit. Clarice found him the next morning radiant with joy, and together they thanked God, who knoweth how to deliver them that trust in Him.

THE EPOCHS OF A LIFE.

By Rev. L. S. Keyser.

A New Light.

THE news of the adventure spread rapidly through the college, and Hadley found that he was regarded as a veritable hero. One and another congratulated him on his brilliant feat, and praised his courage and presence of mind. The only note of depreciation came from his rival, Duneman, who hinted that these stories of rescue were always exaggerated after the event, and probably there was not so much heroism in this as was made to appear. Hadley was inclined, at first, to believe Duneman's ill-natured remark, which was reported to him, sprang from his academic rivalry, but when, a day or two afterward, he saw Duneman speak to Miss Winters, and accompanying her from the college to her rooms, he suspected that it was another kind of rivalry which was stirring his enemy.

Certain it was that Duneman could be regarded in no other light, for his animosity against Madelling was displayed whenever an opportunity occurred, and he frequently made an opportunity when one was not provided. If, as he would have had it supposed, he was concerned for the religious welfare of his fellow-students and was apprehensive of the mischievous effects of Hadley's sceptical opinions on their minds, it seemed strange that he should so often endeavor to provoke him to their utterance. It appeared that he was rather desirous to force Hadley to go on record as an infidel and to have him well known in the college in that light. It might be that he wished him to be ostracized, or it might be that he hoped to gain some glory for himself, as the champion of religion, or there might be other reasons. However, that might be, he always endeavored to give any subject under consideration a religious turn, and then to wait expectantly for Hadley's rejoinder, to which he would make a reply pointed with personal insult.

One of these altercations occurred on the following Friday evening, at the Athenæum Society, and at its conclusion Hadley came away exasperated at the man's persistent persecution, and angry with himself for having been moved by him to a display of anger. He had not walked many yards when he overtook Belle Havelock. There was no one who would be more likely to sympathize with him in his present mood, and he joined her willingly in her walk. He told her what had occurred at the Society and marked the contemptuous expression which sat on her fine features as she listened.

"You should put an end to this," she said, "by boldly avowing your opinions and declaring war upon superstition. Mr. Duneman's aggressive personal campaign against you relieves you of responsibility. No man can be blamed for defending himself against unprovoked attack."

That was Hadley's own impulse in his irritated state of mind, and under Miss Havelock's influence he almost resolved upon taking her advice. He was held back, however, by a consideration he did not care to avow to her. He had an intuition that in declaring himself he would prejudice Miss Winters against him, and he was reluctant to lose the position in her good opinion which he flattered himself that he had attained. Miss Havelock would undoubtedly have treated such a restraining influence with scorn had he confessed it. Besides, he would have felt some delicacy about introducing Miss Winters' name in the conversation, his own having been so publicly associated with hers in the college and in the local papers by his saving her life, and it was strange, too, that Belle did not speak of the rescue at this first meeting after the occurrence. Acquaintances with whom he was not nearly as intimate as he was with her had overwhelmed him with congratulations; but Belle, who must have known of it, did not even allude to it. Her silence mystified him.

On returning to his rooms, Hadley found Dane as much irritated as himself by the affair at the Athenæum. He, too, perceived the personal animosity of Duneman's persistent attacks, and was as eager as Belle Havelock was to have Hadley declare open war. It seemed as if circumstances were also conspiring to bring about such a result, for on the following Sunday morning fresh fuel was added to the fire. The two young men had agreed to go to a somewhat celebrated Sunday-school connected with one of the churches. They were at once recognized as college students and were taken to the Bible-class.

A man of some intelligence was the teacher of the class. The young men, being strangers, listened quietly, to the remarks made upon the lesson. Several questions of a non-committal character were addressed to them, and they answered them in a non-committal way. Presently a point of some interest was raised. A member of the class, perhaps more acute than the rest, remarked:

"The sceptic would not accept that doctrine."

In an instant the young men were all attention. They were anxious to learn how the teacher would vindicate the Scripture against an objection. To their disappointment, not to say disgust, he replied dognatically:

"He would have to accept it, for it is a plain statement of the Word of God."

"Ah, yes, that is true enough," replied the first speaker, "but the sceptic would dispute your premises; he would deny the authority of the Bible, and to quote it to him as an argument would only be a begging of the question. How would you answer him in that case?"

"I would have nothing whatever to do with him," retorted the teacher, curtly, with a defiant glitter in his eye. "I wouldn't stop to talk to a man who denies the authority of God's Word."

"Yes, but he will not admit that the Bible is the Word of God," persisted the other speaker.

"I tell you, I shouldn't bother with a caviler at the Bible. Any man who has gotten to such a degraded level as to deny the Word of the Almighty is not worth my time or attention."

"What! would you not try to explain."

"No; I should explain nothing," replied the teacher. "He is not honest in his infidelity, and I should dismiss him forthwith, without ceremony. The Bible says that we are not to cast our pearls before swine."

This was too much for Hadley, who was naturally of a quick and impetous temper, and he could not restrain himself. His face became hot and crimson with anger, and his eyes snapped with defiance.

"That proves, sir, that you are—an insufferable bigot!" he burst out, in a voice tense with suppressed wrath.

In a moment every eye was bent upon Hadley's flushed face. Some of the members of the class were evidently shocked, while it was just as obvious that others sympathized with his indignant outburst; the face of the teacher twitched painfully. There was anger in his voice as he said authoritively:

"Young man, remember that you are in God's house, and it is not to be desecrated by such—such vile language; and remember that this is my class and no such impertinence can be allowed here."

"Then I shall leave it, and never enter this nest of bigots again!" retorted Hadley, and grasping his hat, he walked haughtily out of the door, with his inseparable companion, George Dane, close at his heels.

"What a hot-headed Boanerges you are!" exclaimed Dane as the two young men were clear of the churchyard. "Will you never learn to control yourself? There was no reason for telling that fellow what you thought of him."

"I could not help it," said Hadley. "His supercilious air and the dogmatic tone of his teaching were simply unbearable. Why cannot believers understand that unbelief is not necessarily perversity? The very essence of this man's belief is the right to think for himself. Two or three centuries ago he would have been required to believe the superstitions of the Roman Catholic Church, and if he had answered 'I cannot,' he would have been denounced as a heretic and most likely would have been burned. He would have been loud then in favor of the right of private judgment, yet now he says men who exercise it are on a degraded level. We are on the same line as all Protestants; we only go one step further. They claim the right to believe or reject any doctrine outside the Bible, we contend that the Bible also shall be tested. There is no difference in principle."

"That is so," said Dane. "If I were convinced that the Bible was issued by the Creator of the world, I, for one, would accept it in bulk, and be guided by it; a man would be wicked as well as foolish to do otherwise. But while we have no proof that it is issued by Him, we must ascertain whether the claims made for it are substantiated. When Christians refuse to argue that, and object to an examination, what are we to infer? I should say they are aware that it will not bear critical examination."

"That is the only logical conclusion, and such talk as that of the teacher to-day inclines me to suspicion at once. After that, one is disposed to examine it in a hostile spirit, while before one would have given it an impartial hearing."

The remainder of the day the young men spent in the rooms, deep in the study of a recently published attack on the doctrine of the inspiration of the Bible. In the evening Dane went to church alone, and Hadley went to call on Miss Havelock by previous arrangement. Dane was the first to return, and he waited somewhat impatiently for his room-mate. At length Hadley came in, looking dull and gloomy.

"Hadley, my boy," he said, "you have missed a treat. I wish you had been with me. I have actually heard a sermon that has done me good."

"A sermon!" exclaimed Hadley. "How could a sermon do you good? Perhaps it sent you to sleep, and that did you good; I cannot imagine a sermon benefiting you in any other way."

"Not at all, sir; it was a kindly and sympathetic talk for the benefit of honest doubters. The preacher is obviously a man of ability and culture, and, more than all, he is endued with a large and generous nature. It was strange, almost phenomenal, to hear a pulpit man talk as he did. He told us that he had little commiseration for the frivolous niggler at religion, but for the 'honest doubter' he had the deepest sympathy, the highest respect, and the most glowing hope. Yes, sir, these are his very words."

"Honest doubter!" echoed Hadley, in genuine astonishment. "Did he concede that there are such specimens in the market? Well, that is the most liberal concession I ever heard from the lips of a preacher. I shall be interested to know what such a wonderful man had to say."

"I will only give you a few of the leading thoughts. He had something to say about the lack of information among many opposers of religion, although he said everything in a very kind spirit."

"Did he not say," broke in Hadley at this point, "that these young men are immoral, vile, conceited, big-headed and pig-headed?"

"No, sir; he used no epithets, I assure you. He spoke as if he loved the sceptic, and had a message of incalculable importance for him, and his only comment upon the mental inability of the young men to whom he referred was that they had not yet had time to give the difficulties that thorough examination which they deserved. His tone was supremely kind."

"Excellent! A noble spirit!" exclaimed Hadley, with animation. "And you say the preacher really used the words 'honest doubters'?"

"Oh yes! and meant it, too. And he read the church members a sound lecture on the evil they were doing in abusing sceptics, instead of treating them kindly, and showing them the open door of truth."

The surprise and pleasure with which Hadley heard this report were visible in the expressions playing over his features. "But how did he ever come to understandsour feelings so well?" he asked.

"Oh, his analytical skill is easily accounted for," observed George. "After he had modestly excused himself for making several personal allusions, he described his own life of unbelief in a few terse and graphic sentences. He said that he had traversed the arid waste-lands of doubt, pursuing one iris-tinted bubble after another, until, disappointed and heart-sick, he had turned to the fertile fields of religion; and he could therefore speak upon the subject with some degree of authority."

"Is it possible," queried Hadley, "t person can go through all this experience yet become a believer? I do not unders Did he point out a way by which one escape from this 'arid land of doubt,' a calls it?"

"He did," replied George. "He said was only one door of escape from the labyr and only two ways to the door—one direct one indirect. The indirect, a difficult and cuitous path, was through investigation—a of works on both sides of the question. H us hard there, for he said he had found sceptics generally read works on one side That, you must admit, is our case precisely

Hadley glanced up at their library and a ted that it was so. "Did he suggest any works on the side of the Bible?" he asked

"Yes; he said he wanted to avoid all ap ance of acting the pedagogue, but for the fit of any sceptics who might be in the aud he would name some books that might be ful. Not to say anything of such old and known works as Bishop Butler's, Wi Paley's, Bishop Home's, and Archbi Whateley's, which are still valuable, but what outgrown by modern discoveries desired to call special attention to ' ern Doubt and Christian Belief,' a that it would do any inquirer after truth to read; Professor Fisher's 'Supernatural O of Christianity"; Rawlinson's 'Historical dences'; and Dr. Schaff on 'The Perso Christ.' He also said that the man who perplexed by the modern scientific objectio the Bible would find a recent little work e led 'The Ages before Moses' very hel These were all the works he thought it n sary to mention, although he had to omit invaluable works from his brief catalogue. investigator would soon discover them a prosecuted his inquiries."

"And did he maintain that any sceptic travelled the route he mapped out would 'the undiscovered country' at last?"

"He said that he believes it would effe willingness on the part of the doubter to the direct path to the door which he had f infallible."

"What was that?" asked Hadley, anxio

"Well," said George, in a subdued voice, told us that there is only one way to find truth beyond a doubt, and that is—on knees."

An expression of blank surprise passed Hadley's countenance, then a cloud gathere his brow, which was succeeded by a scor curl of his lip and an angry gleam in his At first he was too much taken aback to sp but presently he broke out into a dry, mecha laugh, and said:

"Ha! ha! Dane; it was the old story of mountain in labor, then, after all. And that the contemptible mouse then? The comm place chatter of the whole tribe! Well it is disappointing. I thought this man must ha guiding light, but if that is the conclusion, it is an ignis fatuus for certain. How is a to pray if he is not sure there is a God to him? He reverses the natural process of duct."

"Yes; it seems so to me now. In listenin him, however, one could not but think that man was honest. It was as if, having mad own escape, he was telling some prisoner he did it. Not attempting to explain or jus but simply to narrate. I tell you it was touching. I should like you to hear him."

"I will," said Hadley. "We will go Sunday night. If he has any real light to g this miserable man will be thankful for it."

THE BURNT OFFERING.

S. Lesson for Aug. 5, Levit. 1 : 1-9. Golden Text, Isa. 53 : 6.

eshadowings of the Great Atonement—Only the erfect Acceptable—Must be Voluntary—The lace of Offering—Identification Required—Sub-itution Implied—The Manner of Sacrificing—ne Offerer Himself to Kill—The Perpetual Fire A Type of the Holy Ghost—The Meat Offer g a Type of Christ—Sharers with God—Sta-hanksgivings Not Acceptable—The Sin and respass Offerings—Their Lesson of the Holi-ess of God.

ALL we, like sheep, have gone astray; we e turned every one to his own way; the Lord h laid on Him the iniquity of us all." (Isa. 6.) All the sacrifices under the law of Moses shadow the great coming sacrifice of Christ, one great Offering for a world's sin. The nt offering is the most perfect of them all. It is great type of Christ, the perfect Man, a Sub-ute for imperfect fallen humanity.

he highest form of the burnt offering was "of herd." "If his offering be a burnt sacrifice he herd, let him offer a male without blem-" "Ye shall offer at your own will a male hout blemish . . . . . But whatsoever hath a mish, that shall he not offer; for it shall not acceptable for you . . . . . it shall be

v. 22 : 19-21.) It was the complaint of God ough Malachi, the last prophet under the old pensation, "If ye offer the blind for sacrifice, t not evil? And if ye offer the lame, and the k, is it not evil? Offer it now unto thy gov-or: will he be pleased with thee, or accept persons? saith the Lord of hosts." (Mal. 8.) There was nothing perfect in humanity en sin had entered in, and so Jesus, the sin-'s Friend, came down from heaven and took on Him our flesh, that we might have an offer-to bring to God, which should be perfect, it it might be accepted. All praise and honor His great name of Love!

'He shall offer it of his own voluntary will." st as God will accept nothing that is imper-t, so He will accept nothing that is unwilling, by constraint. God complains of those who of God's service, "What a weariness it is?" al. 1 : 13), and of such as grudge the little oney and the little time which they may give the service of the Lord, "With their mouth ey show much love, but their heart goeth af-their covetousness." (Ezek. 23 : 31.) Their art is not in what they do. When we think the mass of outward professors who attend r churches and chapels, and of how many ongst them take credit to themselves for eir piety, all of which is an imperfect and erefore unacceptable offering—Oh, how awful the thought of the moment when they shall undeceived, and shall find that all the out-rd religion they have had, everything which is not really touched God, dealt with God, and en founded on the perfect sacrifice of Christ, ll be at fault in the great day of account! nd then, even among believers, every penny udged, every hour of time given unwillingly the service of God, although offered, has not ully been accepted by Him! "God is a Spirit. d they that worship Him must worship Him spirit and in truth." (John 4 : 24.) The burnt fering must be offered only in one place, "at e door of the tabernacle of the congregation fore the Lord."

"And he shall put his hand upon the head of e burnt offering; and it shall be accepted for im to make atonement for him." This was in rder that the man who offered might be r made one with the offering; that it might e accepted as though it were himself, and dealt ith as he acknowledged he should be dealt ith. There is no room for personal merit here. Ve are accepted of God and forgiven our sins, ot because of what we are, but because of what hrist is; our prayers are heard, and our offer-gs accepted as though prayed and offered by Him, the perfect One. Because He died for us, we, as identified with Him, are treated by God as though we had died for our sins, and so we are "crucified with Christ" by being identified with Him, we are made to sit with Him in heavenly places. (Eph. 2 : 6.) But if we are offering the sacrifice of some little zeal or love or energy, or anything else that we possess, except as identified with Him, and making part of Him, we are detracting from the value and the glory of Jesus, and setting up, in a measure, on our own account. It must be of our own voluntary will, and not because we are driven to it by sheer necessity, that we thus identify ourselves with Him.

Once the identification complete, then the bullock must be killed before the Lord, and the blood—which is the life thereof—must be sprinkled round about the altar. It is the blood which maketh an atonement for the soul (Lev. 17 : 2). The man who offers must kill the bullock and "flay the burnt offering, and cut it into his pieces." And the sons of Aaron, the priest, must put fire on the altar, lay the wood in order, and cover the pieces of the sacrifice in order upon the wood; and, last of all, the inwards, the type of the will and the affections, must be burnt upon the altar, and all consumed with the Holy fire of God. Thus Jesus' members were consumed, used up for God, and thus His will and heart's affections all served their true purpose, and the savor of His sacrifice is ever going up to God, and cementing the unity between God and man, which He has brought about. It is only as identified with Him, only as washed by His blood, and as members of His body, that we are in a position to present our "bodies a living sacrifice," and to yield our members as "instruments of righteousness unto God." The burnt offering was to be offered morning and evening, perpetual burnt offering. And it becomes us continually, daily, and more than daily, to remember with thanksgiving how our blessed and perfect Sacrifice has brought nigh unto God all who will identify themselves with Him.

The burnt offering was so called "because of the burning upon the altar all night unto the morning. . . . And the fire upon the altar shall be burning in it.

It Shall not be Put Out, and the priest shall burn wood on it every morning, and lay the burnt offering in order upon it. . . . The fire shall ever be burning upon the altar; it shall never go out." (Lev. 6: 9, 13.) That altar fire came down from heaven; it was a type of the Holy Ghost. The very identification of ourselves with Christ may become a mere dry, dead doctrine, but for the Holy Ghost, the Spirit of burning, who consumes and reduces to ashes all that is of man, that the perpetual communion with God may be kept up. There is always something more to be consumed. A perfectly renounced will has daily occasion to be consumed as the tests and trials of the day go on. The members and affections really given over to God have daily opportunities of yielding, and of being in new circumstances reduced to ashes, as the unbroken communion with God, the undying fire in the soul, burns on.

But Jesus is also the meat offering. This was a bloodless sacrifice, and consisted of the food used to sustain life—a beautiful type of Jesus as "the Bread of Life." A portion of this was offered upon the altar, and the remainder was the daily food of Aaron and his sons. God had His portion. It was a beautiful type of what we have in fellowship with God. Through our dear Lord we have not only peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ, but "the peace of God which passeth all understanding."

We Share with God.

Not only have we joy in God, but Jesus says, "that My joy may remain in you, and that your joy may be full." (John 15: 2.) We share His wisdom and His power. "Unto them which are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God, and the wisdom of God." Blessed, glorious provision! And Christ is the Peace Offering—the offering of one who is at peace with God, and in full communion. This may be either "for thanksgiving," or "a voluntary vow," and typifies the outflow of a heart full of love to God. If it is "for thanksgiving," it must be eaten the same day on which it is offered. Stale thanksgivings are not acceptable. (Lev. 7: 15.) If it be for a voluntary vow, it may be eaten the day of the offering, or the next day, but not on the third day, which is always the type of resurrection. No resurrection vows for God; they must be fresh, and accounts well paid up. "Pay that thou hast vowed."

There is another class of offering: the sin and the trespass offerings. Those we have already mentioned are offerings "of a sweet savor"; no such thing is said of these. They are the provision for sin. "If a soul shall sin through ignorance (a wilful sin is not even contemplated!) against any of the commandments of the Lord, concerning things which ought not to be done, and shall do against any of them, . . . then let him bring, for his sin which he hath sinned, a young bullock without blemish unto the Lord for a sin offering. The bullock was to be slain at the door of the tabernacle by the man who offered; he was to lay his hand upon its head in token of his identification with it; but this was not to be "of his own voluntary will," but by the will of God, who hates sin. The priest was to take the blood, and sprinkle it seven times before the Lord, before the veil of the sanctuary, and to put some of the blood upon the horns of the altar of sweet incense, lest God's communion with His people should be interrupted by the sin. All the blood was to be poured out at the altar of burnt offering, and then the whole bullock burned without the camp where the ashes are poured out. Only the inwards, type of the will and affections, are to be burned upon the altar—"A broken and a contrite heart, O God, Thou wilt not despise," but the members are not accepted by God; they are cast out, because God hates sin, and removes it away as far as the east is from the west. The sin offering and the trespass offering are wonderful types of how God can forgive and cleanse from sin, but, at the same time, they teach us how God hates the sin itself, how He is "of purer eyes than to behold evil," and cannot "look on iniquity." (Hos. 1: 13) The sin offering was not to be eaten. "No sin offering whereof any of the blood is brought into the tabernacle of the congregation to reconcile withal in the holy place, shall be eaten; it shall be burnt in the fire." (Lev. 6: 30.) Yet the trespass offering was to be eaten. The sin offering met the actual breaking of a commandment, the trespass offering met the sins of omission. God would have us, like Paul, exercise ourselves to have a conscience void of offence toward God and toward man. It is food for the priests of God when His children have a delicate conscience, and cannot tolerate the breath of sin upon them; nothing so helps religious teachers as tender consciences in themselves and others.

LANTERN LIGHTS.

"Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works and glorify your Father which is in heaven."—MATT. v., 16.

"The man who carries a lantern in a dark night may have friends all about him, walking safely by its rays and he be not defrauded. So, he who bears the God-given light of hope within his breast, may help on many others in this world's darkness, not to his own loss but to their precious gain."—Henry Ward Beecher.

Let your light shine out, O Christian,
Do not fear to let the ray
Send a gleam of dazzling brightness
Through the darkness of the way.
Lantern-like 'twill pierce the shadows,
Golden circles round you throw,
Chase the gloom from off the pathway,
Help you, as you onward go.

And though the distance may be short,
That the trembling beam may thread,
Yet 'twill light the step before thee,—
Just the step you need to tread.
And tho' small the space illumined,
Yet, within its kindly glow,
Many a friend it may encircle,
And to him the pathway show.

Your own path will be the brighter
That you helped your friends in this:
Guided them into the shining
Of the Sun of Righteousness;
Led the way to God's own city,
Where, with all the darkness riven,
You shall, with your friends rejoicing,
Come within the gates of Heaven.

"Lantern lights" amid the darkness,— Homely simile,—and yet,
It may teach us all a lesson
Which 'twere well ne'er to forget.
Suns nor stars, in this world shining,
Beacon lights we may not be:
Make us, loving Saviour, useful,
Humble "lantern lights" for Thee.

Christian Work in Mexico.

Through the reading of the Holy Scriptures translated into Spanish some earnest souls in Mexico have, by God's blessing, been led to a clear knowledge of the Gospel. From their numbers able preachers of the Christian faith in its primitive purity have been raised up, around whom congregations have been gathered from among the humble poor, who have been the first to publicly welcome and defend the pure Gospel in Mexico. The members of these congregations, rich in faith, have worked earnestly and bravely for Christ and His truth among their fellow countrymen in that beautiful Southern portion of North America called Mexico. Schools have been established by them, in which large numbers of bright boys and girls have received a good secular education and have been carefully taught the Christian faith. From the children thus educated faithful Christian workers have been raised up. A Mexican Branch of the Church of Christ, that maintains the faith in its purity and integrity, has been organized among these native Christians in the Republic of Mexico. The members of this Mexican Church of Christ, though gathered mostly from among the poor, are yet doing a most important Christian work. To continue that work, we need to pay a few leading workers small monthly salaries, and also to defray some current expenses. To raise the needed funds we have formed a society with an office at 43 Bible House, New York, U. S., and should be pleased to have many of our fellow Christians join this society by becoming regular contributors to its treasury. We are trying to secure monthly or quarterly contributions to meet the regular monthly expenses of the work. In order to continue and extend the work, we wish to raise four hundred dollars a month, by endeavoring to have four hundred persons each give on an average one dollar every month to this object, leaving the donors to give less or more as they may be able and willing.

We earnestly invite all who will, to join us in this systematic effort in behalf of the cause of Christ in Mexico, by becoming monthly subscribers to this fund. We have already regular subscribers whose gifts amount monthly to over eighty dollars, and a growing circle of friends who are forwarding us occasional donations.

This Mexican Church of Christ is a very effective instrumentality through which to do Christian work among the many millions on this Western Hemisphere who speak the Spanish language, comparatively few of whom have ever had a Bible in their hands. A beautiful church building has been secured in the City of Mexico as the centre of the activities of this Mexican Church of Christ. Through the workers connected with that centre more than forty congregations have been gathered from among the poor in different parts of the Republic of Mexico. We have some faithful and able preachers now in the field, but more young men need to be trained for the ministry. Multitudes of Protestant children in Mexico, some of them orphans, need to be educated. We make three requests of you, Christian reader: first, that you will, if possible, become a monthly or quarterly subscriber in behalf of this Christian work; second, that you will try and induce your friends also to contribute to it; third, that you will remember this precious work in Mexico in your prayers.

We most sincerely thank all who are already generously contributing to this Christian work for their timely and generous gifts, and we earnestly invite many others, to unite with us in aiding it by also becoming monthly subscribers in its behalf. Those who may not feel that they can give as much as a dollar a month are earnestly asked to give what they can, whenever they are able—EVERY LITTLE HELPS. Fellow Christian, if you will generously consent to contribute a dollar a month or more or less to the work, will you kindly inform me of the fact? Contributions either large or small can be mailed directly to my address as follows:

REV. PROFESSOR MACVICAR, PRESBYTERIAN COLLEGE, MONTREAL.

FOUR OF THE PROMINENT SPEAKERS AT THE RECENT PAN-PRESBYTERIAN COUNCIL.

THE PAN PRESBYTERIAN COUNCIL.

This year has been remarkable for the number of the religious councils which have been convened for earnest consultation on the best methods of conducting the aggressive campaign of the Church against the kingdom of Satan in the world. The Quadrennial Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in New York was followed by the International Missionary Conference in London, by the Pan Presbyterian Council, and by the gathering of the bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church. A notable feature of all these assemblies has been the spirit of brotherhood which has characterized them. The eminent men who have met together, while retaining their denominational lines and preferences, have manifested a desire rather to diminish than to magnify the denominational differences which separate them from evangelicals of other denominations. The activity and intensity displayed, and the objects at which they have aimed, are in the direction of winning souls at home and in heathen lands, from the bondage of Satan to the Liberty of Christ. The speakers have been urging their ministerial brethren to aim at making Christians rather than proselytes. Other religious bodies than that to which they belong have been spoken of rather as friendly rivals in the campaign of light against darkness, than as antagonists. This has been a most encouraging feature of the meetings, and is an augury of success. It leads us to hope that in before the coming of Christ, for the work of gathering out of the world of a people for Him will be a period unprecedented since apostolic days for harmonious, vigorous, and successful soul-winning. This activity is precisely what students of prophecy have long expected to be developed at this time, as the gospel must be proclaimed as a witness throughout the whole earth before the final consummation. Never were there so many missionaries at work as now; never so many volunteers to go out to heathen lands; and never so much money subscribed for the prosecution of missionary work. Godly men, who do not look for the speedy advent of the Lord, are stirred up to work by the love of souls, while those who have read correctly the signs of the times, are animated by still stronger motives for earnest labor, being convinced that the day is far spent, and the opportunity for gospel work is drawing to a close.

The Short Time that Now Remains

Prominent among the assemblies of the season is the fourth triennial Pan Presbyterian Council, comprising representatives of Presbyterian churches all over the world, which sat in London from July 2 to July 12. The delegates numbered three hundred, and represented twenty millions of members and adherents in different parts of the globe. Among the speakers, besides Dr. Dykes, who preached the opening sermon, were Pastor Monod, Rev. M. Pressensè, and Pastor Bersier, of Paris; Dr. Drummond, Dr. Dods, and Dr. Lang, of Glasgow; and besides representatives from Ireland and England and Wales, there were from America and Canada, Rev. Dr. Cavan, of Toronto; Dr. Drury and Dr. Schaff, of New York; Dr. Pierson and Dr. Cravan, of Philadelphia; Dr. Hoge, of Richmond; Dr. McVicar, of Montreal; Dr. Apple, Dr. Gill, Dr. Worden, Dr. Junkin, and others. From among the eminent leaders we select four—Dr. McVicar, Rev. Dr. Marshall Lang, Rev. Dr. Adolph Saphir, and Dr. Oswald Dykes—as fairly representative of this grand assembly, for illustration, and their portraits appear on the first page.

REV. J. MARSHALL LANG, D. D.

The Barony Church of Glasgow, Scotland, has become almost like the cathedral of Presbyterianism since the late Norman McLeod rendered it famous throughout the world by his powerful preaching, his magnetic character, and his magnificont power of organizing its people for Christian work. His successor is Rev. John Marshall Lang who led the discussion of "The Social Tendencies of the Age," which was one of the earliest questions before the Pan Presbyterian Council. He was born in Lanarkshire in 1834, so that he is now fifty-four years old. He was taught at home by tutors before going to the High School of Glasgow, from which he passed to the University, becoming years of age. Young as he was, he won an honorable place for himself there by his talents and industry. He had already decided what his life-work should be; he, too, would be a minister of the gospel. The Church required at that time an eight years' curriculum of all who sought to occupy her pulpits: four in the University and four in the Divinity Hall. Mr. Lang passed through such a curriculum, with credit to himself and gratification to his friends. He was licensed in 1855, and immediately afterwards was called to assist Dr. Clark in the ministerial and pastoral charge of Dunoon and Kilmun churches.

In May of the following year he was presented by the Town Council of Aberdeen to the care of the East Church in that city. The work was arduous and responsible, but he threw himself heartily into his new duties. The strain was, however, too great to be borne long. The minister's health threatened to give way. He was shut up to one of two alternatives: he must either do less, or remove to another sphere of service. He chose the latter and went to Fyvie, a parish which was distant some miles from Aberdeen, and which had a population of only 4,000. He spent in it six happy and useful years, following those methods which had made his father a model country minister.

His Fame Travelled to Glasgow, and he was asked to undertake the oversight of a new church there. He consented. The building was ready, but the congregation had to be gathered. He set himself to the task of gathering one; and in the course of two years the membership rose from nothing to upwards of 700. Circumstances subsequently induced him to remove to a church in the fashionable suburb of Morningside, Edinburgh, which was soon filled with an appreciative audience.

When in Morningside he was sent in 1873 on a deputation to the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Churches of the United States. He was received with open arms. Welcomed at first for the sake of the Church he represented, he was soon loved and respected for his own sake. His addresses roused great enthusiasm, and the tact with which he discharged the duties which fell to his lot won the admiration of his brethren on this side of the Atlantic. While in Albany, he heard of

The Death of Dr. Norman Macleod.

He and his companions mourned the fall of a "prince in Israel." Speculation was rife at once as to who would be the successor of the departed leader. It fell to the lot of Dr. Lang. The appointment was vested in the hands of the Queen, who, in compliance with the expressed desire of the Barony Church, appointed Dr. Lang. He has now been fifteen years in the Barony Church, and the glory of that centre of truth is not dimmed, nor is its activity abated.

DR. OSWALD DYKES.

The responsible office of Principal of the Presbyterian College in London is ably filled by Dr. Dykes, whose portrait is second of the four on the first page. Dr. Dykes is also a Scotchman, having been born in Renfrewshire some fifty-five years ago. His preliminary training was received at the Academy of Dumfries, whence he proceeded to Edinburgh University, where he graduated in Arts in 1853. Thence he proceeded to Germany, where he studied for about three years. In 1858, having been licensed by the Free Church, the young Scottish student became an ordained pastor at East Kilbride, where he ministered in the Gospel to an admiring flock for three years. His gifts soon gained for him a more important sphere, and he accepted a call in 1861 to be the colleague of one of Scotland's most famous ecclesiastics, Dr. Candlish, of Free St. George's Church, Edinburgh.

This was a centre of influence that might satisfy the most ambitious, but his health broke down and, in obedience to the mandate of his physicians, Dr. Dykes laid aside his work, and took a voyage to Australia. During his absence, Dr. James Hamilton died, leaving vacant the pulpit of the church at Regent Square, London, the scene of the labors of Edward Irving. On his return Dr. Dykes accepted the pastorate, and commenced his work in October, 1869, and has continued it with brilliant success, until this year, when he became Principal of the Presbyterian College.

The English Presbyterian Church owes a deep debt of gratitude to the minister of Regent Square. His rare pulpit powers, and his clear-headed wisdom as an ecclesiastical legislator have been a tower of strength to the denomination. His uniform Christian courtesy, and the nobility of his character, have rendered him universally beloved. He was Moderator of the Synod in 1876, which merged him into the United Church, and to his tact the happy termination of the union negotiations was largely due.

Dr. Dykes was chosen in April last, to fill the Moderator's Chair this year, which involved his prominence as representative of the Synod, at the Pan-Presbyterian Council. He preached the opening sermon on July 3, in his old pulpit in Regent Square Church, to a crowded and interested audience. On English platforms, and in English pulpits, Dr. Dykes is a less familiar personage than some other Presbyterian ministers. This is owing to his retiring disposition and to the fact that his health has never been sufficiently robust to permit of his taking much outside duty. In the Presbytery and Synod his voice is often heard, and his weighty words always command respect. His discourses are singularly polished and scholarly. Some of them have been published, notably his sermons on the life of Abraham, The Ten Commandments and The Sermon on the Mount.

REV. DR. ADOLPH SAPHIR.

This distinguished writer and preacher, whose name is well known throughout evangelical Christendom, is of Jewish parentage. He was born at Pesth, in Hungary, about fifty-seven years ago. Through God's blessing on the efforts of the late Dr. Schwartz, of the Continental Mission, Dr. Saphir's father and his entire family renounced Judaism, and publicly confessed their change of convictions in the ordinance of Christian baptism. Adolph was a boy of twelve years old at this time, but with him the baptismal rite was no mere ceremony, for, as his subsequent history has amply proved, it prefigured the consecration of all his powers to the service of his Redeemer.

As a youth he was a student at one of the Gymnasia of Berlin, and afterwards proceeded to Glasgow University, where he graduated in 1852. Resolving to devote himself to the Gospel ministry, he proceeded to the Divinity Hall of the Presbyterian College, Edinburgh. Upon being licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Belfast, in1854, he did not immediately proceed to a settled pastorate, but took the position of and this formed an excellent preparation for the duties awaiting him as a minister. It was at this early period of his ministerial career that he began to employ pen as well as voice in the service of his Master. A series of tracts written in German, and intended to influence the Jewish mind, was written and published. These tracts have been translated into English, Dutch, Hebrew, and the Jewish-German dialect, and have been extensively circulated. They struck the same national keynote as we find thirty years later in the writings of another illustrious convert from Judaism to Christianity, Rabinowitz, and probably prepared the way for him.

At the end of two years, in 1857, he received a call to become minister of a Presbyterian church, at South Shields, and in this sphere of work he continued for five years, when, in 1862, he removed to Greenwich, where his ministry proved very useful, and attracted the notice and excited the interest of Christians generally throughout London. He gathered a large and an attached congregation, and the building was twice enlarged for their accomodation. While at Greenwich he preached the sermons since published in the volumes entitled, "The Lord's Prayer," "Christ and the Scriptures," "Lectures on the Hebrews," etc.

His references to His own people Israel are always honest, tender, and dignified. He holds that, for a period, namely during the Times of the Gentiles, Israel was to be rejected, the kingdom to be taken from them until they shall say, "Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord," until Jesus restore unto Israel the kingdom, and the inscription written over His Cross shall be fulfilled in the sight of all the nations. That tne interval between Christ's first and Second Coming was a period for the most part ignored by the Old Testament prophets, who beheld two mountain tops, between which in reality many and long valleys and plains interposed, in such close proximity that they describe them as if they were one, though between them lay the period during which from among the Gentiles the Church, the Bride of Christ, would be gathered.

At the end of twelve years Dr. Saphir removed from Greenwich to a church at Notting Hill, in the western district of London, and thence recently to Belgrave Square, in an adjacent district, where he still labors.

REV. D. H. McVICAR, D. D., LL. D.

THE fourth of the portraits on the first page is that of the esteemed Principal of the Presbyterian College of Montreal. Dr. McVicar is now fifty-three years of age, having been born near Campbelltown, Cantyre, Scotland, in 1835. His parents emigrated to Canada while he was yet quite a boy, and settled near Chatham, Ont. His early education was conducted by a private tutor, and he subsequently pursued his studies with diligence and distinction at the Toronto Academy and University. Having successfully passed his theological course in Knox College, for two years he taught classics and other subjects in a private school in Toronto. In 1859 he was licensed to preach the gospel by the Toronto Presbytery. Immediately afterward he was offered pastoral charges in Collingwood, Erin, Bradford, Toronto, and Guelph. He accepted a unanimous call to Knox Church, in the last-named city. He remained here only a year, but during that time fifty-two members were added to the church, and its work in every direction greatly stimulated. His eminent pulpit qualifications had already become widely known and appreciated, and in the autumn of 1860 he received a call from Free Church, Montreal, as Successor to Dr. Donald Frazer.

This congregation was then, and is still, one of the leading and most influential in Canada. He accepted the call, and was inducted into his new charge on January 30, 1861. During his pastorate, which lasted for nearly eight years, the congregation attained a very high state of efficiency; the membership almost doubled, and great home missionary zeal was manifested in the founding of several district Sabbath-schools, two of which have since developed into self-supporting and influential city congregations. His Bible-class was one of the largest and most successful in the country, bearing most unmistakable testimony to his teaching ability. In 1868 he was the Presbyterian College, Montreal. The work entrusted to him was in reality the founding of the institution which existed then only in its charter. It had no buildings, no library, no endowment, and only five or six students, who met for instruction in the basement of Erskine Church. For four years he was only professor, and conducted classes in all departments of the theological curriculum, being aided by occasional lecturers. Now the Seminary has extensive and costly buildings, a large and valuable library, a staff of four professors, and four lecturers, with more than seventy students in attendance, and it has sent out over one hundred fully equipped ministers and missionaries.

Dr. McVicar has taken deep interest in French Evangelization.

By overture to the Presbytery of Montreal and the Assembly, he originated the work of training French and English-speaking missionaries and ministers, and organized the Presbyterian French work which has been so successful. He served for many years on the Protestant Board of School Commissioners, Montreal, and his services in this connection have been invaluable to the cause of education—a fact to which the Canadian press has borne repeated testimony. Among his numerous admirable educational works his two arithmetics, primary and advanced, are standard text-books.

In 1876 and 1884 he delivered courses of lectures on Applied Logic, and in 1878 a course on Ethics, before the Ladies' Educational Association at Montreal. During the session of 1871 he was a lecturer on Logic in McGill University. In 1870 he received the degree of LL.D., from the University of which he is a Fellow. In 1881 he was chosen of the Presbyterian Church in Canada, the duties of which office he discharged with firmness, courtesy, and judgment. In the same year he received the diploma of membership of the Athénée Oriental of Paris; and two years later his Alma Mater conferred upon him the degree of D.D. He was appointed a delegate to each of the three great Presbyterian Councils which met in Edinburgh in 1877, in Philadelphia in 1880, and in Belfast, in 1884

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Prayers in Bed.—The Rev. Mr. McCaul Remarks: "I recollect being very tired one night when I was a boy, and after battling between right and wrong for a few moments, I went into bed without saying my usual prayer, meaning to do so in bed; but I soon found that that would not do. I felt as if the words I spoke did not rise higher than the ceiling. I accordingly got up out of bed, and kneeling, I prayed to God more earnestly than I had hitherto done, and joyfully I went to sleep that night, knowing that God's blessing rested upon me. We are not forbidden to have sweet fellowship with God at all times and in all places, but it is a perilous proceeding to postpone your regular time of prayer until you are in bed."

How the Missionary's Head was Saved.—Mr. Swann said: "Coming to the Zambesi River, a distance of 1,400 miles, I saw an old chief, gray-headed, and he said to me, 'You cannot go down the river.' Well, I felt very much annoyed with the old man at the time. I was hurrying up to spend my Christmas at home with my old father and mother. He said, 'Well if you go down that river you will lose your head.' Well, I thought I had better lose Christmas. He stopped me for over three weeks, and this was the reason: He said to me, 'It shall never be said that Ramo Ku Kang let a white man go to his death.' Ramo Ku Kang—who is he? None other than one of the little Makoloko boys who followed Livingstone in his travels through the great continent. So that I can be thankful to God that ever Livingstone went to Central Africa, or perhaps I should have lost my head if he had not gone."

The Greatest Blasphemer in the Prison. Richard Weaver said: "One day I was visiting the Callon prison, and as I was leaving, the governor, pointing to a particular cell, said, 'In there, there is the greatest blasphemer we have ever had within these walls?' I went in immediately and saluted the wretched woman with, 'God bless you, my dear sister! Do you know that God loves you?' 'No,' she replied, 'it is untrue; God does not love me.' 'You are mistaken, God loves the sinner and has sent His Son to die in proof of it.' I then prayed with her, leaving her visibly affected. Next day, when I again visited the prison, I got a letter from that woman, saying she had left her old life, and had accepted Christ, and asking me to speak to the other women in the prison of Jesus, and plead with them to come to Him, and to assure them that none need despair since she had been saved. Nor had she over-estimated the influence her conversion would have on the others, for as soon as they heard that she was saved, they exclaimed, 'If there be mercy for her there is certainly mercy for us also!' God is not willing that even the greatest sinner should perish, but that all should have everlasting life."

Alive in the Hearse.—Pastor Joshua Denovan relates that "Some years ago, in Scotland, a woman was condemned for crime and publicly executed. After being pronounced dead by the proper authorities—dead to the law and the world—her body was handed over to her relatives, put in a hearse, and over a pretty rough country road, driven a good many miles to her native village. The dismal cortège having arrived at its destination, the mourners opened the door of the hearse to take out their unfortunate relative's corpse, when, judge of their surprise at finding her sitting up, alive! She had only been partially strangled, and the rough jolting of the hearse had shaken her blood into motion again. But mark, in law she was dead, and her crime could not be legally punished again. Such is the relation of believers in Christ to the law. They were crucified with Him, and live again in Him."

"God is Not Dead." A Christian Worker relates: "Not long ago a poor Christian woman lay dying. She did not fear to die, but her chief cause of anxiety as she lay there, feeling herself getting weaker and weaker, as she drew nearer eternity, was her husband, who, until then, had proved himself a drunkard, and consequently a most careless husband and father, and now her last prayer was for him. A short time after her death the man's little child said to him, 'Father, I want to say my prayers.' 'Oh, never mind that now,' was the reply, 'mother is dead and you do not need to say your prayers any more.' 'But father,' said the dear child, as he turned his face towards him, 'God is not dead.' The words went straight to the hard heart of the man; they seemed to be spoken by the dead mother through her child. God used them to the conversion of this inebriate, and he rejoiced in a living God as his Father, and a living Christ as his Saviour. 'God is not dead.' Christians as well as unconverted people often require to be reminded of this fundamental truth."

Colporteurs Roughly Handled.—Rev. W. Burgess, of the Deccan, India, remarked: "Our catechist was very roughly handled about the year 1883 for preaching in one of the suburbs of Hyderabad. He was violently laid hold of and hurried into the city, and then thrust into prison. He was detained there until midnight, and only when, during a questioning he was put through, he happened to say he belonged to Mr. Burgess's mission, was he set at liberty, and glad he was to get away, for Hyderabad police are strange hands to fall into. They are never very scrupulous as to their treatment of their victims. Colporteur Joseph, out in Kurinaghur the furthest advanced outpost, was very much less gently handled by the Rohillas. They took his books, tore them all to pieces, and then they began to prick him with the sharp points of their knives. He was stripped and beaten with more than 'forty stripes save one.' His hands were tied together, and he was pegged down to the ground in a kneeling posture, and kept there till weariness and fatigue left him with barely strength enough to crawl back to headquarters. Joseph's nerves were fearfully perturbed, and he is now at his post selling his books again and proclaiming the gospel of peace and good-will to men."

MARTYRS OF EVERY DAY LIFE.

HISTORIANS are not slow to acknowledge the merits of great military chieftains. We have the full-length portraits of the Cromwells, the Washingtons, the Napoleons, and the Wellingtons of the world. History is not written in black ink, but with red ink of human blood. The gods of human ambition do not drink from bowls made out of silver or gold, or precious stones, but out of the bleached skulls of the fallen. But I am now to unroll before you that the world has never acknowledged; those who faced no guns, blew no bugle-blast, conquered no cities, chained no captives to their chariot-wheels, and yet, in the great day of eternity, will stand higher than those whose names startled the nations; and seraph, and rapt spirit, and archangel will tell their deeds to a listening universe. I mean the heroes of common, every-day life.

In this roll, in the first place, I find all the Heroes of the Sick Room.

When Satan had failed to overcome Job, he said to God: "Put forth Thy hand and touch his bones and his flesh, and he will curse Thee to Thy face." Satan had found out what we have all found out, that sickness is the greatest test of one's character. A man who can stand that can stand anything. To be shut in a room as fast as though it were a Bastile. To be so nervous you cannot endure the tap of a child's foot. To have luxuriant fruit, which tempts the appetite of the robust and healthy, excites our loathing and disgust when it first appears on the platter. To have the rapier of pain strike through the side, or across the temples, like a razor, or to put the foot into a vice, or throw the whole body into a blaze of fever. Yet there have been men and women, but more women than men, who have cheerfully endured this hardness. Through years of exhausting rheumatisms and excruciating neuralgias they have gone, and through bodily distresses that rasped the nerves, and tore the muscles. and paled the cheeks and stooped the shoulders. By the dim taper they saw on their wall the picture of that land where the inhabitants are never sick. Through the dead silence of the night they heard the chorus of the angels. The cancer ate away her life from week to week and day to day, and she became weaker and weaker, and every "good-night" was feebler than the "good-night" before—yet never sad. The children looked up into her face and saw suffering transformed into a heavenly smile. Those who suffered on the battle-field, amid shot and shell, were not so much heroes and heroines as those who, in the field-hospital and in the asylum, had fevers which no ice could cool, and no surgery cure. No shout of a comrade to cheer them, but numbness and aching and homesickness—yet willing to suffer, confident in God, hopeful of heaven. Heroes of rheumatism. Heroes of neuralgia. Heroes of spinal complaint. Heroes of sick-headache. Heroes of lifelong invalidism. Heroes and heroines! They shall reign for ever and ever. Hark! I catch just one note of the eternal anthem: "There shall be no more pain!" Bless God for that!

In this roll I also find the heroes of toil, who do their work uncomplainingly. It is comparatively easy to lead a regiment into battle, when you know that the whole nation will applaud the victory: it is comparatively easy to doctor the sick when you know that your skill will be appreciated by a large company of friends and relatives; it is comparatively easy to address an audience when, in the gleaming eyes and the flushed cheeks you know that your sentiments are adopted; but to do sewing, where you expect that the employer will come and thrust his thumb through the work, to show how imperfect it is, or to have the whole garment thrown back on you, to be done over again; to build a wall, and know there will be no one to say you did it well, but only a swearing employer howling across the scaffold: to and your back aches, and your heart faints, and to know that if you stop before night your children will starve. Ah! the sword has not slain so many as the needle. The great battle-fields of our last war were not Gettysburg and Shiloh and South Mountain. The great battle-fields of the last war were in the arsenals, and in the shops, and in the attics, where women made army jackets for a sixpence. They toiled on until they died. They had no funeral eulogium, but, in the name of my God, this day, I enroll their names among those of whom the world was not worthy. Heroes of the needle! Heroes of the sewing-machine! Heroes of the attic! Heroes of the cellar! Heroes and heroines! Bless God for them!

In this roll I also find the heroes who have uncomplainingly endured domestic injustices. There are men who, for their toil and anxiety, have no sympathy in their homes. Exhausting application to business gets them a livelihood, but an unfrugal wife scatters it. He is fretted at from the moment he enters the door until he comes out of it. The exasperations of business life, augmented by

The Exasperations of Domestic Life.

Such men are laughed at, but they have a heart-breaking trouble and they would have long ago gone into appalling dissipation but for the grace of God. Society to-day is strewn with the wrecks of men, who, under the north-east storm of domestic infelicity have been driven on the rocks. There are tens of thousands of drunkards in this country to-day, made such by their wives. That is not poetry. That is prose.

But the wrong is generally in the opposite direction. You would not have to go far to find a wife whose life is a perpetual martyrdom. Something heavier than a stroke of the fist; unkind words, staggering home at midnight and constant maltreatment which have left her only a wreck of what she was on that day when in the midst of a brilliant assemblage the vows were taken, and full organ played the wedding march, and the carriage rolled away with the benediction of the people. What was the burning of Latimer and Ridley at the stake compared with this? Those men soon became unconscious in the fire, but here is a fifty years' putting to death, yet uncomplaining. No bitter words when the rollicking companions at two o'clock in the morning pitch the husband dead drunk into the front entry. No bitter words when wiping from the swollen brow the blood struck out in a midnight carousal, Bending over the battered and bruised form of him, who, when he took her from her father's home, promised love, and kindness, and protection, yet nothing but sympathy, and prayers, and forgiveness before they are asked for. No bitter words when the family Bible goes for rum, and the pawnbroker's shop gets the last decent dress. Some day, desiring to evoke the story of her sorrows, you say: "Well, how are you getting along now?" and rallying her trembling voice, and quieting her quivering lip, she says: "Pretty well, I thank you, pretty well." She never will tell you. In the delirium of her last sickness she may tell all the secrets of her lifetime, but she will not tell that. Not until the books of eternity are opened on the thrones of judgment will ever be known what she has suffered. Oh! ye who are twisting a garland for the victor, put it on that pale brow.

When she is dead the neighbors will beg linen to make her a shroud, and she will be carried out in a plain box with no silver plate to tell her years, for she has lived a thousand years of trial and anguish. The gamblers and swindlers who destroyed her husband will not come to the funeral. One carriage will be enough for that funeral—one carriage to carry the orphans and the two Christian woman who presided over the obsequies. But there is a flash, and the opening of a celestial door, and a shout: "Lift up your head, ye everlasting gate, and let her come in!" And Christ will step forth and say: "Come in! ye suffered with me on earth, be glorified with me in heaven." What is the highest throne in heaven? You say: "The throne of the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb." No doubt about it. What is the next highest throne in heaven? While I speak it seems to me that it will be the throne of the drunkard's wife, if she with cheerful patience endured all her earthly torture. Heroes and heroines! I find also in this roll the Heroes of Christian Charity.

We all admire the George Peabodys and the James Lenoxes of the earth, who give tens and hundreds of thousands of dollars to good objects. But I am speaking this morning of those who, out of their pinched poverty, help others—of such men as those Christian missionaries at the West, who proclaim Christ to the people, one of them, writing to the secretary in New York, saying: "I thank you for that $25. Until yesterday we have had no meat in our house for three months. We have suffered terribly. My children have no shoes this winter." And of those people who have only a half loaf of bread, but give a piece of it to others who are hungrier; and of those who have only a scuttle of coal, but help others to fuel, and of those who have only a dollar in their pocket, and give twenty-five cents to somebody else; and of that father who wears a shabby coat, and of that mother who wears a faded dress, that their children may be well apparelled. You call them paupers, or ragamuffins, or emigrants. I call them heroes and heroines. You and I may not know where they live, or what their name is.

God Knows.

and they have more angels hovering over them than you and I have, and they will have a higher seat in heaven. They may have only a cup of cold water to give a poor traveler, or may have only picked a splinter from under the nail of a child's finger, or have put only two mites into the treasury, but the Lord knows them. Considering what they had, they did more than we have ever done, and their faded dress will become a white robe, and the small room will be an eternal mansion, and the old hat will be a coronet of victory, and all the applause of earth and all the shouting of heaven will be drowned out when God rises up to give his reward to those humble workers in his kingdom, and to say to them: "Well done, good and faithful servant."

You have all seen or heard of the ruin of Melrose Abbey. I suppose in some respects it is the most exquisite ruin on earth. And yet, looking at it I was not so impressed—you may set it down to bad taste—but I was not so deeply stirred as I was at a tombstone at the foot of that abbey—the tombstone placed by Walter Scott over the grave of an old man who had served him for a good many years in his house—the inscription most significant, and I defy any man to stand there and read it without tears coming into his eyes—the epitaph: "Well done, good and faithful servant." Oh! when our work is over, will it be found that because of anything we have done for God, or the church, or suffering humanity, that such an inscription is appropriate for us? God grant it!

Who are those who were bravest and deserved the greatest monument—Lord Claverhouse and his burly soldiers, or John Brown the Edinburgh carrier, and his wife! Mr. Atkins, the persecuted minister of Jesus Christ, in Scotland, was secreted by John Brown and his wife, and Claverhouse rode up one day with his armed men and shouted in front of the house.

John Brown's Little Girl

came out. He said to her: "Well, miss, is Mr. Atkins here?" She made no answer, for she could not betray the minister of the Gospel. "Ha!" Claverhouse said, "then you are a chip of the old block, are you? I have something in my pocket for you. It is a nosegay. Some people call it a thumbscrew, but I call it a nosegay." And he got off his horse, and he put it on the little girl's hand, and began to turn it until the bones cracked, and she cried. He said: "Don't cry, don't cry; this isn't a thumbscrew; this is a nosegay." And they heard the child's cry, and the father and mother came out, and Claverhouse said: "Ha!" it seems that you three have laid your holy heads together, determined to die like all the rest of your hypocritical, canting, snivelling crew; rather than give up good Mr. Atkins, pious Mr. Atkins, you would die. I have a telescope with me that will improve your vision;" and he pulled out a pistol. "Now," he said, "you old pragmatic, lest you should catch cold in this cold morning of Scotland, and for the honor and safety of the king, to say nothing of the glory of God and the good of our souls, I will proceed simply and in the neatest and most expeditious style possible, to blow your brains out."

John Brown Fell Upon His Knees, and began to pray. "Ah!" said Claverhouse, "look out, if you are going to pray; steer clear of the king, the council, and Richard Cameron." "O Lord," said John Brown, "since it seems to be Thy will that I should leave this world for a world where I can love Thee better and serve Thee more, I put this poor widow-woman and these helpless, fatherless children into Thy hands. We have been together in peace a good while, but now we must look forth to a better meeting in heaven; and as for these poor creatures, blindfolded and infatuated, that stand before me, convert them before it be too late; and may they who have sat in judgment in this lonely place, on this blessed morning, upon me, a poor, defenceless fellow-creature, may they in the last judgment find that mercy which they have refused to me, Thy most unworthy, but faithful servant. Amen."

He rose up, and said: "Isabel, the hour has come of which I spoke to you on the morning when I proposed hand and heart to you; and are you willing now, for the love of God, to let me die?" She put her arms around him, and said: "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away. Blessed be the name of the Lord!" "Stop that snivelling," said Claverhouse. "I have had enough of it.

Soldiers do Your Work.

"Take aim! Fire!" and the head of John Brown was scattered on the ground. While the wife was gathering up in her apron the fragments of her husband's head—gathering them up for burial—Claverhouse looked into her face and said: "Now, my good woman, how do you feel now about your bonnie man?" "Oh!" she said, "I always thought weel of him; he has been very good to me; I had no reason for thinking anything but weel of him, and I think better of him now." O what a grand thing it will be in the Last Day to see God pick out His heroes and heroines. Who are those paupers of eternity trudging off from the gates of heaven? Who are they? The Lord Claverhouses and the Herods and those who had sceptres, and crowns, and thrones, but they lived for their own aggrandizement, and they broke the heart of nations. Heroes of earth, but paupers in eternity. Beat the drums of their eternal despair. Woe! woe! woe!

But there is great excitement in heaven. Why those long processions? Why the booming of that great bell in the tower? It is Coronation Day In Heaven.

Who are those rising on the thrones, with crowns of eternal royalty? They must have been great people on the earth, world-renowned people. No. They taught in a ragged school. Taught in a ragged school! Is that all? That is all. Who are those souls waving sceptres of eternal dominion? Why they are little children who waited on invalid mothers. That all? That is all. She was called "Little Mary" on earth. She is an empress now. Who are that great multitude on the highest thrones of heaven? Who are they? Why they fed the hungry, they clothed the naked, they healed the sick, they comforted the heart-broken. They never found any rest until they put their head down on the pillow of the sepulchre. God watched them. God laughed defiance at the enemies who put their heels hard down on these His dear children; and one day the Lord struck His hand so hard on His thigh that the omnipotent sword rattled in the buckler, as He said: "I am their God, and no weapon formed against them shall prosper." What harm can the world do you when the Lord Almighty with unsheathed sword fights for you? I preach this sermon for comfort. Go home to the place just where God has put you, to or the heroine. Do not envy any man his money, or his applause, or his social position. Do not envy any woman her wardrobe, or her exquisite appearance. Be the hero or the heroine. If there be no flour in the house, and you do not know where your children are to get bread, listen, and you will hear something tapping against the window-pane. Go to the window, and you will find it is the beak of a raven, and open the window, and there will fly in the messenger that fed Elijah. Do you think that the God who grows the cotton of the South will let you freeze for lack of clotes? Do you think that the God who allowed the disciples on Sabbath morning to go into the grain-field, and then take the grain and rub it it in their hands and eat—do you think God will let you starve? Did you ever hear the experience of that old man: "I have been young, and now am old, yet have I never seen the righteous forsaken, or his seed begging bread?" Get up out of your discouragement, O! troubled soul, O! sewing woman, O! man kicked and cuffed by unjust employers, O! ye who are hard beset in the battle of life, and know not which way to turn, O! you bereft one, O! you sick one with complaints you have told to no one, come and get the comfort of this subject. Listen to our great Captain's cheer: "To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the fruit of the tree of life which is in the midst of the Paradise of God."

THE LATE REV. E. P. ROE.

GENUINE sorrow was caused last week in many homes on both sides the Atlantic by the announcement of the death of this popular writer. Mr. Roe's stories were read everywhere, and so healthful and pure was their character that many Christian men who object to novel-reading on principle, made an exception in favor of his works and encouraged their children to read them. His death therefore is felt as a personal bereavement by many thousands of persons who had grown to love the man who taught them sound moral lessons in so entertaining a way. It appears that Mr. Roe finished the last chapters of his new novel, "Miss Lou," on the night of July 18, and spent the following day among the flowers and shrubs which were his favorite hobby at his beautiful home at Cornwall-on-the-Hudson. In the early evening he gathered his family and some visitors in his spacious library, where he read to them selections from his favorite author Nathaniel Hawthorne. While thus engaged he suddenly clasped his hands over his heart and exclaimed, "Oh that pain again; I shall have to stop." With a smile he excused himself, and retiring to his bed-room, sent for his physician. After an hour of agonizing pain he passed away. He had been seized with neuralgia of the heart, of which he had suffered a slight attack while visiting Charleston, S. C., in September, 1886, soon after the earthquake.

Edward Payson Roe was fifty years of age, having been born at New Windsor, N. Y., on the 7th of March, 1838. When scarcely twenty years of age he entered Williams College to study for the ministry. He graduated from there in 1860, and spent the next year at Auburn Theological Seminary, after which he entered the Presbyterian ministry. In 1862 he was appointed chaplain of the Second New York regiment, known as the "Harris Light Cavalry," and he remained in the field until the close of the war. In 1864 he took part in the raid of Richmond, which was led by Colonel Ulric Dahlgren, son of Admiral Dahlgren, and in which Colonel Dahlgren was killed. Mr. Roe had a narrow escape in the fight on the banks of the James River. Later, President Lincoln appointed him chaplain of the hospitals at Fortress Monroe, Virginia. After the war closed Mr. Roe accepted a call from the Presbyterian Church at Highland Falls, N. Y., within a mile of West Point.

How Mr. Roe was led to quit the ministry for authorship he has himself told in his preface to "Without a Home." He was deeply impressed by the burning of Chicago, in 1871, and visited the city to look upon the smoking ruins. As he stood among them, the idea of a story shaped itself in his mind. He said that it grew as naturally as a plant on his farm. It was not intended for publication, but on reading the opening chapters to a friend, he was so strongly advised to publish it that he yielded, and it was printed under the title of "Barriers Burned Away." Its remarkable success encouraged him to write another story, which should decide whether he should devote his future wholly to literary work. That story was "The Opening of a Chestnut Burr," and it unmistakably settled the question Mr. Roe sent it out to ask. Its success was phenomenal, and Mr. Roe then settled at Cornwall where he established a fruit farm and nursery, such as he describes in his well-known work "Driven Back to Eden," and devoted himself industriously to weaving healthful stories. They were eagerly sought and read, and they issued regularly and rapidly from his pen. They came in about this order: "The Opening of a Chestnut Burr," "What Can She Do?" "Near to Nature's Heart," "From Jest to Earnest," "A Knight of the Nineteenth Century," "A Face Illumined," "A Day of Fate," "Without a Home," "His Sombre Rivals," "A Young Girl's Wooing," "An Original Belle,' 'Driven Back to Eden," "Nature's Serial Story," "He Fell in Love with His Wife," and "Success with Small Fruits." Many of Mr. Roe's books have been published in England, and have been translated into French and German. It is said that the aggregate circulation of his works has reached more than a million copies.

Mr. Roe was personally one of the most popular of men. Tall and soldierly in bearing, of commanding presence, slightly bald and wearing a fine full beard, his was a well-known figure in the neighborhood. Exceedingly courteous and hospitable, he delighted in filling his house with guests, especially with men of his own craft, to whom he was generous to a fault. He worked hard, studying scenes for his stories in cottage homes, the slums of cities, the police-courts, in stores and factories, and wherever he could find the people engaged in ordinary work, and he spared no pains in making his sketches true to the life. Mr. Roe leaves a widow and five children.

AN ADVENTURE WITH A LION.

In a recent letter from Katanga, Mr. Arnot writes: "I returned last week from a three weeks' tour on foot, which I enjoyed exceedingly, in spite of the long grass and marsh-wading. Besides Dick and other lads who accompanied me, I got a professional hunter to join the party, so as to relieve me of the extra fatigue of hunting. The first villages we reached were those of Mirambo, a little way beyond Kagoma's, on the Lukurrwe River. We rested there one day, and then went down the river, making for a company of Ba-na-lunda villages. At this spot we had quite a remarkable adventure with a lion, which, but for the protecting care of our God, would have ended more seriously. All night we were kept awake more or less by three lions serenading us, and the lads had enough to do to keep their bivouac fires burning. I, however, got a good night's rest. Next morning, when passing through a clump of long reedy grass, I heard distinctly in front the low angry growl of a lion. The man who was in front stopped, saying it was a buffalo, and asked for my gun that he might shoot it. I urged him to move on, and tried to prevent the three lads from stopping, but it was too late to avoid the brute's charge. He made straight at the hindmost lad, who was carrying my mat and blanket. I ran back and succeeded in intercepting him, so that he fell short in his spring, a few feet from his intended victim, and before my very face, too near indeed for shooting with a rifle, and I had no spear. The man and the three lads dropped the things, and were off like deers, leaving me and my royal friend alone in the reed thicket face to face. He was raging like a maniac, and would fain have sprung on me, but seemed to lack the nerve. I held him hard between my eyes, and slowly cocked my rifle, lifting it to my shoulder for a steady aim, when he suddenly gave in, his huge tail dropped, and drawing his teeth under his lips he made off. The lad whose life I thus saved belongs to Bihé, and I overheard a young Bihean say to his fellows he would 'go anywhere with such a white man, who would throw his own body between a lion and a black lad of no account.'"

THE NEW CHINESE TEMPLE IN NEW YORK.

The fact that there is idol worship in the Empire City will doubtless excite astonishment. It is not the worship of the dollar, which is also a sad fact, but of an actual hideous heathen idol. It is set up at 10 Pell Street, in the Chinese quarter. Last month, the Chinese began looking around for a house for Joss, a new idol imported direct from China, the only deity of his peculiar sanctity east of San Francisco. In Pell Street they found an old warehouse which they hired, and since then they have been busy cleaning and decorating it. The renovation has now been completed and Joss installed.

"The house of Joss is reached," says a reporter, "by a narrow but neatly oil-clothed flight of stairs. The temple is what might be termed rococo in decoration, there being colors numbering more than the raindrop ever thought of. Oil cloth covers the floor, and from the ceiling hang elaborately-carved lanterns, prayer sheets, offerings of indestructible nature, one of them being, it is said, a bag of chewing gum. Ranged around the walls are teak stools, also beautifully carved, and separated from each other by small tables, resembling pedestals, also profusely decorated. The windows are half hidden with lace curtains, and the south wind blows directly across the temple into the spreading nostrils of the mighty Joss. Before him are ranged the utensils of his worship. Upon silver standards are the emblems of his power, conspicuously ugly being the dragon. Big bouquets of paper flowers, which are upheld by silver holders and pink candles, half burned, stand on either side. Small receptacles between the insignia of power hold prayer sticks and bits of paper which are sacred to the devil, mainly because the worshippers believe that when strewn they cause his Satanic Majesty so much bother in picking them up that he loses sight of his original object. These implements of worship are upon a richly-carved table, covered with an embroidered cloth. At the rear of the temple is a kitchen where worshippers of a charitable turn of mind deposit chickens for Joss. All of the inauguration day a pot of tea and cups stood on a table to the left of Joss, and all those who came were served. From sunrise until midnight there was a constant stream of Chinamen going to and from the temple, but no more were in it at once than could be comfortably seated.

Here is a sphere in which Christians longing to go out as missionaries to China, may acquire experience. It is a reproach to the Christians of the city that men should be living among us practicing the rites of idolatry.

AN ENEMY'S PRAYER IN THE WAR.

In illustrating the fact that enemies may find a common ground for reconciliation, the Rev. Moses D. Hoge, D.D., of Richmond, Va., related the following incident at a meeting of the Pan-Presbyterian Council: "A Federal officer was mortally wounded in one of the battle fields near Virginia. As he lay upon the ground, far from his comrades, and conscious that his end was near, while the scattered soldiers of the Confederate army went swiftly by, he called to an infantry man who was passing, to stop, and asked if he would offer a prayer for him. The man replied, 'I am sorry I can't comply with your request; I have never learnt to pray for myself.' But he did what he could; he moved the officer into the shade, put something under his head, gave him some water out of his canteen, then hurried on. Presently a dismounted cavalryman, who had lost his horse, came up. The officer called him and made the same request. 'Won't you stop and make a prayer for me?' The trooper kneeled down at the side of the dying man and commenced a prayer, but as he uttered one tender petition after another, the officer used the little strength that remained in him in creeping closer and closer, until he placed both arms around the neck of the petitioner, and when the last words of the prayer were said, he was lying dead on the bosom of his late antagonist in battle, but in the final moment one with him in the bonds of the Gospel, a brother in Jesus, united in love for evermore. Yes, the Gospel is the great reconciler."

AM IDOLATROUS WIFE THWARTED.

In a letter from Fenchow-Fu in China to the Missionary Herald Mr. Thompson describes the result of a matrimonial struggle in which, unlike those in American homes, the wife was not victorious. It appears that two men, father and son, who had been under the instruction of the missionaries for some time, desired baptism. Before granting their request the missionaries asked if they had idols in their homes. On being answered in the affirmative they were told that the idols must be destroyed before the men could be baptized. They agreed, and invited the missionaries to come and see it done. On arriving at the house, however, the wife of the senior convert made so strenuous an opposition to the destruction of the idols that it was postponed. What occurred afterwards Mr. Thompson does not state—probably could only guess—but the next day he was again sent for. Htsi, the senior convert, then informed him that his wife "did not rule" in his house, and he was going to make an end of the idols. "Htsi himself began the work of destruction," says Mr. Thompson. "Three of the idols were of brass and three of clay, and these were so broken that no two of the pieces could be put together again. Three valuable tablets were first split into pieces, and then burned, along with two paper gods that had been worshipped for a long time. The burning was done in the court before the front door. Only one or two outsiders had the courage to witness the spectacle. All the neighbors kept religiously within doors. Still we could not but feel that that burning, with the destruction of the images, was the best sermon that has ever been preached in Fenchow-Fu. It has greatly cheered our hearts. God has said, 'The idols shall be utterly abolished;' and now that we are beginning to witnes the fulfilment of that promise we thank Him and take courage. There was a full chapel on Sunday to witness the baptisms. Htsi testified before them all that he had destroyed his idols, and was now worshipping the true and living God."

CONVERSIONS THROUGH CONTACT.

The virtue that lies in a touch was recently impressed on an audience by the Rev. A. T. Pierson, D. D., of Philadelphia, who related a number of incidents in proof. He said: One who had been released from prison was told that he would find in Lord Shaftesbury a sympathizing friend and helper. The ex-convict went to the earl for advice, and he became from that hour a new man. He entered into business, and by and by became a prosperous man in the midst of the city; supporting his family, attending upon the ordinances of religion, and leading in many Christian activities in the Church to which he belonged. A friend inquired how all this great change had come about. His reply was, "I owe it all to Lord Shaftesbury. I forgot what he said to me, but I do remember one thing. He put his hand on my shoulder and said, 'John, by the grace of God, we will make a man of you yet.' It was the touch that did it!" Here is a man on this platform, whose name is eminent in the Presbyterian Church (Dr. Blaikie). He told me to-day that on a certain occasion, when he was attending one of Richard Weaver's meetings, he was asked to go into the inquiry-room and speak a few words to seven young men who sat there waiting for counsel; and that years afterwards, a young man on his dying bed sent for him. "You don't remember me," said the young man, "but I remember you. In that inquiry-room you put your hand on my shoulder and your arm round my neck, and to that I owe the fact that I came to Jesus as I was." We want contact; not kid glove contact either, for the kid glove is a non-conductor. It does not conduct, but hinders, sympathy. You have got to go down among the people, be one with the people, and be identified with the people. In the City of Philadelphia there stands a church attended by two hundred people, largely composed of the working classes. Mr. Wanamaker, doing business on as large a scale as, perhaps, any man in the United States of America, comes in among those poor people, and you would never know that he owns a dollar, or that he conducts a business so colossal. He is one of them in counsel, and one of them in action, and you could find no distinction between him and them in airs of superiority. A man in Cincinnati built a mission chapel for the poor, and he could not get anyone to go into it. One would have supposed that written over the door were the words: "This is for the poor." Then he took sittings in it for himself and family, and from that hour its success was assured.

MISS WHATELY'S CAIRO SCHOOLS.

The value of the work to which Miss Whately has devoted her life, as well as the urgent need there is for its extention among the degraded people of Egypt, is shown in the following extract from a recent statement she has made:

"Twenty-six years ago, when I first visited Egypt, there was scarcely any educational provision for the boys, and none at all for the girls. The lower classes of the people are now what they were then, very ignorant, and live in squalor and wretchedness. The lot of the women is a sad one: wherever there are Mohammedans there are slaves, and among the women in that portion of the community there is little or no happiness. I once heard a woman say, 'When we are dead we turn to dust, and are finished—finished—finished.' The importance of the school as a nursery cannot be exaggerated. The schoolmaster has declared that of the boys brought up under his tuition not one had, so far as he could find, taken more than one wife. This shows a great breaking away from the iniquities of Mohammedanism. The majority of the boys gladly learn English and French; the girls, who do not stay at school so long, are only taught to read and write well in the vernacular.

"But firstly, secondly, and thirdly, all are instructed in the Scriptures. The children are very charming, but yet we cannot leave the poor women out of account. They come to the Medical Mission, and while they wait for treatment by Dr. Azoury, we read to them the Bible in Arabic. In the course of a year we have five or six thousand patients. Many Mohammedans know the truth, but are afraid to declare themselves; trodden down so long, the Egyptian people have but little courage left. Nevertheless, a great change is being effected in a quiet way. There are about 600 children in attendance at the schools, although the accommodation is only sufficient for about 400."

PROPHETIC EVENTS BETWEEN 1889 AND 1901.

THE FIRST RESURRECTION.

Mr. William Birch's 775th Printed Sunday Sermon, Delivered in Free Trade Hall, Manchester, England, March 11, 1888.

THE Second Resurrection is the next event, and includes the resurrection of all the unrighteous dead since the Creation, and probably also of the righteous who have died during the Millennium. The great white throne will appear, and all of them, both small and great, will stand before God, to be judged according to their works. "And whosoever was not found written in the Book of Life was cast into the lake of fire." "This is the second death." "And I saw a new heaven and a new earth, for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away, and there was no more sea." (Rev. 21: 1.)

The First Resurrection is described in Rev. 20: 4–6, as being completed after Antichrist's three and a half years' reign by the resurrection of His martyrs, and of all the "blessed and holy" who have died up to that time, as well as by the Harvest Translation of the "great multitude of all living Christians, "both great and small," just before Antichrist's destruction, when "the Marriage of the Lamb is come" (compare Rev. 7: 9–14; 11: 18; 14: 15; 19: 7.) All this may be expected in Passover Week, 1901.

But this first resurrection commences about five years earlier (probably about the first week of March, 1896) with the resurrection of all saints who have died up to that time and their ascension to meet Christ "in the air" at the first stage of His Second Advent together with 144,000 living watchful Christians—the Wise Virgins—who shall be caught up in this First-fruits Translation without seeing death. The other unwatchful Christian, numbering some millions, who are denoted by the five foolish virgins, will be left behind upon this earth for about five years, including the three and a half years of "great tribulation," during which they will be hidden in a wilderness, and then they together with further converts throughout Christendom—constituting the Harvest—will be caught up to heaven in the Harvest Translation, just before the Marriage of the Lamb, and a few days afterwards Christ descends upon the Mount of Olives at the battle of Armageddon on the last day of Passover-Week, 1901, and terminates this Gentile Age, and begins the Millennial Age of 1000 years. (See Rev. 19: 7; 7: 17; 14: 16; 20. Matt. 24: 31; 25: 1-10.) Passover Week* (April 4-11), 1901, is

* Lindo's Jewish Calendar for 64 years, from 1838 to 1902, the standard almanac of the Jews, and gives the first and last days of Passover Week as follows:—1889, April 16 to 23 —1890, April 5 to 12—1891, April 23 to 30—1892, April 12 to 19—1893, April 1 to 8 - 1894, April 21 to 28—1895, April 9 to 16—1896, March 29 to April 5—1897, April 17 to 24—1898, April 7 to 14—1899, March 26 to April 2—1900, April 14 to 21—1901, April 4 to 11—1902, April 22 to 29. This last, in 1902, may be expected to be the First Passover Week in the Millennium of 1000 years, as foretold in Ezekiel 45: 21.

The Last Week of this Age

because it is 2345 years (2300 with 45) distant from Passover Week, B. C. 446, when Artaxerxes gave the command to Nehemiah to rebuild Jerusalem, exactly 69 Weeks or 483 years before Messiah was "cut off" in a Passover Week (Dan. 8: 14; 9: 25); and also because it is forty-five years distant from the Crimean War Treaty of Peace, ratified on the last day of Passover Week, 1856, which thus, at the end of Daniel's 2300 years, "cleansed the sanctuary" of the Holy Land from Mahomedan laws of murderous intolerance, which were then repealed (the forty-five years being the excess of the 1335 years in Dan. 12: 11, 12, over and above the last 1290 years of the 2300.) No doubt some may reply, "Of that day and hour knoweth no man, not even the angels, neither the Son"; but those words of our Lord applied only to the time when they were uttered; they cannot mean that neither our Lord nor His people should ever know the time of the End. Surely, Christ knew that day when He inspired John to write the Book of Revelation. And, again, until Messiah was "cut off" or "made a covenant" (harath) at the end of the 483 years in a Passover Week, it could not be known that therefore those 483 years and also the 2300 years (from which the 483 were "determined" or "divided off" as its first section) necessarily began in a Passover Week, and that consequently the 2300 years must end in Passover Week, 1856, and that, therefore, likewise the additional forty-five years must end in Passover Week, 1901. (Dan. 8: 14; 9: 24-5; 12; 11,12).

You have, perhaps, seen a picture in the Art Gallery, in the outer hall of the Assize Court—the aged father leans upon his stick; the venerable mother sits by his side, her face covered with her handkerchief. Two little children stand at their knee, and close by is a young woman who leans against the wall in an agony of grief too deep for tears. Through the half-open door of the court of justice you see a young man being tried at the criminal bar, and these people—his father and mother, and his wife and children—are

My friend, if you stand before God to be judged at the last day, unwashed in the blood of Christ, we who have preached the gospel and solemnly warned you, will also be present, waiting to hear the verdict; and our hearts will be sad because we know what the sentence will be —"condemned already"; for to be judged by your works means that there is not the ghost of a chance of your salvation. If you die an unpardoned sinner, you will have to stand before God to be judged and be cast into the lake of fire. It is a personal matter. You cannot appoint some one to go instead; you must yourself stand before God to be judged.

Have you ever stood at the death-bed of an unpardoned sinner? A young man, who had been often warned, but who had given himself wholly to pleasure and rejected Christ, exclaimed, "I'm lost, I know! Well, all I can say is, I am sorry! —very sorry!" They were his last words. Another seemed to have a vision, and cried, "Oh! I see the pearly gate of heaven opened to me. Oh! what a glorious sight." Then he suddenly shrieked, "Oh! I am lost! I am lost! I am lost! They have shut the gate; I am too late!" They were his last words.

Another man had been convinced of his sin and warned not to resist the Holy Spirit's strivings, but he went away saying, "Oh, bother that Spirit, let me have some gin instead!" When he was dying, it was noon, but the man said, "It is getting dark; wind up the blind." Then raising himself he cried, "It is getting dark—darker—dark"—when he fell back dead.

My unpardoned friends, the Holy Spirit has striven with many of you, and you will be unable to have quiet rest, either night or day, until you have decided either to be saved or damned. If you make up your mind to reject Christ, the devil may give peace of mind until you are on your death-bed, but even the devil cannot then stifle your conscience, and your horror will be more terrible than any bodily pain. The sting which hurts men when they die is unpardoned sin. Are you ready to die? I once asked this question at a religious meeting, when an objector replied that we were donkeys if we were always thinking of being prepared to die; but with the written word of God before me, telling us to be "ready," it it evident that God wants us to be always prepared for death or for the advent of Christ, and always sure of salvation.

"Nothing is worth a thought beneath,
But how I may escape the death
That never, never dies!"

It is a blessed fact that God wishes you to have part in the first resurrection. The gospel of the pardon of sin is to be preached to every creature, therefore to you. Christ died for sinners, therefore for you. The word of God is clear that you may be saved, and now!

My Remarkable Experience this Week.

This week I have twice passed through the fear of death, and I do not know the reason why, excepting as a means of instruction to you, under similar circumstances. On each occasion I felt that I was about to die, although at the time I was, and am now, in perfect health and strength. The first time was last Sunday night, March 4, or rather about 2 A. M. on Monday morning, March 5, after writing out my Sunday evening sermon for publication as usual. I had retired to rest, and was at once falling into a sound sleep. Suddenly I awoke, without any bodily pain or oppression, but with a strong feeling that the hand of death was on me. For a moment I was awe-struck, but the next moment felt a blessed peace, which brought tears to my eyes as I said within myself, "Glory be to God; I am resting on the precious blood"; and calmly awaited for the last stroke. Then a voice sounded, "Not now, but be always ready!"

The second time was last night (Saturday, March 10th). Suddenly I awoke, as if some one had touched me, and the voice sounded within,

"Are You Ready?"

But I found myself without any feeling of peace. In a state of sudden alarm I got up, and began to walk about the room in a struggle against the angel of death. I said, "Oh, where is the peace which is promised to the adopted children of God?" And, not finding peace, I examined my foundation for the hope of salvation. I prayed, "Hast Thou not said that all manner of sin shall be forgiven unto men? I know that I believe Thy dear Son died for my sins; and Thy word says that whosoever doth so believe, shall not perish. Therefore, according to Thy word, all my sins are forgiven, and my soul is saved." The feeling of death, however, still clutched me—no pain or convulsion of body; it was the feeling of the soul. The fear of death was with me; but having God's word for it that I was a saved sinner, I quietly trusted His word, and, leaning against a chair, calmly waited for the visit of death. Then the inward voice again exclaimed, "Not this time, but be always ready!"

Dear friends, if death comes, the question is not so much whether we have any feelings of peace or not; let us just trust our souls to Christ, and rest on God's word that "His blood cleanses us from all sin." (1 John 1: 8.)

Some of you, likewise, may be awoke in a similar manner; and, if so, how will it be with your soul? Will you struggle like a truant boy dragged before his master? Ah, no; be at rest. Trust, and be sure that our Lord's precious blood was really shed to make atonement for your guilty soul; and while you trust your soul to what God says about that blood, as you trust your body on a ladder, you shall not be afraid.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Conference Between the Two Chambers of Congress on the River and Harbor Bill has ended with a practical victory for the Senate. The bill as finally agreed to, calls for the 'expenditure of $22,277,116, which is an increase of $2,374,333, since it first passed the House jurisdiction. Most of the schemes for the purchase and improvement of canals in various parts of the country, have been stricken out, but there are provisions for the surveys and location of several local canals. The amount appropriated is the largest ever made in a River and Harbor Bill.

The Work of the Immigration Commission was commenced in New York, on July 23, and the Commissioners have visited the Italian quarter to see for themselves the condition of the immigrants. About sixty witnesses have been subpœnaed, among whom are several agents of the immigration companies. It appears from the report issued by the bureau of statistics that the immigrants received during the year ended June 30 last were 539,818 against 483,116 in the previous year. The immigration from England and Wales exceeded that from Ireland by nearly 10,000, in addition to which over 24,000 immigrants came from Scotland. The total from the British Islands was 180,766, against 150,783 the previous year, From Germany there were 107,624, a slight increase. From Norway and Sweden the number rose from 58,741 to 72,915, and that from Italy increased from 47,524 to 51,075. There was only a very slight increase in immigrants from Hungary and Bohemia, the number for each year being a little below 20,000.

The Republican Senators have Accepted the challenge of the Democrats, and have decided to produce a tariff bill of their own, as a substitute for the Mills bill. At a meeting held last Thursday night, at the house of Senator Evarts, it was found that the Republican Senators were practically unanimous as to the necessity for that course, though it is well known that Mr. Blaine is strongly opposed to it. The outlines of the bill were discussed, and there was little difference of opinion on that matter. The skeleton bill, which has been prepared by Senator Allison, was examined. Its provisions have been kept secret pending the decision of the sub committee, but its leading principles were disclosed. The wool and woollen duties will remain as in the present law, except that worsted will be raised. Steel rails will be cut down to $14—they are now $17—and the Mills bill cuts them down to $11. Sugar and rice are to be cut down fifty per cent.; there will be a general reduction in chemicals, glass, pottery. The tobacco tax is put down in the bill for repeal, and alcohol for the arts is to be made free. Hoop iron, cotton and hay ties are raised, also tin plate. Altogether the bill is expected to reduce the revenue by about seventy-five millions, and to be so framed that no home industry will be affected. As the Mills bill passed the House by a majority of only thirteen there is a possibility of the Republican substitute being accepted there. The discussion is expected to protract the session until October.

The Prospects of the Nicaragua Canal are declared to be excellent by Sub-Chief Engineer Pearv, who arrived last week in New York, from the Isthmus. Mr. Peary brings the records and final results of the survey, which was finished early in July. The men speak in high terms of the climate and conditions of life in Nicaragua, and say that no obstacle to the work of constructing the canal will be found in them. A slight change of route has been made which reduces the length of canal in excavation and yet gives increased extent of free navigation. Mr. Peary adds the information that the latest surveys in the Tola Basin, on the western division, decrease the length of canal in excavation by about half a mile, leaving the actual canalization less than thirty miles in all. Mr. Peary left San Juan del Sur on July 7, and spent four days on the Panama Isthmus examining the canal work there. Work is going on on certain sections of the canal, but it is not of a kind nor extent to secure its completion in six years.

Another Dynamiter was Captured in Chicago on July 25. The police regard him as still more valuable than the other three arrested the previous week. He is Rudolph Sevic, a Bohemian gunsmith. Within a year he has purchased fifty-five pounds of dynamite, all of which, it is believed, he has used in bombs. A few of these explosives have been found by the police. They contain about one pound of dynamite, and it is therefore concluded that the other fifty-four pounds are now scattered among the Anarchist groups in the shape of bombs. The missiles are vastly better made and more destructive than that used at the Haymarket massacre. They consist of a zinc tube, five inches long and two and a half inches in diameter. Enclosed is a second and smaller tube, one inch in diameter, which holds the dynamite. The inch and a half space between that and the outer tube is filled with pebbles, nails, broken glass, etc., and a fulminating cap is attached to one end, while the other is hermetically sealed. Such a bomb, if thrown into a crowd, is capable of destroying a hundred persons. Sevic was not charged with participation in the plot to kill the judges and police inspectors, but simply, under the new dynamite act, with handling dynamite illegaly. There will be no difficulty in obtaining a conviction on that charge.

Emperor William's Visit to the Czar Came to an end July 24. The visit was a succession of festivities, reviews, and pageants. The Emperor intended to leave two days earlier. St. Petersburg Court circles think that the prolongation of his stay, together with the courteous and cordial nature of the interviews between the two Emperors, although no direct political allusions were made, indicates a resumption of amity between Russia and Germany, tending to a general European peace. Leading diplomatists believe that no tangible outcome will result from the visit, but that the two Emperors simply desire to remove misunderstandings between the two countries. On Thursday the Emperor arrived at Stockholm, where he was cordially received by the King of Sweden and the Crown Prince, who went out with the Swedish squadron to meet him. The King and the Prince went on board the German Imperial yacht, and saluted the young Emperor with kisses. A great crowd assembled to witness the disembarkation, and cheered heartily as the two monarchs drove to the castle. The Emperor appeared delighted with his reception. King Oscar, in toasting the Emperor at the banquet given in his honor, said that his most cherished recollection was the friendship extended to him by the late Emperor William I. The King thanked the Emperor for this visit, and expressed the hope that God would grant him a long and glorious reign. The Emperor's next visit was to the King of Denmark, at Copenhagen.

Mr. and Mrs. Gladstone Celebrated their golden wedding on July 25. Testimonials in the shape of letters, telegrams and presents poured in upon them by hundreds. A reception was tendered to the couple at the residence of Earl Spencer, and they were presented with portraits of themselves, and also with three large silver cups, and an address signed by a hundred and fifty members of Parliament. Lord Granville made the speech of presentation. Mr. Gladstone, replying to the congratulatory address, wished to indorse all that the address contained with reference to his wife. It would be difficult, he said, to give an adequate idea of the domestic happiness of his married life. With regard to the allusions to himself, he felt that they were too flattering. His conduct had been often criticised, sometimes, perhaps, unjustly, but he thought that on the whole, the criticising had been more to his benefit than the reverse. He could fairly say that he was hardly able to recall an incident in his public life that was in any way painful to recollect. He will be seventy-nine years old in December next.

French Journalists Predict International complications as a result of the round of visits the Emperor of Germany is paying to the Courts of Europe. A series of articles in two prominent Paris journals affirm that the French Republic, and the danger with which it menaces monarchy in Europe, are the real subjects of the Imperial interviews. An effort was made to convince the Czar that France, is a perpetual breeding house of revolution, and is, with her hopes of revenge, a constant danger to the peace of Europe; that the only way to put an end to this is to compel France to disband the greater portion of her army and maintain only her colonial troops and gendarmerie, and to renounce solemnly and definitely all hope of regaining Alsace and Lorraine. In an interview with a French statesman on the subject he is reported to have said: "France will disarm on these conditions and on no others:—First, that Germany give back Alsace-Lorriane, and second, that all European Powers also disarm."

The Commission for the Trial of the Charges against Mr. Parnell has been named. Mr. W. H. Smith, the Government leader in the House of Commons, stated on July 23 that the Government would not be doing justice to the accused if it did not give them the completest chance to clear themselves. He had confidence in the proposed tribunal. It rested with the House to say how complete the powers of the commission ought to be. Sir James Hannen would be the president and Justices Day and Smith would be the other members of the commission. Mr. Gladstone, however, is less warm in his approval of the selection. He said, he was not prepared to give that unqualified confidence to the commission which Mr. Smith appeared to entertain. It was in the power of the Government to make a better selection of commissioners—a selection which would have commanded warm acclamations from everybody. The Government ought to make definite charges against definite persons. The committee of the Parnellite party has drafted a series of amendments to the bill. The leading amendment instructs the commission to inquire how the Times obtained its alleged information. Another amendment requires that the names of the "other" persons referred to in the bill shall be stated.

Encouraging News from Cuba is Kindly sent s by a correspondent who has later information of religious work in the island than that ublished in our issue of June 21. The movement, which commenced under the labors of Ir. A. J. Diaz, who was converted about two ears ago and immediately began laboring for hrist in Cuba, is extending rapidly. He has ow been obliged to hire a theatre with a seatng capacity of four thousand for his Sunday ervices, no other building being large enough o hold the numbers that come. About twelve undred persons have made a profession of ith and received Christian baptism since he ommenced preaching. The Roman Catholic ishop of Havana has denounced Diaz from ie Cathedral pulpit, and has had his photoraph publicly burned. The Bishop has also olemnly warned his flock against attending the heatre services, and has threatened with exommunication any who bury their dead in the rotestant cemetery. All of which advertises ie work Diaz is carrying on, and stimulates ublic interest in it.

The Unexpected Result of Threatening a idge is reported in a despatch from Barbourlle, Ky. It states that suspicion has been rife r some time that liquor was being sold in conderable quantity at Harlan, which is a Prohibion district. County Judge Lewis used every fort to discover who the vendors were, but thout much success. A few days ago several ominent grocerymen were arrested on the pposition of being engaged in the liquor busiss. The trial failed to show any proof, howver, and the parties were discharged. The arsts aroused the resentment of those arrested, d that evening, as Judge Lewis rode out of wn, he was stopped by one of the accused en, who, with loaded revolver, was in the act shooting the Judge off his horse, when the apon was caught by a bystander. Judge wis, undismayed, rode back, and, assembling ose whom he knew to be enemies of the iisky ring, proceeded to search the place here the obnoxious liquor was thought to be. veral stores were entered, and barrels, kegs d bottles in profusion hustled into the street, here the Judge coolly proceeded to knock ngs and heads out with an axe, turning the ntents into the street, while his comrades, out twenty in number, stood guard with their inchesters.

Twelve Years of Silence Between Husband d wife have been maintained by a couple in icago. A daily journal of that city states, at sixteen years ago, an Englishman came re and obtained work in the Union stockds. He had a pretty and attractive wife, who med much attached to him, but four years er his settlement in Chicago he had a quarrel h her, and made a vow that he would never ak to her again. The couple continued to e in the same house, but occupying separate oms, for twelve years, without a word passing ween them. The wife continued doing her sehold duties, and the husband put money for her use every week. He would send her ssages by a child, but, if she attempted to ak to him, a threatening scowl on his face nced her. Two weeks ago he fell ill of hoid fever. His wife cared for him, gave medicine. and performed all the offices of sick-chamber. He never spoke to her, and epted her attention in the same silence he observed for twelve years. On July 20 the sician in attendance said the man had but a hours to live. Then the wife burst into rs, and the dying man with open eyes watcher. With a sudden impulse of a love that survived the years of cruel treatment, she w her arms around her husband's neck, ed him fondly, and begged him to speak to her once, to break, before he died, the silence of a dozen years. He repulsed her, and turning to the doctor, spoke to him, but would not address his wife. She made no further effort to soften him, and that night he died. Few men are capable of cherishing resentment for so many years, but too many forget the limit imposed in the Apostolic injunction (Eph. 4:26) and the solemn warning Christ gave to men who refuse to forgive (Matt. 6:15.)

A Strangely Inhuman Act is Reported from Madison, Wis. It is stated that four weeks ago three small children belonging to a family living in a lonely cottage on the outskirts of the city were stricken with diphtheria. The mother was scared almost out of her wits when the doctor told her what the disease was. She said she had heard that an adult taking the disease from a child was sure to die. A day or two later it was learned that both parents had abandoned the premises and left the helpless children, who subsequently died, alone and without any attendance whatever. The neighbors went to the mother and endeavored to make her return to her children, but she answered that her life was dearer to her than theirs. She also refused to allow her husband to return, because she thought too much of him. The local papers say that the people of the town are greatly excited over the matter, and the parents may be made to suffer for their shocking conduct. Maternal love is frequently used to illustrate the love of God for men, but this incident shows that there are cases in which maternal love is not so strong as love of life. The whole world must have been lost if the love of Jesus had not borne that test. (Isa. 49:15.)

Five Dollars for the Renunciation of a Name was paid and accepted in Newark, N. J., a few days ago. The parties to the bargain were a father and son. The father has always borne a good character, but the son has been in disgrace continually. Recently the youth was charged by his employer with a theft of two dollars, but was told that he might escape prosecution if he would refund the money. He applied to his mother, who advanced him the two dollars to save him from prison, but instead of using it for that purpose he spent it in liquor. When the father heard of the affair his patience was at an end. He had an interview with his son in a private room, and asked him what he would take for his right, title, and interest in the family name. The young man said he would sell for five dollars. The father called in four neighbors to witness the transaction, and paid his son the money. The son signed a legal document acknowledging the receipt of the five dollars and pledging himself never again to use his surname, and to renounce all claim on the family. Apart from considerations of filial duty the son made a bad bargain in a pecuniary sense, as the father is a man of some property. He seemed, however, quite satisfied to dispose of his expectations for the small sum of money in hand. Everyone calls him foolish, but the majority of men act in the same way toward God. They prefer the pleasures of sin in this life to the Fatherhood of God and the certainty of unending bliss after death. (Heb. 12: 16, 17.)

A Providential Escape from a Horrible death was granted to a party of lumbermen in Canada last week. A press despatch from Ottawa says that the men were working on the Perley and Pattees timber limits on Bouchere River, when bush fires started simultaneously at four points of the compass, a short distance from the camp where they were at work. The flames swept down upon the men, who were not aware of their perilous situation until the fire was almost upon them, and all means of escape shut off. They were forced to retreat from the lumber depot in which all their provisions, stock, and implements were stored, only to see it doomed by the fiery element which was fast overtaking them. Men who probably never prayed before fell upon their knees and asked to be saved from the dreadful fate that seemed inevitable. Their prayers were answered; as the last ray of hope of deliverance had vanished a black cloud was seen rapidly gathering in the West, and in a short time a heavy storm passed over the burning district in which the men were imprisoned, deadening the fire sufficiently to enable them to escape. A number of the men were suffering from the intense heat they had endured. These men did not know of their danger until the fire was almost upon them, or they would not have waited to see it before making their escape. Unhappily when sinners are warned of the fire of God's indignation they are too often unmoved, and when they wait until the fire is upon them prayer cannot avail. (II Chron. 36: 16.)

An Interesting Lawsuit is to be Tried at the next term of the United States District Court in Massachusetts. It is brought by a widow against a well-known firm of Boston stockbrokers, to recover the value of over sixty thousand dollars worth of stocks and bonds which were left to her by her late husband. It appears that the papers were in the custody of her son, a young man who was bitten by the stock-speculating mania. Though he was not of age at the time, he speculated with his own fortune of forty thousand dollars and lost the bulk of it. He then carried to his brokers some of his mother's stocks, and finally the whole of them. He was as unsuccessful with her property as he had been with his own, and her fortune also disappeared. As she had not given her consent to the disposal of her stocks, she contends that she is entitled to recover their value from the brokers who were the medium her son employed in his disastrous transactions. There would apparently be more justice in calling upon her son for restitution, as he was the custodian of the deeds, and was the culpable party in their abstraction; but as he has lost his own fortune it would be useless to press him. He must, however, if he has filial feeling, bitterly deplore his faithlessness and must suffer agonies of remorse. Similarly, faithlessness is exhibited by men who ignore the fact that their time, talents, and opportunities are the Lord's, intrusted to them to use in His service. (Peter 1:17.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The Reformed Presbyterian Church Synod, at its recent session, directed the local sessions to prosecute, according to church discipline, members who advertise in Sunday newspapers.

During the past nine months 1,155 young men have professed conversion in the various Young Men's Christian Associations of the State of Illinois, and 410 have united with evangelical churches.

Judge White, of Pittsburgh, Penn., gives it as his deliberate opinion from thirteen years' experience in the criminal court, that there are far more evils resulting from the use of beer than from whiskey.

The International Bible Convention at Asbury Park, N. J., last week was largely attended. Dr. L. W. Munhall, who conducted it, made an earnest address on Divine Healing. Dr. W. W. Clark gave a chart illustration of Gospel scenes. Prof. and Mrs. Towner conducted the services of song.

At the State Sunday-school Convention of Pennsylvania at Williams Grove, nearly 10.000 Sunday-school workers were present. An interesting feature was the presence of several hundred Indian boys and girls from the Government Indian Training School in Carlisle, who delivered speeches and sang songs.

Mr. Moody's Church on La Salle Avenue, Chicago, was struck by lightning during the afternoon service on July 22. The congregation was alarmed, but was tranquillized by the appeal of the pastor, Rev. Charles F. Goss. An examination proved that the damage done was confined to the steeple, and the service proceeded.

The unhappy division in the Elsey Memorial Faith-Cure Chapel on Jersey City Heights will, it is believed, be overruled to more extended Gospel work in the neighborhood. Mr. Phillips, the pastor dismissed by the proprietors, is beginning mission work among the poor, and a new pastor, possibly the Rev. E. W. Oakes, will be secured for the Elsey Chapel.

The National Temperance camp meeting being held this week at Ocean Grove, N. J., promises to be of unusual interest. Among those taking an active part in the proceedings are President Stokes of the Ocean Grove Camp Meeting Association; Gen. Clinton B. Fisk, Dr. Steele, Miss Julia Coleman; Rollo Kirk, the Michigan chalk talker; George W. Bain, of Kentucky; and F. C. Iglehart, of Newark.

THE CHARGE OF THE ANGEL.

A New Sermon, by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"The angel of the Lord by night opened the prison doors, and brought them forth, and said, Go, stand and speak in the temple to the people all the words of this life."—Acts 5 : 19, 20.

The Apostles Persecuted by the Sadducees—God's Answer to them — The Best Antidote — The Apostles to Preach the Gospel to the People— I. The Agents Employed—Men not Angels— An Honor to Manhood—A Delight to Jesus— King Edward III. and the Black Prince—II. Their Duty to Preach to the People—Not to Classes—The Rich and the Poor both Welcome —A Significant Difference in the Reformations — III. The Message Described — Its Seven Points—IV. The Whole Message to be Given.

THE second persecution of the Church, in which all the apostles were put into the common prison, was mainly brought about by the sect of the Sadducees. These, as you know, were the Broad School, the liberals, the advanced thinkers, the modern-thought people of the day. If you want a bitter sneer, a biting sarcasm, or a cruel action, I commend you to these large-minded gentlemen. They are liberal to everybody, except to those who hold the truth; and for those they have a reserve of which far excels wormwood and gall. They are so liberal to their brother errorists that they have no tolerance to spare for evangelicals. We are expressly told that "the high priest, and all they that were with him (which is the sect of the Sadducees), were filled with indignation."

To them the only answer which God gave was spoken by His angel: "Go, stand and speak in the temple to the people all the words of this life." Argument will be lost upon them; go on with your preaching. They have lost the faculty of believing: go and Speak to the People.

They are so given over to their doubts, that it is like rolling the stone of Sisyphus to persuade them to faith. They are so eaten up with objections, that to attempt to answer all the questions they raise would be as vain as the labor of filling a bottomless tub, Go on with your preaching, you apostles; but address yourselves mainly to the people. Extend as widely as possible the range of the truth, and thus answer the opposition of its adversaries. It is better to evangelize than to controvert. The preaching of the word of life is the best antidote to the doctrine of death.

Clearly enough, if they had known it, and had been capable of seeing it, these blind Sadducees were answered at every point when the apostles were brought out of prison and bore witness to their Lord. Here was the creed of the Sadducees; they said that "there was no resurrection, neither angel nor spirit," but these apostles stood up and witnessed to the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead. What did they make of that? An angel had come down from heaven and had brought these apostles out of prison. Then there were angels. As these apostles were set free while the sentries remained standing before the doors, and those doors were afterwards found fastened, if there were no spirit, assuredly materialism had acted in a singular fashion. Every item of their negative creed had been made to fall like Dagon before the ark. The Lord always arranges Red Seas for Pharaohs. All that the apostles had to do was to go on with their preaching, and this they did; for "daily in the temple, and in every house, they ceased not to teach and preach Jesus."

I. In reviewing the whole story which we read just now, from the seventeenth verse to the end of the chapter, my first thought is that for spreading the gospel are men, and not angels. The angel of the Lord opened the prison door and set free the preachers, but might not be a preacher himself. He might give the ministers their charge, but he had no charge to preach himself. This divine choice of human instrumentality puts honor upon manhood. Those redeemed by the blood of Christ are men, and their redemption from sin by power is to be instrumentally accomplished by men. The great fight which began in the garden of Eden is to be waged by men even to the end. The conquest of the revolted world is to be achieved by men under the leadership of the all-glorious Son of Man. Ye see your calling, brethren. I pray you, every one, to preach the gospel in your vocation; but specially would I plead for zeal with those whose very vocation it is to preach.

My dear hearers, you may be yourselves grateful that this ministry is committed to men, because it is a condescension to human weakness. Imperfect as human ministers are, we are better preachers to you than angels could be. We know your sins, your sorrows, your struggles. We know the roughness of the road you traverse; for we, too, came in at the wicket-gate, and have floundered in the Slough of Despond, and scrambled up the Hill Difficulty. We can have compassion and give Direction Learned by Experience.

I suppose an angel would command a very large congregation for a time; but, after a while, you would feel that there was something alien and distant about the manner of his teaching. You would be awed rather than comforted. A being altogether superior to yourself would before long drive you to cry for your old minister again, with lips of clay and heart of love. You would prefer our feeble pleadings to the more glorious, but less brotherly, address from an angel from heaven. Somebody once said that it proved the divinity of our holy religion that it survived ministers; and there was a good deal of truth in the remark. How I have wondered that this congregation has survived me! and I think we may wonder that as a whole the gospel survives its advocates. We are poor tools. I do not refer to you, brethren, from America, but I mean all of us in England, and specially myself. We are poor tools after all; and if God uses us to save sinners and sanctify saints, He must certainly have all the glory of it.

I cannot help adding that the employment of men as soul-winners gives a tender joy to the heart of Jesus. It pleases the Lord Jesus Christ that God should use men; for He Himself is a man. The Lord Jesus must take great pleasure in the attempts of His servants to seek and to save souls; for they are learning to be sheperds like Himself. When our heard that the Black Prince was having a hard battle with the French, he smiled to think that his son was in a place where he could show his valour. When he was entreated to send off reinforcements, he refused; for he wished his son to have the undivided honors of the day. The Lord Jesus, the Captain of our salvation, puts some of His chosen into places of great peril, and He does not seem to send them all the help they could desire, in order that they may prove their faith and consecration, and thus earn their spurs. He takes a brotherly pleasure in the courage and faith which He Himself has wrought in them. The father in the parable was glad when his prodigal son was found; but he would have been gladder still had a brother found him.

All these are good reasons why the Lord should employ men and women to spread the gospel rather than cherubim and seraphim. Dear friends, do you not think that the at us? When they see men eager upon politics and negligent of souls, are they not astonished? Do they never say, "We wish the great Lord would let us go and speak to perishing souls. We would speak with all our hearts." Do they not sometimes say to one another, "What are these men at? Do they disdain their high calling? God has given to them the great privilege of preaching and teaching His holy word, but they do not care to do it. They speak as if they were half asleep. Where is their zeal for God, their love to men, their earnestness for Christ?" Brethren, these holy spirits must feel ashamed of us!

So have I spoken to you who are men. As for thee, O angel of God, thou hast opened the prison doors and set free the men of God; but thou must now go back to Him that sent thee. Bright spirit, I dare not offer thee my pulpit. Feeble as I am, I must do the preaching. Oh that thy Lord and mine may help me, and enable me to make full proof of my ministry! Farewell, angel of God, go thy way!

II. Secondly, these men are

To Teach the People.

The manner of their teaching is hinted at—They are to do it promptly, yea, immediately. "Go," says the angel, "go. Do not linger here. Go at once." I should have been tempted to linger a little, just to find out how the angel released the prisoners. He had opened the doors, so we are told, but yet they were found closed and fastened when the officers came, and the sentries had not left their posts. Here is a mystery; I should like to clear it up. Are there not many such mysteries? But the command is pressing and peremptory: "Go, speak to the people." "Let me tarry; one does not see angels every day. Let me stay."

Dear fellow-worker, we perhaps are tempted to study very deeply into the mysterious points which do not minister to profit; let us, then, hear the angel say. "Go, speak to the people." Let us keep our thoughts to that gospel which we are sent to preach. "The words of this life" will furnish ample scope for all our powers; let us not wander into endless debates, which are rather for curiosity than salvation, and tend rather to gratify our taste than accomplish our life-purpose.

The First and Chief Business of the man of God is, "Go speak to the people." It is clear from the text that they were to take a conspicuous place and speak boldly "Go, stand in the temple." Go where the Sanhedrim holds its sittings, where the high priest and his Sadducean comrades are on the watch. Let not the danger hinder you. Go where all can see you; stand up and stand out. Wherever the people are, there let your voices be heard. Be there perseveringly, taking your stand, and keeping it till removed by force. Brethren, it is not ours to hide in holes and in corners; our gospel is like the sun, whose line has gone out through all the earth.

The persons for whom this preaching is designed, are mentioned. "Speak unto the people." "Unto the people," that does not mean the poor to the exclusion of the rich, nor the many to the exclusion of the few. The expression is most comprehensive, and embraces both

The Masses and the Classes.

If we take the word "people" in its popular sense, it has a lesson to all who teach the word. To obey the text, we must "Go and speak to the people." They need it; are they not perishing for lack of knowledge? The gospel is adapted to their needs and capacities—it is simple, suitable, seasonable, saving. The people will receive it. If the poor have the gospel preached to them, they will hear it. God inclines the hearts of the multitude to hearken. We read of Jesus, that "all the people were very attentive to hear Him." Moreover, the people retain the truth when they receive it. Note the fact in history: the Reformation in Spain was among the nobility, and it was the same in Italy, and the work soon subsided. In England the common people received the truth from Wycliffe, and it never died out. If you want to burn a haystack, you would set it alight at the bottom; and if you want a whole nation to feel the power of the gospel, it must first be received by laborers and artisans. We are glad to see the noble, the great, the rich, the cultured dedicated to our Lord; but, after all, our chief hope lies among the people.

III. This Message is Described:

"Speak to the people all the words of this life." Our teaching, if we are true to Christ, will be not only a doctrine, but a life. The high priest conceived that they preached doctrine; for he said, "Ye have filled Jerusalem with your doc ne." Yet it may as truly be called life as th. The Christian religion is like Christ— y, truth, and life. We have to preach "words life"; truth which brings life, feeds life, and fects life. We are to preach all the great ths which concern eternal life.

What are the "words of this life"? If I had give a short list of them, I should say, the t word of this life is "Jesus Christ"; for in forty-second verse we read, "They ceased to teach and preach Jesus Christ": Jesus the words of eternal life. We preach his ity, his manhood, his offices, his sacrificial ith, his resurrection, and everything about n. We preach Christ crucified, and if we did , we should not speak the words of life. The t word to use would be "atonement." There o preaching "the words of this life" except preach the sacrificial death of the Son of d. The apostles boldly spoke of our Lord's th, for they said to the council, "Whom ye w and hanged on a tree." "The words of s life" are not preached to the people where

e next word would be "resurrection." is they preached very fully, saying, "Him h God raised from the dead." If the resur- ion were more fully preached at this time, I sanguine that it would be a powerful means conversion. Nor could the apostles forget generation." They would echo their Lord's ds, "Ye must be born again." Then comes ith." What a word is this! "Without h it is impossible to please God." "By grace re saved through faith." He who does not ch justification by faith, has not begun to ch "the words of this life." The sixth out seven words is "indwelling." The Holy rit comes into the heart, and abides there, king sanctification within, and producing ness without. Then comes the doctrine of eternal life: that the life given by the Holy rit never dies. "The water that I shall give , shall be in him a well of water, springing nto everlasting life."

hus have I very roughly told you what you to preach.

V. But now, fourthly, the whole of the di- e message must be delivered. "Stand in the ple, and speak unto the people all the words his life." Dear brethren, it is part of the gospel. I am very glad it is; if were permitted, we should sometimes k the unpopular parts of it. Yet surely it ould be very dangerous to omit any part of gospel, would it not? It would be like a sician giving a prescription to a dispenser, the dispenser omitting one of the ingred- s. He might kill the patient by the omis- . The worst results follow the keeping t of any doctrine: we may not see those re- s, but they will follow. Possibly only the generation will fully display the mischief e by a truth concealed or denied. It would dangerous experiment for us to make. is a thousand mercies that we are not left ick and choose, for this would involve us sponsibilities too weighty to be borne.

Forbidden us to Omit

It is Too Responsible a Business.

ould not the liberty be injurious to us? uld it not encourage pride? Would not this tly dishonor God? Would it not suggest God's gospel is full of superfluities and ex- ences, and needs our wisdom to make it ct? Should we not conclude that the Lord not so wise as ourselves if he needed our tance to adapt His gospel to the occasion? ou not think it would open a very easy way nother gospel? If we might omit, we might add; and I feel sure we should very soon a great deal which would neutralize and yze that of the gospel which remained. If lt at liberty to leave out something, we ld naturally omit that which is offensive, away would go the tooth and edge of the el. That which is offencive in the gospel it that which is effective. It is not left to e are to preach "all the words of this life."

Have we done so? That is the question. Have we knowingly concealed anything? "Well," says one, "I have not preached all the words of this life to the people, but I have preached them to a choice company." But you are told to preach them all to the people. The doctrine of reserve must not be tolerated among Protestants. We must not make that philosophical division which is expressed in those two ugly words

Esoteric and Exoteric.

This is abolished by the command to preach to the people "all the words of this life." At the present moment there is a great tendency to be obscure upon the true and proper Deity of Christ. I enjoyed the commencement of the prayer just offered by our dear friend Dr. John Hall. I enjoyed the whole of it, but I was greatly touched by his lowly adoration of our divine Lord. The Broad men will say that Jesus is divine, but they do not mean that He is God; they speak of His divinity, but they reject His Godhead. This is juggling with words. I hate deceptive phrases. We believe in the Godhead of Jesus, and worship Him as God.

The work of the Holy Ghost is left too much in the rear by many preachers. Have we not heard of late that certain children do not need to be converted, that the divine life is in them at their birth? Have they not preached education rather than regeneration, evolution rather than conversion? This is not speaking "all the words of this life." It is telling out

"Old Wives' Fables."

If there be any other point of truth which is kept back, let us bring it the more forward. Let us insist doubly upon that which others neglect. It needs that the whole gospel be brought before the people, that they may know it, and feel its power. It will involve you in strife and struggle if you resolve on delivering an all-around gospel; but fear not, the Lord will help you, even He who says to you by His angel, "Go, stand and speak in the temple to the people all the words of this life."

I have done when I have asked what we are doing about this? We who are God's people, what are we doing in this matter? Some of us are preaching; are we preaching the whole gospel? Has any doctrine been withheld? Let us bring forth things new and old, and keep back nothing. Let us put every stone into the arch, lest our building come to nothing. Have we also preached these truths as words of life? Have we felt the life in them?

But, beloved, are there not some of you who

Never Tell Anybody

"the words of this life?" In such a congregation ought it to be possible to put your finger upon a single regenerated man or woman who has never for a whole lifetime spoken to another about the things of God? Are such persons regenerated? I will not come round and mark you; but, alas! some of you have never even confessed your faith in Christ. If you have not obeyed that important command for yourselves, you are not likely to have done much for the souls of others. But having joined the church of God, are any of you satisfied to be silent?

Could not some of you do more than you are doing? Are there not young men who might preach in a street-corner or at a cottage-meeting? Some of our evangelistic societies flag for want of preachers. It ought not to be the case. What are you at? If you could not preach to men and women, could you not Teach the Children?

What are you at? You confess that you are not your own, but bought with a price by the Lord Jesus; why, then, do you not serve Him? I have succeeded to a large degree in routing some of you out; I miss you on Sunday evenings, and a good miss too, since I know where you are, and that you are out serving God. You take your meal in the morning, and then you feed others in the after part of the day.. The Lord bless you in it. You were not created to sit in these pews and listen to me; there is something better for a man than to be a hearer only.

I charge every Christian man and woman here to listen to what I am about to say. Though I am no angel, I repeat in the name of the Lord Jesus the command of the heavenly messenger: Go, stand out boldly, and speak unto the people all the words of this life; and may God bless you! Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

AN OUTCAST BLIND GIRL.*

"About three years since," says Mrs. Knowles, in her diary, "a young girl, a Roman Catholic, who was then a pupil at the Institution for the Blind. was brought to my notice. She became deeply interested in the Bible, and afterward embraced the Protestant faith, and since that time has continued firm in her belief and practice. She remained at the Institution until the end of the term, which expired in June. It was now necessary for her to seek another home. She was taken to the house of a relative, who insisted on her going to confession. This she refused, and was on this account rendered homeless. It was a source of great anxiety to know how to provide for her. The girl was sincere, evidently willing, 'not only to believe in Christ, but also to suffer for His sake.' Her case was stated to some ladies who felt an interest in her, and although they could not give her a home, they kindly assisted in paying her board; other friends to whom the case was made known did the same, and she is now learning a trade by which we hope she will soon earn enough for her own support. Her employer speaks well of her, and considers her very industrious."

The Drunkard's Wife.

"Some time ago I visited a woman whose husband had beaten her till she was almost helpless. She told me about his coming to her with a knife, and expected he would have taken her life. She asked me to engage in prayer with her. He sat by, apparently unmoved. When I was leaving, he asked me to forgive him. I told him it was not me he must ask; he must go to God for forgiveness. It was distressing to see the poor wife, as she asked me what she must do, as she had no friend on earth but me. I then spoke to the husband; he said he was very sorry he had acted so badly, and would drink no more. I intend getting him to sign the pledge, which he says he will do. The evil of intemperance meet us in so many ways, we often feel discouraged, and yet at times a case occurs which bids us work on and hope on. The man mentioned above, from that time continued to refrain from drink, and has treated his wife well ever since. She wept with gratitude as she told me, a few evenings since, that he came in and handed her all his money as he had received it for work. never having opened it. She could never forget the day when I came in and found almost everything in the room broken to pieces, and his promise which he faithfully made to me that he would try and do right."

Dr. Guthrie Repulsed.

I have read somewhere the story of Dr. Guthrie, when he was first called to the metropolis of Edinburgh. Of their filling his pockets with tracts, and with all the ardor of his noble heart, commenced his great work. He ascended the creaking stairs of a high building in the old town, and knocking at the door, an elderly woman made her appearance, whereupon he offered her a tract. Looking earnestly upon him, and in a loud, shrill voice, she exclaimed, pathetically, "Deed, sir, I dinna want yeer tracts, I weed thank ye for a loaf of breed." Ah! he thought to himself, here is a case of destitution, and excusing himself, he hurried down stairs, and going to the baker, he ordered bread; and to the butcher, he ordered beef; and to the grocer, he ordered some English breakfast tea and sugar, a few dainties, and a cart of coal, and requested them to be sent at once to the woman in want. Calling a few days afterward, he found her comfortably seated with a neighbor, around a cheerful hearthstone, drinking their newly-made tea. When she opened the door, she enthusiastically exclaimed, "Come awa, noo, Doctor, I am ready to hear you on the subject o' religion." Our departed sister also recognized the necessity of attending to the temporal as well as the spiritual wants of her parishioners simultaneously. A Gift of Fifty Dollars.

I remember once, during the same year in which the circumstances we are now commenting on transpired, of calling upon a friend, a broker, in Wall Street, of this city, and after some general conversation about Christian work, he called me into his rear office, and said:

"How are you getting along financially?"

"Well," I said, "I am able to keep my head above water."

"Ah!" he replied, "I have been watching you in your work, and want to make you a present of fifty dollars for your immediate wants."

I looked upon him with astonishment, and exclaimed:

"How is it, my friend, you can be so kind to me, as I am a comparative stranger to you?"

"Well," he said "I believe you are doing the Lord's work, and I feel that all the money belongs unto Him, and I am only His steward."

EXPLAINING THE POPE'S RESCRIPT.

(See Illustration.)

One of the most difficult duties the Irish Roman Catholic priests have had to do of late years, was that of explaining and impressing upon their flocks the Bull or Rescript of the Pope, condemning boycotting and "the Plan of Campaign." The priests had sanctioned both, and had encouraged their people to use these methods of warfare against obnoxious landlords and officials. It was, therefore, a most painful and humiliating task to read the Pope's condemnation from the altar, and exhort as they were required to do, their people to obey. The illustration herewith depicts the scene in the church at Kildare when Father Murphy read the Rescript, the effect of which is seen in the astonished faces of the congregation.

What the priest had to do was to convince his hearers that an Italian priest, far away in Rome, Italy, shut up in his magnificent palace of the Vatican, and surrounded with luxuries, knew all about their condition, and how they ought to act in their difficult circumstances. Happily for the priests they were not without guidance. Their bishops traced a line of argument which might be expected to operate on the devout and the brainless who might reasonably be expected to form the majority of the congregation. The bishops observed: "So far from intending by this decree to injure our national movement, it was the hope and purpose of his holiness to remove those things which he judged might, in the long run, be obstacles to its advancement and ultimate success. We must warn our people against the use of any hasty or irreverent language with reference to the Sovereign Pontiff, or to any of the sacred congregation through which he usually issues his decrees to the faithful, While expressing our deep and lasting gratitude to the leaders of the National movement for the signal services they have rendered to religion and the country, we deem it our duty at the same time to remind them and our flocks, as we most emphatically do, that the Roman Pontiff has an inalienable and divine right to speak with authority on all questions appertaining to faith and morals."

The feeling of the people, however, may be inferred from a resolution passed at a meeting of the citizens of Dublin, by which the meeting cordially endorses and adopts in their integrity the resolutions of the Irish Catholic members of Parliament with reference to the Circular of the Holy Office of the Inquisition, and respectfully declines to recognize any right in the Holy See to interfere with the Irish people in the management of Irish politics.

THE LAWYER'S COMMISSION.

"What a pity it is that men cannot foresee the time of their death," said Mr. Hanson, a middle-aged lawyer to his partner one morning as the two sat looking over their mail. "It is enough to make poor Raynor turn in his grave if he could know the way his money is going, and the trouble there will be about it."

"The young one is going the pace, I suppose; I have seen him here pretty often."

"Yes, and he is coming again this morning. Here is his letter; he wants more money. He has the most expensive collection of vices he could get hold of. Horse-racing, cards and worse are among them. I do not know what the end will be. The worst of it is that poor Raynor was so procrastinating, and went off so suddenly that people whom he loved and helped will have to suffer. That would not have been if he had known that he would die so soon. He meant to have destroyed several notes; but he never did it, and they stand there perfectly valid claims that young Charles will want to press. It is a disagreeable business all around. I shall have some painful work to do, I am afraid."

"You cannot help that. You are simply the agent. When Raynor made you executor he should have given you more power. I wonder, knowing his son's character he did not put the whole thing in trust."

The lawyer went off to court, and his partner, Mr. Hanson, went to examine the ledger, and to turn over the papers in a tin box, in preparation for the coming interview. He expected a painful struggle with the young heir, and was not disappointed. Mr. Charles Raynor duly arrived, punctual when the receipt of money was concerned, though punctuality was not one of his virtues.

"Rather a heavy draw this time, Mr. Hanson," he said, as he seated himself languidly in the client's chair, and surveyed the lawyer through his eye-glass. "I have had a run of shocking luck this week, and it will take five thousand to put me right. Luck is a fickle jade; I suppose she will visit me again soon, I have not seen her for some time. If you have no rents or dividends in, we shall have to see what we can sell."

"A bad time this for selling, Mr. Raynor," said the lawyer. "Prices are sure to rise, it is a pity to sell while the market is so low. Would it not be possible to wait a few weeks? Several dividends will be in then."

"Oh, no! these are debts of honor. They cannot be held over. What securities are there available? You have never given me a detailed list. Of course I know the lump sum, but I should like to know how it is made up."

"I have had the list prepared," said the lawyer, opening his drawer and producing a paper. "I should tell you that it contains several notes for money loaned by your late father, which he did not wish to be collected. They were advanced to old friends and men whom he helped in difficulties, and he intended to destroy the notes, but never did so."

"Lucky for me he did not," said the young man; "I should have been so much the poorer. Let me see the list."

The lawyer passed it to him, and Mr. Raynor ran quickly over it. "Ah!" he said, "here is the identical sum, note on demand from Edward Goff, $5.000. He is our man. Write and call it in."

"It will ruin him, Mr. Raynor. Your father set him up in business with that money. He has always paid the interest regularly, and he had your father's promise that, so long as he did that, he would not be asked for the principal."

The Lawyer's Interview With the Heir.

"Was that promise in writing?" asked the young man, quickly.

"No; it was merely verbal, but it was quite clear."

"Then tell him he must pay up. I do not mean to carry on this philanthropic business; can't afford it, you know."

"It is not a question of affording, Mr. Raynor. You could not get a better return for your money, however it was invested, and I think it is safe."

"Invested! No. Don't I tell you I am going to pay it away immediately?"

"Excuse me, Mr. Raynor, as an old friend of your father—he used to take my advice—begging you not to call in this money. This Goff will have to realize every stick he has to pay it and his large family will be in want. They have nothing but their business to depend upon. I am sure our father would be grieved to have the man ruined."

"It is a comfort, then, that he does not know, or at any rate cannot prevent it. Goff should look around for some other confiding old gentleman to come to the rescue. You see I am pressed myself. Tell the man so. You can say there is a sudden and unexpected demand you know—very sorry, but unavoidable. You will know how to put it. And you had better give all those other fellows notice that their debts must be paid. I shall be sure to need the money some day."

"I need scarcely remind you that if you reduce your capital your income will suffer."

"Oh, there is plenty yet. Besides, after a time, I shall slow up. I have been kept close so long that I must have a fling for a year or two. I must go now. I'm glad we have arranged this account. Get the money and send it to me as quickly as you can." So saying the young man sauntered out of the office, humming an operatic air as he went.

Mr. Hanson sat motionless for some minutes. He was a kind-hearted man, and had taken a personal pleasure in executing his dead friend's generous projects. This was a grievous commission, and he was reluctant to execute it. He pictured to himself the consternation of the debtor, and the misery of his family when the application reached the home. The young heir, however, had treated his protest so flippantly that there was not the slightest hope of avoiding the trouble. He wrote the letter, and, with a deep sigh, sent it to the mail.

The lawyer's prognostication was fully verified when poor Goff read the letter. He was stunned by the blow, and would have been utterly prostrated had not his wife, a pious woman, reminded him of God's promises and joined him in prayer for deliverance. They consulted together, and decided on Goff making a personal appeal to Mr. Raynor. His journey was a doleful one, and though he spent the time in silent prayer, the burden was not lifted when he entered Mr. Hanson's office.

"I feared it would ruin you," said the lawyer, when he had heard Goff's story. "Have you no friend who will help you? you might as easily move a mountain as to touch the heart of this young scapegrace."

"None, if he insists it must all go"; and the poor fellow's lip quivered as he thought of his wife and children.

"You are a pious man, Goff; have you prayed about it?"

"Yes," said Goff," and my wife believes we shall come out right; but my faith fails me."—

"I have prayed for you," said the lawyer solemnly, "and I am impressed with the idea that I can do more, and ought to do it. I have not the money, but, perhaps, my credit is good for that much. Come with me to the bank and let us see."

An hour or two later Goff was speeding homeward with a heart relieved. Mr. Hanson had borrowed the money on his own security, and had become his creditor instead of the heartless young profligate.

"I expect my partner will blame me," said Mr. Hanson, as he sat in his office and reflected on the transaction, but I have the satisfaction of having obeyed the Divine precept: "Do good, and lend hoping for nothing again." It was like a direct command from God to help the man, and I am glad I did it."

THE EPOCHS OF A LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. L. S. Keyser.

An Admission.

NOTWITHSTANDING Hadley's contempt for the advice given by Mr. Mardont in his sermon, as reported by Dane, and though believing the preacher to be illogical in recommending sceptics to pray, the young man accompanied his friend next Sunday night to Mr. Mardont's church. From his first appearance the preacher favorably impressed his critical hearer. The absence of self-consciousness and all trace of what Hadley called "cant," prepared him to give respectful attention to what he might have to say. The preacher's presence, too, was prepossessing. A man of some thirty years of age with a broad, scholarly brow, strong, well-chiselled mouth and chin, and clear, bright eyes, he was in the vigor of manhood and had the look of being a physical and mental athlete.

His opening sentences were in a sense apologetic. The fact that the majority of persons composing church audiences did not need to be convinced of the Divine origin and inspiration of the Bible was, he intimated, a sufficient reason for preachers dealing in their sermons with more advanced religious truth, which their hearers needed to learn, and treating the existence of God and the authenticity of the Bible as rudimentary truths already firmly established in their minds. Nevertheless, for the sake of some who had intellectual difficulties in accepting those truths, he had decided to go again over the beaten path and cite the evidences in their favor.

It was his opinion that sceptics were often unwisely and unkindly treated by Christians. Honest doubters seeking for truth, who might be won by patience and gentleness, where repelled when they described their difficulties, if Christians meet them acerbity, blamed them for doubting and treated them as moral lepers. The hearts of many sceptics were like ice that will melt in the sunshine of kindness and love, while some believers regarded those hearts as rocks needing to be blasted with dynamite. To some extent doubtless sceptics had provoked such treatment by a kindred disposition. They affected a superior air, as if the fact of their having these doubts were a proof of their having a more vigorous and acute intellect than that of the believer, and were apt to speak superciliously of the devout Christian as an ignorant dupe or a narrow-minded bigot far beneath them in mental calibre. They forgot that great philosophers have believed in the Bible, and that an institution which had been a blessing to the world and the comfort and stay of thousands in all ages and all lands, deserved serious and respectful examination and is not a fit subject for ridicule and invective. Men who spend their time in quibbling and lampooning Christianity simply advertised their own lack of mental and moral penetration.

"That's rather a bitter dose," commented Hadley, mentally.

"Who was Christ, the founder of our religion?" asked the preacher in animated tones. "Was He a base, designing character? Was He a man of puerile mind? What is the testimony of the most intelligent sceptics to the character of Jesus of Nazareth? A number of scholarly investigators have been to the pains of collecting these tributes, and I shall ask the privilege of giving extracts from a few of them."

Here the preacher quoted brief extracts from a number of sceptical and rationalistic writers, who have spoken in terms of the highest eulogy of Christ, and the system of religion which was founded by Him. Among these were Rousseau, Gœthe, Friederick Strauss, Ernest Renan, Lecky, John Stuart Mill, and Theodore Parker. He also cited a brilliant passage from Thomas Carlyle. It is unnecessary to transcribe these quotations here, as they are familiar to all who are acquainted with theological literature; but to the young sceptics they were a revelation.

"These encomiums are not cited to prove Christianity divine," the minister went on, "but only to show you that thoughtful and scholarly men do not make it the object of mockery, but of profound regard. I assure you that nothing is ever gained by derisory speech. The sceptic will only make those who believe the Scripture impatient with his diatribes, and they will probably regard him as incorrigible. Christians and honest doubters should not occupy a belligerent attitude toward one another, but while there should be no temporizing with error, the olive-branch of peace should be taken in the hand of the opposing forces, and all bad blood should be eliminated."

The sermon was replete with sage advice, and as the young sceptics returned to their room many words of praise were upon their lips. Usually on their way from church services they indulged in vigorous criticism or scornful ridicule, but this evening they had listened to a man who could sympathize with their doubts and unrest, and so they were for once disarmed of all hostility.

"We should feel very little antipathy toward Christians if they were all as large-orbed and well-poised as that man is," remarked Dane. "I could easily forgive their belief of the Scriptures, if are sincere, but their unreasoning narrowness and dogmatic airs are harder to forgive."

"That's so," Hadley responded; "but we are guilty of exhibiting the same spirit that we condemn in them, as the preacher told us this evening. We have invited their angry assaults by our ridicule. If an institution that we revered were held up to derision I suppose that it would touch us also into a lurid flame, and no doubt there is still a good deal of human nature about these Christians, even if they do profess to be 'new creatures.' But what a difference there is in the disposition of this preacher and that of the porcupine-like Bible-class teacher who bristled up so last Sunday morning! There seem to be two kinds of temper among Christians. I wonder whether both are in consonance with the religion they teach. If so, it must be a hotchpotch of contradictory maxims."

"I rather think," said Dane, after a reflective pause, "that the disposition shown by the preacher to-night is the one that is congruous with the teaching of the Bible, as far as I understand it. But I suppose there is an underlying cause for the ungenerous temper exhibited by the Sunday-school man. He has perhaps never been perplexed with doubts, as you and I are, and as Mr. Mardont evidently was at one time. That the Bible is true, has doubtless been 'a foregone conclusion' with him, and it is probably as difficult for him to sympathize with us as it is for us to sympathize with him."

"You are bound to defend that bigoted fellow," said Hadley, with some impatience. "For my part, I do not believe that any man who pretends to be an instructor to others has any right to be so narrow. He ought to broaden out his mental horizon."

By this time the young men had reached their room, and Hadley was just about to resume his criticism on the object of his dislike, when there was a knock at the door, and upon opening it, to his surprise he was confronted by the very man whom he held in contempt. After a few cold courtesies, the young students offered their unwelcome guest a chair, wondering what his errand might be.

"I have come," he began, in embarrassed tones, "to apologize to you, my young friends, for the ungenerous words I spoke to you last Sabbath morning."

The young men glanced at each other in amazement. This was rather an unexpected turn in the situation they were discussing. They could not find their voices to reply, and therefore after a moment of silence, during which the man made a visible effort to control himself, he resumed:

"At the time I spoke to you as I did, I supposed that my theory of the attitude of sceptics toward religion was the correct one. I have never been troubled, myself, with doubts of the divine authority of the Bible, and could only attribute opposition to it to perversity and badness of heart; but I have been at Mr. Mardont's church to-night, at which I heard his second discourse on infidelity, and—"

"Ah! did you hear his sermon this evening?" interrupted Hadley, finding his voice at last.

"Yes, sir; I have just come from the church. Well, the sermon opened my eyes, so that I see that I was wrong, and I have therefore come to apologize. The religion I profess, and I hope possess, will allow me to do no less than make an acknowledgment of my mistake. Young gentlemen," said the man, rising and extending his hand, "will you accept my apology?"

"By making an apology for our bad conduct," exclaimed Hadley, with some emotion, as he grasped the man's proffered hand.

"And as for me, I beg pardon for following my chum's bad example," said Dane, also shaking the man's hand; "and I cannot refrain from saying that I believe our first impressions of your character were entirely erroneous."

"Thank you, thank you," said the man gratefully, while a tear glittered on his bearded cheek. "Good-night, my young friends. If I can do you any good—" But he could say no more, and having taken them again warmly by the hand, he left the room.

The young men looked at each other in silence for a few moments, and then broke out into merry laughter, in which there was no feeling of gloating triumph, but only an emotion of genuine pleasure in noble deed.

"Well Hadley, what do you think of a religion that will make a man do that?" queried George, when his risibles were again under control.

"Ahem! I confess, in the vernacular of the politicians, that I—am—on—the fence!"

"But you do not mean to remain there I suppose?" said Dane. "For my own part, I want this question settled once for all. I thought it was settled for me, but Mr. Mardont has convinced me that I was too hasty. I believe we have accepted the evidence against the book too easily. Every defendant has a right to a hearing in his own defence. What do you say to a hearing right away?"

"Agreed!" said Hadley. "Let us see what some champion of the Bible has to say." He turned, as he spoke, to the shelves of their joint library, and glanced along the rows of books, Dane looking over his shoulder. The collection was somewhat large, but a few minutes brought them both to the same discovery. There was not a single book in their possession in defence of Christianity! They burst simultaneously into laughter.

"Well," said Dane, "Mr. Mardont was right; we are not fit to be judges in this matter; we have prejudged the case. We must remedy that in common fairness."

"Yes; still we have the Bible itself" said Hadley, "Let us look into the book itself for to-night, for an initial step."

That was a wise suggestion had it been executed wisely, but there are unwise ways of examining the Sacred Book, and one of these is the captious and fragmentary way. In pursuing other lines of research, men usually proceed methodically; but when they are about to seek for light on religious themes, how desultory and illogical their methods often are!

The young investigator opened the Bible at random, as if it were a work of bric-à-brac with no logical connection among its constituent parts. It happened that the Bible fell open at one of the imprecatory Psalms. He read aloud the first few verses, in which David rehearses the persecutions which he had suffered at the hands of his adversaries, closing with the sentence: "But I give myself unto prayer."

"Well, he bore his afflictions with becoming fortitude," commented Dane, with a pleased smile. "It is good so far."

Then followed the next verse: "Set thou a wicked man over him, and let Satan stand at his right hand."

"What is that?" asked George, musingly, leaning forward as he spoke.

Hadley read the verse again.

"I do not understand it," said Dane, "Does the writer ask God to deliver his enemy over to satanic powers?"

"It seems so; but let me read farther." Then Hadley resumed his reading: "When he shall be judged, let him be condemned, and let his prayer become sin."

"Good Heavens!" exclaimed George; "what a sacrilegious prayer!"

"Let his days be few," the reading continued, "and let another takes his office. Let his children be fatherless, and his wife a widow. Let his children be continually vagabonds, and beg; let them seek their bread also out of their desolate places."

"The vindictive brute!" muttered Dane, with compressed lips. "The idea of invoking the imprecations of Heaven upon a man's progeny for sins with which they had nothing to do!"

"It is pure fiendish malignity," said Hadley, "and there is more and worse. 'Let there be none to extend mercy unto him; neither let there be any to favor his fatherless children; let the iniquity of his fathers be remembered with the Lord; and let not the sin of his mother be blotted out.' Did you ever come across such inhuman ferocity. The man seems positively diabolic in his malice. I'll read no more of it."

"No; shut it up," said Dane; "it is a repulsive exhibition of what malignity human nature can produce."

"If Duneman feeds on this nourishment, it is not surprising that he has developed into the vicious, savage creature he is. This may account for it."

"What an anomaly it is that Mr. Mardont should be another development of the same teaching!" said Dane. "It produces very different effects in him. And what puzzles me most than anything else is that the sentiments you have been reading are so utterly out of consonance with the principles elsewhere enunciated in the Bible; for Christ told His disciples to love their enemies, and He Himself, when He was on the cross, prayed for His murderers. How can these disparities be reconciled?"

"They cannot be," declared Hadley, bluntly. "Evidently the extolled Book is a medley of contradictions. How people of any intelligence can accept this hotchpotch as the revelation of God is more than I can understand. It makes me mad to think of it."

"And this is the outcome of our investigations, which were begun in such a sanguine mood," said George, in disgust. "I am bitterly disappointed."

"Well, I shall do no more burrowing in the bogs of superstition to-night. I do not want to have a tilt with a spectre in my sleep, and think it time to dismiss these harassing questions. I'm going to bed." And he retired, and was soon "snoring the snore of the weary."

And thus these impetuous young logicians leaped precipitately to a conclusion, without mature consideration, without attempting to understand the character of the writer of the Psalm, or the circumstances in which it was written, and, above all, without reading the Psalm through to the end. Had they proceeded farther in their perusal, they would have discovered the reason that these penalties were called down upon David's enemy. It was not a vindictive prayer, but rather a prophecy of the evil that would inevitably befall one who was implacable and obdurate in sin, who "remembered not to show mercy. but persecuted the poor and needy man," and who, "clothed himself with cursing as with a garment." The punishment was condign, the justice of God's law falling upon the head of the inexorable foe of righteousness and mercy. All this they might have discovered, had they been less impatient and more thorough in their investigations as they would have been with the works of a secular author Yet the majority of sceptics and infidels treat the Book in the same superficial way, and call their desultory reading of it "a study" of the Bible!

THE DAY OF ATONEMENT.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for August 12, Levit. 16 : 1-22. Golden Text, Heb. 9 : 22.

The Meaning of the Day—The Strange Fire on the Altar—The Way of Access to God Blocked by Sin—Symbolism of the Offerings—The Priest also Needing Atonement—The Two Goats—Two Sacrifices Needed—The Dead and the Living—No Forgiveness Without Confession—Confession to Men not Sufficient—The Great Sin-Bearer—Consecration Symbolized in Burnt Offering.

"ALMOST all things are by the law purged with blood, and without shedding of blood is no remission." (Heb. 9: 22.) Nothing but the blood of Jesus cleanses from all sin. It is only when the conscience is satisfied because God is satisfied that there is any real sense of freedom from sin. The day of atonement, with all its ceremonies, is full of teaching about God's hatred of sin, and the fullness of the atonement of Jesus. There had been sin in the priesthood —Nadab and Abihu, the sons of Aaron, had been guilty of the sin of offering strange fire upon the altar. The fire which came from heaven was to be always burning there, but they had kindled fire of their own. Oh how often evangelists and ministers seek to kindle instead of waiting for the fire from heaven—the true Holy Ghost—who alone can make souls alive which were "dead in trespasses and sins." No amount of human energy or human enthusiasm can kindle God's fire; it always comes from heaven. It is blasphemy to attempt an imitation or a creation of God the Holy Ghost. As well might we seek to produce a Saviour—God the Son—as to produce God the Holy Ghost by human energy. The fire of the Lord came forth, and consumed the men who offered strange fire. (Lev. 10: 1, 2.) The cousins of the slain men were called to come and carry their remains "from before the sanctuary out of the camp." But their own brothers were not allowed to uncover their heads, or rend their garments, or show any sign of mourning. As priests of God, they must take part with God before considering father, mother, brother or sister (Matt. 10: 37); "for the anointing oil of the Lord is upon you." (Lev. 10: 6, 7.) It was on this occasion that God commanded every priest of God to abstain from wine or strong drink, "that ye may put difference between holy and unholy, and between unclean and clean, and that ye may teach."

"And the Lord spake unto Moses after the death of the two sons of Aaron .... Speak unto Aaron, thy brother, that he come not at all times into the holy place within the vail; that he die not; for I will appear in the cloud upon the mercy-seat." The direct and continual access to God had been blocked up by sin, and sin in the priesthood." Thus shall Aaron come into the holy place: with a young bullock for a sin offering, and a ram for a burnt offering. These must be the Acknowledgment of Sin.

Then Aaron must be clothed, his flesh must be covered. When Jesus died upon the cross, He was uncovered, for He was holy; there was no sin in Him. Aaron's sin offering was to make atonement for himself and his house; Jesus, our High Priest, needed no sacrifice, for He knew no sin. "For such an High Priest became us who is holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners, and made higher than the heavens; who needeth not daily as those high priests, to offer up sacrifice, first for his own sins, and then for the people's; for this He did once when He offered up Himself." (Heb. 7: 27.) After offering for himself, Aaron must present two kids of the goats at the door of the tabernacle, and he must cast lots upon them, one lot for the Lord, and the other lot for the scape-goat." One must be offered for a sin offering, and the other, the scape-goat "shall be presented alive before the Lord, to make an atonement with him, and to let him go for a scape-goat into the wilderness." Aaron must slay "the bullock of the sin-offering which is for himself." It was God's provision that none of the Jewish priesthood should have occasion to arrogate to themselves any holiness beyond the holy calling, and the holy functions which were entrusted to them. In themselves they were but sinners, needing atonement as much as any sinners in Israel. When he had slain the bullock, in token that every sinner, though he be a priest, has slain Jesus by his sins, he must take a censer full of burning coals from off the altar (God's fire), and his hands full of sweet incense, a token of the praise which God accepts when it is offered in the spirit. The sweet incense must be beaten small, like the praise which enters into the detail of God's love and goodness to us; and this he may bring within the veil, into the immediate presence of God, "And he shall put the incense upon the fire before the Lord, that the cloud of the incense may cover the mercy-seat that is upon the testimony, that he die not. And he shall take of the blood of the bullock, and sprinkle it with his finger upon the mercy-seat eastward; and before the mercy-seat shall he sprinkle of the blood with his finger seven times." "The soul that sinneth it shall die." (Ezek. 18: 4.) The blood poured out is a proof of Life Sacrificed.

God cannot clear the guilty, cannot ignore sin, but He can accept of an atonement. The blood of Jesus "speaketh better things than that of Abel." (Heb. 12: 24.) Having thus established his own communion with God, the priest must bring the people's sin offering. He can do nothing for the people unless he is right himself. The blood of the ram, the people's offering, must also be sprinkled upon and before the mercy seat. "And he shall make an atonement for the holy place, because of the uncleanness of the children of Israel, and because of their transgressions in all their sins: and so shall he do for the tabernacle of the congregation that [dwelleth] among them in the midst of their uncleanness." All must be atoned for, all cleansed with blood. And God would have no witness, all this must be done entirely alone with Him. "There shall be no man in the tabernacle." Then straight from this transaction he must go out to the altar of burnt offering, "and make an atonement for it, ... and cleanse it, and hallow it from the uncleanness of the children of Israel." "Without shedding of blood is no remission."

"And when he hath made an end of reconciling the holy place, and the tabernacle of the congregation, and the tabernacle of the congregation and the altar, he shall bring the live goat: and Aaron shall lay both his hands upon the head of the live goat, and confess over him all the iniquities of the children of Israel, and all their transgressions in all their sins, putting them upon the head of the goat, and shall send him away by the hand of a fit man into the wilderness: And the goat shall bear upon him all their iniquities into a land not inhabited; and he shall let go the goat in the wilderness." To represent Jesus, who is a propitiation for our sins, needs two sacrifices—the one dead, for He has died for us; the other living, for "He ever liveth to make intercession for us" (Heb. 7: 25); while the blood of the sin offering speaks before the mercy-seat, Aaron confesses the sins of the people over the head of the live goat. "If we confess our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins. and to cleanse us from all iniquity." (1 John 1; 9.) There is no forgiveness without confession of sin, and certainly no cleansing. "Whoso covereth his sins shall not prosper; but he that confesseth and forsaketh them shall have mercy." (Prov. 28: 13.) "I said, I will confess my transgressions unto the Lord, and thou forgavest the iniquity of my sin." (Ps. 32: 5.) But the sin must be confessed

Over the Head of the Goat.

There are some, such as Balaam and Judas, who confess their sins, but not unto the Lord. Balaam said "I have sinned" to an angel, but he did not say it to God. (Num. 22: 34.) Saul confessed to Samuel, and asked his forgiveness, but he did not deal personally with God (1 Sam. 15: 30), and Judas confessed only to the chief priests, to receive in return the heartless, taunting reply, "What is that to us? see thou to that." (Matt. 27: 3, 4.) There are people who seem to take a pleasure in spinning out the story of their sins with no sense of shame or contrition, but apparently to excite the interest of the hearers. Oh, how awful must such things be in the sight of a holy God, who has made the real confession of sin by the sinner to be a confession with our hands upon the devoted head of Jesus, identifying ourselves with Him who, though He "knew no sin," was made sin for us, . . . that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him. (II Cor. 5: 21.) "And the goat shall bear upon him all their iniquities." "The Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all." (Isa. 43: 6.) God does not want us to bear the burden of the sins which Jesus died for. "Cast thy burden upon the Lord" (Ps. 55: 22) —even the burden of thy sin. Reconciled, because atoned for, and cleansed by His blood. He wants us to "rejoice in the Lord alway," to be glad in what He is, and in what He has done for us. "He will turn again, He will have compassion upon us, he will subdue our iniquities: and Thou wilt cast all their sins into the depths of the sea." (Mic. 7: 19.) "As far as the east is from the west, so far hath He removed our transgressions from us." (Ps. 103: 12.) "In those days, and at that time, saith the Lord, the iniquity of Israel shall be sought for, and there shall be none, and the sins of Judah, and they shall not be found: for I will pardon them whom I reserve."

After Aaron had made confession of the people's sins, which he must have heard first from their own lips, he must put off his holy garments, leaving them in the holy place, must wash his flesh in water, and then must put on his altar garments, and offer the burnt offering in token that the people now cleansed yielded themselves in the burnt offering wholly unto God. But the man who let go the scapegoat must also wash his clothes and bathe his flesh in water, and afterward come into the camp. All which had to do with sin must be put out of sight—altogether. How hateful then must it be to God to have details of sin told from mouth to mouth, or read in the papers, or made into novels! How depraved is the taste, how far from God the mind, which dwells upon these things! God's Word, speaking of one class of sin, says, "But fornication, and all uncleanness or covetousness, let it not be once named among you as becometh saints: neither filthiness nor foolish talking; nor jesting, which are not convenient, but rather giving of thanks." (Eph. 5; 3, 4.) The day of atonement was observed once a year. But Christ our High Priest has made atonement once for all. Let us continually remember, and live in the power of His atoning work.

CONSECRATION.

H. W. BROWN.

Now ye have consecrated yourselves unto the Lord, come near and bring sacrifices and thank offerings into the house of the Lord.—II. CHRON. xxix: 31.

Are you willing, wholly willing,
Just the little things to do,
Caring more to please the Master,
Than for what men say of you?

Are you sure you are not able
Just a fait'ring prayer to raise,
Choosing not your will and pleasure,
If your Saviour it will praise?

Do you feel no obligation
To acknowledge Christ in you?
Have you never asked in earnest,
"Lord, what wilt Thou have me do?"

You have asked, and He has shown you,
But your shrinking heart cried "No!
It is true, I asked for service,
But,—this way I cannot go!"

While you choose, you are not willing;
Consecration yieldeth all!
Consecration means obedience
To the Spirit's every call:—

Meaneth dying, meaneth living,
(Death of self and life in God.)
Meaneth work, or patient waiting,
Or submission 'neath the rod!

Meaneth such a full surrender,
We shall never dare to ask
Why God gives our faith such testing,
Or assigns so hard a task.

We are here to be perfected;—
Only Christ our needs can see:
Rarest gems bear hardest grinding,
God's own workmanship are we!

He loves harmony, not discord,
And what ever may befall,
Life's grand Psalm He is perfecting;
Let us praise Him for it all.

"Seest thou a man wise in his own conceit; there is more hope of a fool than of him." Christian Work in Mexico.

Through the reading of the Holy Scriptures translated into Spanish some earnest souls in Mexico have, by God's blessing, been led to a clear knowledge of the Gospel. From their numbers able preachers of the Christian faith in its primitive purity have been raised up, around whom congregations have been gathered from among the humble poor, who have been the first to publicly welcome and defend the pure Gospel in Mexico. The members of these congregations, rich in faith, have worked earnestly and bravely for Christ and His truth among their fellow countrymen in that beautiful Southern portion of North America called Mexico. Schools have been established by them, in which large numbers of bright boys and girls have received a good secular education and have been carefully taught the Christian faith. From the children thus educated faithful Christian workers have been raised up. A Mexican Branch of the Church of Christ, that maintains the faith in its purity and integrity, has been organized among these native Christians in the Republic of Mexico. The members of this Mexican Church of Christ, though gathered mostly from among the poor, are yet doing a most important Christian work. To continue that work, we need to pay a few leading workers small monthly salaries, and also to defray some current expenses. To raise the needed funds we have formed a society with an office at 43 Bible House, New York, U. S., and should be pleased to have many of our fellow Christians join this society by becoming regular contributors to its treasury. We are trying to secure monthly or quarterly contributions to meet the regular monthly expenses of the work. In order to continue and extend the work, we wish to raise four hundred dollars a month, by endeavoring to have four hundred persons each give on an average one dollar every month to this object, leaving the donors to give less or more as they may be able and willing.

We earnestly invite all who will, to join us in this systematic effort in behalf of the cause of Christ in Mexico, by becoming monthly subscribers to this fund. We have already regular subscribers whose gifts amount monthly to over eighty dollars, and a growing circle of friends who are forwarding us occasional donations.

This Mexican Church of Christ is a very effective instrumentality through which to do Christian work among the many millions on this Western Hemisphere who speak the Spanish language, comparatively few of whom have ever had a Bible in their hands. A beautiful church building has been secured in the City of Mexico as the centre of the activities of this Mexican Church of Christ. Through the workers connected with that centre more than forty congregations have been gathered from among the poor in different parts of the Republic of Mexico. We have some faithful and able preachers now in the field, but more young men need to be trained for the ministry. Multitudes of Protestant children in Mexico, some of them orphans, need to be educated. We make three requests of you, Christian reader: first, that you will, if possible, become a monthly or quarterly subscriber in behalf of this Christian work; second, that you will try and induce your friends also to contribute to it; third, that you will remember this precious work in Mexico in your prayers.

We most sincerely thank all who are already generously contributing to this Christian work for their timely and generous gifts, and we earnestly invite many others, to unite with us in aiding it by also becoming monthly subscribers in its behalf. Those who may not feel that they can give as much as a dollar a month are earnestly asked to give what they can, whenever they are able—EVERY LITTLE HELPS. Fellow Christian, if you will generously consent to contribute a dollar a month or more or less to the work, will you kindly inform me of the fact? Contributions either large or small can be mailed directly to my address as follows:

The Pan-Anglican Conference—The Archbishop of Canterbury and Twelve Prominent Members.

THE CONFERENCE OF BISHOPS

Of The Protestant Episcopal Church.

FOLLOWING the representatives of the Presbyterian Church who took part in the Pan-Presbyterian Council, whose portraits appeared in this journal last week, we this week give portraits of the representatives of the Protestant Episcopal Church who with many others of eminence were gathered in a great conference in London. The Archbishop of Canterbury issued a general invitation to the bishops of the Church some time ago, and on July 3 one hundred and forty one met in response to his invitation. They came from all quarters of the world.

The American Bishops were: the Bishops of Minnesota, New York, Western New York, Tennessee, Maine, Missouri, Oregon, Albany, Pennsylvania, Central Pennsylvania, Arkansas, North and South Dakota, Massachusetts, North Carolina, Colorado, Milwaukee, New Jersey, Northern New Jersey, Chicago, Iowa, Quincy, Springfield, Michigan, New Mexico, Washington, Miss., Pittsburg, Mississippi, Indiana, and Maryland. Those from Canada were the Bishops of Fredericton, Ontario, Quebec, Newfoundland, Toronto, Huron, Qu'Appelle, Niagara, Saskatchewan, and Nova Scotia.

This was the third of these Pan Anglican Conferences.

The First Conference, which was held in 1867, originated in a suggestion from the United States. Dr. Sumner, who in 1851 was Archbishop of Canterbury, sent in that year an invitation to Dr. Hopkins, then Bishop of Vermont, and at that time Presiding Bishop, to share in the third jubilee of the venerable Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts. Bishop Hopkins replied that the time had now come to meet in the "good old fashion of synodical action. How natural (he added) and how reasonable would it seem, 'in a time of controversy and division,' that there should be a council of all the bishops in communion with your Grace; and would not such an assemblage exhibit the most solemn and, under God, the most influential aspect of strength and unity in maintaining the true Gospel? It is my own firm belief that such a measure would be productive of immense advantage, and would exercise a moral influence far beyond that of any secular legislation." The time however, had not come then, and such were the conflicting opinions of the prelates, and so burning were the questions which would inevitably arise, that wider division was more probable as a result of Conference than unity.

Sixteen years later many and important changes had occurred in the Episcopal bench in England and America, and the time was deemed favorable for the meeting of a conference. The preliminaries were settled, and on February 22, 1867, the invitation was issued by the Archbishop of Canterbury to all the bishops in communion with the Church of England—Dr. Colenso alone excepted—to meet on September 24 and the three following days at Lambeth palace. The objects of the conference were specified to "unite together in the highest acts of the Church's worship" and in "brotherly consultation; to consider together many practical questions, the settlement of which would tend to the advancement of the kingdom of our Lord and Master, Jesus Christ; and to the maintenance of greater union in the missionary work, and to increased intercommunion among ourselves." When the conference met only seventy-eight of the two hundred and more Bishops of the Anglican Communion were present, but the debates were vigorous and their influence healthful. "The American Bishops," said Dr. Wilberforce, Bishop of Oxford, "won golden opinions." was held in 1878. Dr. Tait was at that time Archbishop of Canterbury. He had an interview in 1874 with Dr. Kerfoot, Bishop of Pittsburg, who passed through London on his way home from attending the Old Catholic Conference at Bonn. The effect of the first Pan-Anglican conference was considered at that interview, and Dr. Kerfoot was strongly in favor of the summoning of a second. Dr. Tait requested his American brother to consult with the American Bishops on the subject, and he complied at the next General Convention. The result was a request to the Archbishop of Canterbury, signed by forty-three of the forty-six Bishops at the convention, that he would summon a second conference. The Archbishop acceded, and sent a cordial invitation to the American Bishops personally by his son, Rev. Crawford Tait. The conference commenced its sittings July 2, 1878, One hundred Bishops were in attendance, of whom nineteen came from America.

The Second Conference

The results of the Conference were more practical and definite than those of its predecessor. Committees were appointed to consider specific subjects, and their reports were presented and discussed by the whole Conference. The final decisions were embodied in an official letter signed by the Archbishop as its President. The Reports dealt with a wide range of subjects, including the best means of maintaing union among the Anglican churches, the establishment of ecclesiastical tribunals, the relations of missionary Bishops and missionaries; and the adaptation of the Book of Common Prayer to the needs of native congregations in heathen lands was, among other things, recommended.

The Third Conference

assembled on the third of last month. Though its results are not yet publicly known, the Bishops having sat with closed doors, the subjects discussed show that the high dignitaries of the Church turned their attention to matters of practical moment, and were solicitous for the union and advancement of the Church in the work of evangelization. They included: "Definite Teaching of the Faith to Various Classes, and the Means Thereto;" "The Anglican Communion in Relation to the Eastern Churches, to the Scandinavian and other Reformed Churches, to the Old Catholics, and others;" "Polygamy of Heathen Converts—Divorce;" "Authoritative Standards of Doctrine and Worship;" "Mutual Relations of Dioceses and Branches of the Anglican Communion;" "The Church's Practical Work in Relation to Intemperance, Purity, Emigration, and Socialism."

A Cordial Welcome

to the Bishops from America and other lands was extended by the Archbishop of Canterbury, at a solemn public service on June 30 in Canterbury Cathedral. They were received at a prefatory luncheon, spread in the crypt of the old Abbey of St. Augustine's Missionary College. The proceedings were informal, but there was a grace and dignity about the speeches of the Archbishop and his episcopal brethren. Dr. Whipple, the beloved Bishop of Minnesota, replying on behalf of the "sister or daughter Church of America," said: "There is no branch of the Anglican Church which has more reason for devout thanksgiving and gratitude than the Church in Canada and the United States. Wherever she is known she is loved, and thousands are looking to her to-day as the Church of the reclamation." Then followed the service in the Cathedral, which was of a most imposing character.

The Te Deum having been sung, the Archbishop of Canterbury (Dr. Benson) sitting between the two wings of the historical marble throne called St. Augustine's Chair, delivered a brief address, in the course of which he said, "Brethren, most dear and to me most reverend, few privileges of my office can surpass that which, though unworthy, I exercise to-day. It is to bid you welcome in the name of the Lord." Evening service followed the Archbishop's address. The final hymn was "The Church's one foundation," and such hearty congregational singing as it evoked has rarely echoed through the aisles of the cathedral. At the end of the service the Bishops were entertained at the Deanery, and returned to London in readiness for the sessions of the following week.

THE THIRTEEN PORTRAITS.

Dr. Benson, Archbishop of Canterbury.

EDWARD WHITE BENSON, the Archbishop of Canterbury, whose portrait occupies the centre of the group on the first page, is the son of E. W. Benson, Esq., of Birmingham, England. He was born in 1829, and is now fifty-nine years of age. In December, 1876, he was nominated by the Crown, on the recommendation of the Earl of Beaconsfield, to the newly founded Bishopric of Truro, and he received episcopal consecration in St. Paul's Câthedral, on April 25, 1877. In December, 1882, he was appointed to the Archbishopric of Canterbury in succession to Dr. Tait.

Dr. Hills, Bishop of Columbia.

GEORGE HILLS is the son of the late Rear-Admiral George Hills, and was born at Eyethorn, Kent, in 1816, so that he is now seventy-two years of age. He was educated at Durham University, where he graduated M. A. in 1838, and took the degree of D. D. in 1858. His ordination as priest took place in 1829. He was incumbent of St. Mary's, Leeds, in 1846; vicar of Great Yarmouth in 1848; and appointed honorary Canon of Norwich Cathedral in 1850. He was consecrated first Bishop of British Columbia, North America, in the year 1859.

Dr. Goe, Bishop of Melbourne.

FIELD FLOWERS GOE is the son of the late Mr. F. F. Goe, solicitor, and was born at Louth, Lincolnshire, in 1832, so that he is now fifty-six years old. He was a pupil of King Edward Grammar School in his native town, and after studying law for a time went to Oxford University in 1854, graduating M. A. in 1857. He was ordained in 1858 to the Curacy of Christ Church, Hull, and in the same year succeeded the Rev. J. King as incumbent of that church. In 1873 he was appointed to the Rectory of Sunderland; four years later he was appointed to the Rectory of St. George's, Bloomsbury. In 1884 he was Select Preacher to the University of Cambridge; and in 1886 was selected by Lord Salisbury to fill the Bishopric of Melbourne, Australia, vacated by the translation of Dr. Moorhouse to the see of Manchester.

CHARLES WALDEGRAVE SANDFORD is the son of the late Archdeacon Sandford. He is sixty years of age, having been born in Kent, in 1828. He received his academical education at Oxford, was several years Senior Censor of Christ Church, became Commissary of the Archbishop of Canterbury in 1869, and Rector of Bishopsbourne, Kent, in 1870. On the resignation of Bishop Harris, he was nominated to the see of Gibraltar, and was consecrated at Oxford, on February 1, 1874. The work of his diocese has been most successful.

Dr. Smythies, Bishop of Central Africa.

CHARLES ALAN SMYTHIES is about sixty years of age, and is an East Anglian by birth and descent. Having successfully passed through his College curriculum at Oxford University, he was ordained in 1871, and in 1883 consecrated Lord Bishop of Central Africa. The diocese comprises an area possibly of 8,000,000 square miles, with a population roughly guessed as 100,000,000. It comprises the Congo Valley, the Great Lakes, Equatorial Africa proper, and the whole of the native states north of the Zambesi.

Dr. Jones, Bishop of Capetown.

WILLIAM WEST JONES is a graduate of Oxford University, and was consecrated to the see in 1874. He is about 55 years of age. Capetown is the capital of Cape Colony, South Africa, and is the centre of an extensive region, which includes Port Elizabeth, Grahamstown, Kimberley, the seat of the diamond trade; and within easy reach of Bechuanaland, the Orange Free State, Basutoland, and Natal, which together with the Atlantic on the west, the Orange River on the north, and the Indian Ocean on the south, constitute the boundaries of the Colony.

Dr. Thomson, Archbishop of York.

WILLIAM THOMSON was born at Whitehaven, Cumberland, on February 11, 1819, and is now 69 years old. He was educated at Shrewsbury School and at Queen's College, Oxford, of which he was successively Scholar, Fellow, Tutor, and Provost. He was ordained priest in 1843, and after four years experience of parochial labor at Guildford and at Cuddesdon, he became tutor of His College. On the translation of Dr. Baring to Durham, Dr. Thomson was on the recommendation of Lord Palmerston, appointed to the vacant see of Gloucester and Bristol in December, 1861. On the death of Archbishop Sumner, Dr. Longley was translated to Canterbury, and the archiepiscopal see of York thus becoming vacant in November, 1862, the appointment was conferred on Dr. Thomson.

Dr. Jermyn, Bishop of Brechin,

HUGH WILLOUGHBY JERMYN, Bishop of Brechin, and Primus of Scotland, was born in 1820, and received his education at Trinity Hall, Cambridge University, where he took his B. A. in 1841, M. A. in 1847, and D. D. in 1872. Having been ordained priest by the Bishop of London in 1846, he eventually accepted an appointment in the West Indies, and was made Archdeacon of St. Christopher. Returning to England he became Rector of Nettlecombe, Somerset, in 1858, and in 1871 was appointed Bishop of Colombo, being consecrated in the chapel of Lambeth Palace on October 28, of that year. He resigned this See early in 1875, but in January, 1876, he was installed Bishop of Brechin. In September, 1886, he was elected Primus of the Episcopal Church of Scotland, in succession to the late Bishop Eden.

Dr. Lord Plunket, of Dublin.

WILLIAM CONYNGHAM PLUNKET, Protestant Archbishop of Dublin, is the eldest son of the third Lord Plunket. He was born in 1828, being now sixty years old, and succeeded to the title on the death of his father in 1871. He was educated in Trinity College, Dublin. He was chaplain to his uncle, the late Bishop of Tuam, from 1857 to 1864, during which period he was Rector of Kilmoylan and Commoner; Treasurer, and subsequently Precentor of St. Patrick's Cathedral from 1864 to 1876; and Bishop of Meath from 1876 to 1884. On the resignation of Archbishop Trench, in 1884, Lord Plunket was elected Archbishop of Dublin.

Dr. Barry, Bishop of Sydney.

ALFRED BARRY is the second son of the late eminent architect, Sir Charles Barry. He was born in London in 1826; and is, therefore, now sixty-two years old. Proceeding from King's College, London, to Trinity College, Cambridge, he graduated B. A. with considerable distinction, obtaining a fellowship in 1848. He was ordained in 1850, and was Sub-Warden of Trinity College, Glenalmond, from 1851 to 1854, and held from 1854 to 1862 the Head Mastership of the Grammar School at Leeds, which he raised to a very high position by his energy and ability; and in 1862 he was appointed to the Principalship of Cheltenham College. In 1868 he became Principal of King's College, London; in 1869 Examining Chaplain to the Bishop of Bath and Wells; in 1871 a Canon of Worcester; and in 1881 Canon of Westminster. In 1883 he was consecrated Primate of Australia, Metropolitan of New South Wales, and Bishop of Sydney.

Dr. Medley, Bishop of Fredericton.

JOHN MEDLEY, Bishop of Fredericton and Metropolitan of Canada, was born in 1804, being now eighty-four years of age. He was educated at Wadham College, Oxford University, where he graduated B. A., in honors, in 1826, and M. A. in 1830. He was for several years after his ordination vicar of St. Thomas's, Exeter, and Prebendary of that Cathedral, and so long ago as 1845 was consecrated first Bishop of Fredericton. His diocese includes the entire province of New Brunswick, a province of the Dominion of Canada, and has an area of 27,322 square miles, of which Fredericton is the capital, and the chief commercial city St. John. The population is about 322,000.

Dr. Bickersteth, Bishop of Japan.

THE name of Bickersteth is well known in the English Church of past generations, and is represented to-day abounding in every good word and work by Dr. Edward Bickersteth, Dean of Lichfield, and Dr. Edward Henry Bickersteth, Bishop of Exeter. Another Dr. Edward Bickersteth is the present Bishop of Japan, whose portrait is given on our front page. He is about fifty years old, and was ordained priest in 1874 by the Bishop of London, and consecrated missionary-bishop of the English Church in Japan in 1886.

Dr: Mylne, Bishop of Bombay:

LOUIS CHARLES MYLNE, the Bishop of Bombay, is the son of Major Charles David Mylne, of the Hon. East India Company's service, and was born in Paris in 1843, being now therefore forty-five years of age. He received his early education at Merchiston Castle School, Edinburgh, at the University of St. Andrews, and at Corpus Christi College, Oxford University, where he graduated B. A., first-class in Classics, in 1866; M. A. in 1870; and D. D. in 1876. He was curate of North Moreton, Berkshire, from 1866 to 1870, and senior Tutor of Keble College, Oxford, from 1870 to 1876. He was appointed Bishop of Bombay in succession to the late Rev. Dr. Douglas, and was consecrated in St. Paul's Cathedral, London.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

The Big Prize to be Won.—The Rev. Mr. Gullan says: "Some time ago, one of my two little girls came to me and said, 'Father, there is an examination coming on; a big prize is to be given, and I mean to have it if it be at all possible.' 'Very well, my child,' I said, 'try your best, and I think there is every chance of your succeeding if you enter in that spirit.' My other daughter also brought me the news of the approaching examination. She entered my study, and in the most lachrymose tones, said, 'Father, there is a terrible examination coming on; a large money prize is to be given. I should like to have it very much, but I know there is not any chance; I could never manage it.' 'No,' I replied. 'I am quite sure there is not, especially if you try in that way.' Similarly, when Christians set out to live the sinless life, if they say, 'I know that I cannot do it; I shall be sure to stumble,' then that man is sure to fulfil his fear; but if he start with the firm resolution to succeed, then in God's strength he will go further towards the attaining of his goal."

A Signalman's Story. "A Couple of Years ago I was drinking with a lot of railway men, abusing my wife, neglecting my home, and going right to ruin. Again and again the railway missionary and some of my Christian mates tried to get me to come and hear the gospel. But not for me; I liked best when off duty to lean over the bar of a saloon. One Sunday evening, two years ago, I heard some men singing. I was rather fond of singing. I stopped to listen, and soon I saw it was some of my mates. I wanted to bolt, but they caught sight of me, and one of them came and took hold of my arm. 'You wait a bit and hear us sing, and hear what we've got to say.' I did, and rather liked it, so that I was there my next Sunday off duty. That night I followed them to the tent and went home mighty angry, for it seemed they talked just about me. However, I went away. I began to see I was a sinner, and then that Christ was a Saviour. The end of it was, I cried for mercy, and now I know my sins are forgiven. Oh, its made a rare difference at home—the wife can tell you that."

Increasing the Sunday-School.—The Rev. Mr. Gunn remarks: "When, as a student, I was connected with the North Leith Parish Church, our Sunday-school was 200 strong, but the minister thought it could be largely increased if some proper means were taken to do it. So he proposed to a dear friend of mine, who was also studying for the ministry, and myself, that we should begin a systematic canvass of the district. This we did, taking the whole district street by street, and door by door. When we got through the parish, the school had increased in number from 200 to 600, and many of them were led to accept Jesus as their Saviour. Yes, one of the best ways of raising the standard of morality is to get at the children early, ere they have learned the terrible power of sin and been tainted by it. It is better to prevent a child from becoming a drunkard or a thief, than to rescue him after he is stepped in iniquity."

A Mistaken Sunday-school Teacher.—I knew a Sunday-school teacher who was constantly getting discouraged regarding his work, and sending in his resignation, saying he was unfitted to be a teacher. We persuaded him more than once to stay on, but ultimately he went to Edinburgh, and for years we heard nothing more of him. A long time afterward, a missionary, one of our most prominent Christian workers, asked me where this gentleman had gone, as he had been his Sunday-school teacher, and he would like to see him, that he might tell him what a great help his Sunday-school teaching had been to him, and how it was in his class he had received the first impetus toward the mission field. We never know all the good that, with God's blessing, may come from our efforts. We should never be discouraged, but, scattering the gospel seed in faith and hope, leave the harvest to be ripened in due course by the Great Husbandman who "gives the increase."

A King's Apostacy and Assassination.—Mr. Hamilton relates: "It is told of King Henry IV. of France, that when he was only king of Navarre, Protestantism had not a more vigorous upholder. But, when his cousin, the king of France, died, and he prepared to fight for his right to the French throne, he showed himself no true follower of Christ, but a follower of the mammon of this unrighteous world. When some French nobles sought an audience, and promised him their support, which would tend to secure him the throne, if he abjured the reformed doctrine, his reply was, 'The kingdom of France is well worth a mass.' And he actually gave up his Protestant faith for an earthly crown. Yet look at his tragic end—assassinated by the emissary of Popery for which he had given up Protestantism. How unlike Moses, who gave up the prospect of the throne of Egypt, choosing rather to suffer affliction with the people of God than enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season."

A Heroic Spanish Prince.—"One of the Bigoted kings of Spain authorized the Jesuits to destroy the heretics wherever they were found, and of whatever rank. Accordingly, peasants, priests, and nobles were dragged to the Inquisition, and thence to the stake. Yet still Protestantism lived. At length it was whispered that one of the king's sons was tainted with the hated heresy. How could the most Catholic king expect a blessing when in his own family he nourished a viper. It was urged upon him that, as a Roman Catholic king, he must make an example of even his own son. At length the king gave way, and his son was handed over to the Inquisitorial tyrants. In spite of torture, persuasion, and threats, the son stood firm. As a prince, he was permitted the choice of his mode of death. At his own request, he was put into a warm bath and there had his veins opened. He chose to suffer martyrdom with the servants of God rather than purchase safety at the expense of betraying his Divine Saviour."

ORTHODOXY NOT OBSOLETE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached at Chautauqua, N. Y., Last Sunday Morning, August 5, 1888.

A GREAT London fog has come down upon some of the ministers and some of the churches in the shape of what is called "advanced thought" in Biblical interpretation. All of them, and without any exception, deny the full inspiration of the Bible. Genesis is an allegory, and there are many myths in the Bible, and they philosophize and guess and reason and evolute until they land in a great continent of mud, from which, I fear, for all eternity they will not be able to extricate themselves.

The Bible is not only divinely inspired, but it is divinely protected in its present shape. You could as easily, without detection, take from the writings of Shakespeare, "Hamlet," and institute in place thereof Alexander Smith's drama, as at any time during the last fifteen hundred years a man could have made any important change in the Bible without immediate detection. If there had been an element of weakness, or of deception, or of disintegration, the Book would long ago have fallen to pieces. If there had been one loose brick or cracked casement in this castellated truth, surely the bombardment of eight centuries would have discovered and broken through that imperfection. The fact that notwithstanding all the furious assaults on all sides upon it, is proof to me that it is a miracle, and every miracle is of God. "But," says some one, "while we admit the Bible is of God, it has not been understood until our time." My answer is, that if the Bible be a letter from God, our Father, to man, His child, is it not strange that that letter should have been written in such a way that it should allow seventy generations to pass away and be buried before the letter could be understood? That would be a very bright father who should write a letter for the guidance and intelligence of his children, not understandable until a thousand years after they were buried and forgotten! While as the years roll on other beauties and excellencies will unfold from the Scriptures, that the Bible is such a dead failure that all the Christian scholars for eighteen hundred years were deceived in regard to vast reaches of its meaning, is a demand upon my credulity so great that if I found myself at all disposed to yield to it I should to-morrow morning apply at some insane asylum as unfit to go alone. Who make this precious group of

to whom God has made especial revelation in our time of that which He tried to make known thousands of years ago and failed to make intelligible? Are they so distinguished for unworldliness, piety, and scholarship that it is to be expected that they would have been chosen to fix up the defective work of Moses and Isaiah and Paul and Christ? Is it at all possible? I wonder on what mountain these modern exegetes were transfigured! I wonder what star pointed down to their birthplace! Was it the North star, or the evening star, or the Dipper? As they came through and descended to our world did Mars blush or Saturn lose one of its rings? When I find these modern wiseacres attempting to improve upon the work of the Almighty, and to interlard it with their wisdom, and to suggest prophetic and apostolic errata, I am filled with a disgust insufferable. Advanced thought, which proposes to tell the Lord what He ought to have said thousands of years ago, and would have said if He had been as wise as His nineteenth century critics! All this comes of living away back in the eternities instead of 1888. I have two wonders in regard to these men. The first one is, how the Lord got along without them before they were born. The second wonder is how the Lord will get along without them after they are dead.

"But," say some, "do you really think the Scriptures are Inspired Throughout?"

Yes, either as history or as guidance. Gibbon and Josephus and Prescott record in their histories a great many things they did not approve of. When George Bancroft puts upon his brilliant historical page the account of an Indian massacre, does he approve of that massacre? There are scores of thing in the Bible which neither God nor inspired men sanctioned. Either as history or as guidance the entire Bible was inspired of God. "But," says some one, "don't you think that the copyists might have made mistakes in transferring the divine words from one manuscript to another? Yes, no doubt there were such mistakes; but they no more affect the meaning of the Scriptures than the misspelling of a word or the ungrammatical structure of a sentence in a last will and testament affect the validity or the meaning of that will. All the

in the Scriptures, do not amount to any more importance than the difference between your spelling in a document the word forty, fourty for forty. This book is the last will and testament of God to our lost world, and it bequeaths everything in the right way, although human hands may have damaged the grammar or made unjustifiable interpolation.

These men who pride themselves in our day on being advanced thinkers in Biblical interpretation, will all of them end in atheism, if they live long enough, and I declare here, to-day, they are doing more in the different denominations of Christians, and throughout the world, for damaging Christianity and hindering the cause of the world's betterment, than five thousand Robert Ingersolls could do. That man who stands inside a castle is far more dangerous, if he be an enemy, than five thousand enemies outside the castle. Robert G. Ingersoll assails the castle from the outside. These men who pretend to be advanced thinkers in all the denominations, are fighting the truth from the inside, and trying to shove back the bolts and swing open the gates.

Now, I am in favor of the greatest and discussion. I would have as much liberty for heterodoxy as for orthodoxy. If I should change my theories of religion I should preach them out and out, but not in the building where I am accustomed to preach, for that was erected by people who believe in an entire Bible, and it would be dishonest for me to promulgate sentiments different from those for which that building was put up. When we enter any denomination as ministers of religion, we take a solemn vow that we will preach the sentiments of that denomination. If we change our theories, as we have a right to change them, then there is a world several thousand miles in circumference, and there are hundreds of halls and hundreds of academies of music where we can ventilate our sentiments.

I remember that in all our cities, in time of political agitation, there are the Republican headquarters and the Democratic headquarters. Suppose I should go into one of these headquarters, pretending to be in sympathy with their work, at the same time electioneering for the opposite party! I would soon find that the centrifugal force was greater than the centripetal. Now, if a man enters a denomination of Christians, taking a solemn oath, as we all do, that we will promulgate the theories of that denomination, and then the man shall proclaim some other theory, he has broken his oath, and is an out-and-out perjurer. Nevertheless, I declare for largest liberty in religious discussion. I would no more have the attempt to rear a monument to Thomas Paine interfered with than I would have interfered with the lifting of the splendid monument to Washington. Largest liberty for the body, largest liberty for the mind, largest liberty for the soul!

Now, I want to show you, as a matter of advocacy for what I believe to be right, the splendors of orthodoxy. Many have supposed that its disciples are people of flat skulls, and no reading, and behind the age, and the victims of gullibility. I shall show you that the word orthodoxy stands for the greatest splendors outside of heaven.

Behold the Splendors of its achievements. All the missionaries of the Gospel the world round are the men who believe in an entire Bible. Call the roll of all the missionaries who are to-day enduring sacrifices in the ends of the earth for the cause of religion and the world's betterment, and they all believe in an entire Bible. Just as soon as a missionary begins to doubt whether there ever was a Garden of Eden, or whether there is any such thing as future punishment, he comes right home from Beyrout or Madras, and goes into the insurance business! All the missionary societies this day are officered by orthodox men, and are supported by orthodox churches.

Orthodoxy, beginning with the Sandwich Islands, has captured vast regions of barbarism for civilization, while heterodoxy has to capture the first square inch. Blatant for many years in Great Britain and the United States, and strutting about with a peacockian braggadocio, it has yet to capture the first continent, the first State, the first township, the first ward, the first space of ground as big as you could cover with the small end of a sharp pin. Ninety-nine out of every hundred of the Protestant churches of America were built by people who believed in an entire Bible. The pulpit now may preach some other gospel, but it is a heterodox gun on an orthodox carriage.

The Foundation of all the Churches that are of very great use in this world to-day were laid by men who believed the Bible from lid to lid, and if I cannot take it in that way I will not take it at all; just as if I received a letter that pretended to come from a friend, and part of it was his and part somebody else's, and the other part somebody else's, and it was a sort of literary mongrelism, I would throw the garbled sheets into the waste basket. No church of very great influence to-day but was built by those who believed in an entire Bible. Neither will a church last long built on a part of the Bible. You have noticed, I suppose, that as soon as a man begins to give up the Bible he is apt to preach in some hall, and he has an audience while he lives, and when he dies the church dies. If I thought that my church in Brooklyn was built on a quarter of a Bible, or a half a Bible, or three-quarters of a Bible, or ninety-nine one-hundredths of a Bible, I would expect it to die when I die; but when I know it is of God, I know it will last two hundred years after you and I sleep the last sleep. Oh, the splendors of an orthodoxy, which with ten thousand hands and ten thousand pulpits and ten thousand Christian churches, is trying to save the world! In Music Hall, Boston, for many years stood Theodore Parker, battling orthodoxy, giving it, as some supposed at that time, its death wound. He was the most fascinating man I ever heard, or ever expect to hear, and I came out from hearing him thinking, in my boyhood way, "Well, that's the death of the Church." On that same street, and not far from being opposite, stood Park Congregational Church, called by its enemies, "Hell-fire Corner." Theodore Parker died, and his church died with him; or, if it is in existence, it is so small you cannot see it with the naked eye. Park Congregational Church still stands on

"Hell-fire Corner," thundering away the magnificent truths of this glorious orthodoxy just as though Theodore Parker had never lived. All that Boston or Brooklyn or New York or the world ever got that is worth having came through the wide aqueduct of orthodoxy from the throne of God.

Behold the splendors of character built up by orthodoxy! Who had the greatest intellect the world ever knew? Paul. In physical stature, insignificant; in mind, head, and shoulders, above all the giants of the age.

Orthodox from Scalp to Heel.

Who was the greatest poet the ages ever saw; acknowledged to be so both by infidels and Christians? John Milton—seeing more without eyes than anybody else ever saw with eyes. Orthodox from scalp to heel. Who was the greatest reformer the world has ever seen; so acknowledged by infidels as well as Christians? Martin Luther. Orthodox from scalp to heel.

Then look at the certitudes. Oh, man! believing in an entire Bible, where did you come from? Answer: I descended from a perfect parentage in Paradise, and Jehovah breathed into my nostrils the breath of life. I am a son of God!" Oh, man! believing in a half-and-half Bible, believing the Bible in spots, where did you come from? Answer: "It is all uncertain; in my ancestral line, away back, there was an orang-outang, and a tadpole, and a polywog, and it took millions of years to get me evoluted." Oh, man! believing in a Bible in spots, when you quit this world? Answer: "Going into a great to be, so on into the great somewhere, and then I shall pass through on to the great anywhere, and I shall probably arrive in the nowhere." That is where I thought you would fetch up. Oh, man! believing in an entire Bible, and believing with all your heart, where are you going to when you leave this world? Answer: "I am going to my Father's house; I am going into the companionship of my loved ones who have gone before; I am going to leave all my sins, and I am going to be with God, and like God forever and forever." Oh, the glorious certitudes of orthodoxy!

Where are You Going To,

Behold the splendors of orthodoxy in its announcement of two destinies—palace and penitentiary. Palace, with gates on all sides, through which all may enter and live on celestial luxuries world without end, and all for the knocking and the asking. A palace grander than if all the Alhambras, and the Versailles, and the Windsor Castles, and the Winter Gardens, and the imperial abodes of all the earth were heaved up into one architectural glory. At the other end of the universe, a penitentiary, where men who want their sins can have them. Would it be fair that you and I should have our choice of Christ and the palace, and other men be denied their choice of sin and eternal degradation?

Palace and Penitentiary!

The first of no use unless you have the last. Brooklyn and New York would be better places to live in, with Raymond Street Jail, and the Tombs, and Sing Sing, and all the small-pox hospitals emptied on them, than heaven would be if there were no hell. Palace and penitentiary! If I see a man with a full bowl of sin, and he thirsts for it, and his whole nature craves it, and he takes hold with both hands and presses that bowl to his lips, and then presses it hard between his teeth, and the draught begins to pour its sweetness down his throat, shall we snatch away the bowl, and jerk the man up to the gate of heaven, and push him in if he does not want to go, and sit down and sing psalms forever? No! God has made you and me so completely free that we need not go to heaven unless we prefer it. Not more free to soar than free to sink.

Nearly all the heterodox people I know believe all are coming out at the same destiny; without regard to faith or character we are all coming out at the shining gate. There they are, all in glory together. Thomas Paine and George Whitefield, Jezebel and Mary Lyon, Nero and Charles Wesley, Charles Guiteau and James A. Garfield, John Wilkes Booth and Abraham Lincoln—all in glory together! All the innocent men, women, and children who were massacred, side by side with their murderers! If we are all coming out at the same destiny, without regard to character, then it is true. I turn away from such a debauched heaven. Against that cauldron of piety and blasphemy, philanthropy and assassination, self-sacrifice and beastliness, I place the two destinies of the Bible forever, and forever, and forever apart.

Behold also the splendors of the Christian orthodox death-beds. Those who deny the Bible, or deny any part of it, never die well. They either go out in darkness or they go out in silence portentous. You may gather up all the biographies that have come forth since the art of printing was invented, and I challenge you to show me a triumphant death of a man who rejected the Scriptures, or rejected any part of them. Here I make

A Great Wide Avenue.

On the one I put the death-beds of those who believed in an entire Bible. On the other side of that avenue I put the death-beds of those who rejected part of the Bible, or rejected all of the Bible. Now, take my arm and let us pass through this dividing avenue. Look off upon the right side. Here are the death-beds on the right side of this avenue. "Victory through our Lord Jesus Christ!" "Free grace!" "Glory, glory!" "I am sweeping through the gates washed in the blood of the Lamb!" "The chariots are coming!" "I mount, I fly!" "Wings, wings!" "They are coming for me!" "Peace, be still!" Alfred Cookman's death-bed, Richard Cecil's death-bed, Commodore Foote's death-bed. Your father's death-bed, your mother's death-bed, your sister's death-bed, your child's death-bed. Ten thousand radiant death-beds of those who believed an entire Bible.

Now, take my arm and let us go through that avenue, and look off upon the other side. No smile of hope! No shout of triumph! No face supernaturally illumined! Those who reject any part of the Bible never die well. No beckoning for angels to come. No listening for the celestial escort. Without any exception they go out of the world because they are pushed out; while on the other hand the list of those who believed in an entire Bible, and have gone out of the world in triumph, is a list so long it seems interminable. Oh, is not that a splendid influence, this orthodoxy, which makes that which must otherwise be the most dreadful hour of life—the last hour—positively paradisaical?

Young men, old men, middle-aged men,

Take Sides in this Contest between orthodoxy and heterodoxy. "Ask for the old paths, walk therein, and ye shall find rest for your souls." But you follow this crusade against any part of the Bible—first of all you will give up Genesis, which is as true as Matthew; then you will give up all the historical parts of the Bible; then after a while you will give up the miracles; then you will find it convenient to give up the Ten Commandments; and then you will wake up in a fountainless, rockless, treeless desert swept of everlasting sirocco. If you are laughed at you can afford to be laughed at for standing by the Bible just as God has given it to you and miraculously preserved it.

Do not jump overboard from the stanch old Great Eastern of old-fashioned orthodoxy until there is something ready to take you up stronger than the fantastic yawl which has painted on the side Advanced Thought, and which leaks at the prow, and leaks at the stern, and has a steel pen for one oar, and a glib tongue for the other oar, and now tips over this way and then tips over that way, until you do not know whether the passengers will land in the breakers of despair, or on the sinking sand of infidelity.

I am in full sympathy with the advancements of our time, but this world will never advance a single inch beyond this old Bible. God was just as capable of dictating the truth to the prophets and apostles as He is capable of dictating the truth to these modern apostles and prophets. God has not learned anything in a thousand years. He knew just as much when as He does now, giving the last dictation, if He is giving any dictation at all. So I will stick to the old paths. Naturally a sceptic, and preferring new things to old, I never so much as today felt the truth of the entire Bible, especially as I see into what spectacular imbecility men rush when they try to chop up the Scriptures with the meat-axe of their own preferences, now calling upon philosophy, now calling on the Church, now calling on God, now calling on the devil. I prefer the thick, warm robe of the old religion—old as God—the robe which has kept so many warm amid the cold pilgrimage of this life, and amid the chills of death. The old robe rather than the thin, uncertain gauze offered us by these wiseacres who believe the Bible in spots.

On July 27, 1814, at seventy-two years of age, expired Isabella Graham. She was the most useful woman of her day amid the poor and sick, at the head of the orphan asylums, and Magdalen asylums, and an angel of mercy in hospital and reformatory. Dr. Mason, one of the mightiest men of his day, said at her funeral that she was mentally and spiritually the most wonderfully endowed person he had ever met. She was an impersonation of the most orthodox orthodoxy. As a sublime peroration to my sermon, I give and testament, showing how one who believes in an entire Bible may make a glorious exit. "My children and my grandchildren I leave to my covenant God, the God who hath fed me all my life with the bread that perisheth, and the bread that never perisheth, who has been a Father to my fatherless children, and a husband to their widowed mother thus far. And now receiving my Redeemer's testimony, I set to my seal that God is true; and believing the record of John that God hath given to me eternal life. I also believe that He will perfect what concerns me, support and carry me safely through death, and present me to His Father, complete in His own righteousness, without spot or wrinkle. Into the hands of this redeeming God, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost I commit my redeemed spirit.—Isabella Graham."

Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like hers. "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost; as it was in the beginning, is now and ever shall be, world without end. Amen and Amen!"

A CONSECRATED SON.

"Is it not a great trial to you to part with your eldest son?" said a missionary secretary to gentleman who had come to London to take leave of his son, who was to embark the next day for a foreign land. "Yes," was the answer, "it is a great trial, but I have been expecting it for a long time. The day my son was born," he continued, "I attended a missionary meeting, and was greatly impressed with what I heard. When I went home I took the baby out of the bed, and holding it in my arms, I said to my wife, Will you give this boy to the missions?' 'Yes,' she replied, 'I will.' From that time I have been expecting he would go, though he never knew the circumstances till he offered himself for a missionary."

A DUMB MAN'S TESTIMONY.

A most remarkable incident is reported in the Indian Witness. It states that among the converts at a mission station was a man curiously afflicted. He could hear and read, but could not speak. His intelligence, however, could not be doubted. In the course of time this poor man was proposed for baptism. The pastor and brethren hesitated, feeling that it was impossible to gain from his speechless mouth any adequate proof that he had the knowledge requisite for church membership, or that he was not acting with duplicity. He was brought before the church, however, and the minister asked him this question: "What is the ground of your belief that there is salvation for you in Jesus Christ?" The others looked at one another in dismay; this question seemed impossible of answer from a dumb man. But he, on hearing it, instantly arose and proceeded to answer by significant signs. First, he put his hands upon his breast with an expression of loathing, to indicate his own sense of sin; then he stepped forward and looked down, as if beholding a deep and awful pit, from which again he shrank back with a look of terror; but presently drawing near again, he looked and seemed to see something just beyond; then he made the sign of the cross! Jesus was there! And now again he looked into the pit and smiled, as that he saw his own sins cast in there! At last he looked up and pointed to heaven with a smile of ecstasy. Jesus had died for his sins, and was risen forever to make intercession for him!

AN INVITATION FROM PERSECUTORS.

A trip to Ordoo, on the Black Sea, was recently taken by Dr. Constantine, who has charge of the American Board's mission at Smyrna. In a letter to the Missionary Herald, describing his tour, he says: "The church and school committee of the district of Saint Nicholas sent me a written invitation, asking that I should preach in their schoolhouse. Yet these men were the leaders, awhile ago, in stoning one of the brethren, determined to drive him away from the place. The next day, Saturday, the whole committee appeared, and it was decided that a preaching service should be held every evening in the week, while the day should be free for visitors and inquirers. During the thirteen days spent there, I had eighteen services, and addressed one meeting for women, besides paying visits and meeting inquirers. On one occasion I had as many as thirty or forty inquirers in my room. The interest was marked from the outset; people came in great crowds, and from great distances; the women were largely represented, and the attention was intense. We had gatherings of from two to five hundred people, and once had from one hundred and fifty to two hundred women present. Wherever there was a group in the market, the services were the topic of conversation."

MR. AITKEN AMONG THE SANTHALS.

A recent letter from Mr. B. Aitken who is preaching the gospel in India, at his own charges, describes a visit he recently paid to Santhalistan, where it appears that other mission work beside that of Mr. Haegert is being done and that is being blest with success. Mr. Aitken accompanied one of the native preachers in his journey through the villages, and saw the character of the work. He says: "I spent a day with him at his own station, and afterward went preaching with him and two catechists or elders, to five villages. He was a humble man, ignorant of English, with bare feet, and very simply dressed, but a grand evangelist. On a terribly hot day we walked from 8 o'clock in the morning till 1 in the afternoon, and I could not but admire the steadfast purpose with which he pursued his preaching. We would enter a village, when the pastor would ask for seats, and several charpais would be brought out of the huts, and placed in the shade of a tree. When we were seated, the pastor would deliberately undo his hymn-book from his kummerbund and begin to sing. This brought a crowd of men, women, and children, and dogs around us, and then the preaching was done—earnest, faithful pleading, carried on in the spirit of our Lord, whether the people mocked, objected, or approved. Although the day was awfully hot, and more trudging through fields and lanes remained to be done, the pastor showed no disposition to scamp his work, but patiently spoke on till scoffers were quieted and the serious were satisfied."

A SIGN-BOARD DESTROYED.

In a letter from Yokohama, Japan, to the Missionary Link, Mrs. Pierson relates how the establishment of a mission led to a nefarious business being abandoned. She says that, having recently opened a school in an immoral locality, one of the "singing girls" applied for admission, and as her character was not then known she was admitted. Subsequently the managers learned what she was and for the sake of the other girls attending the school, it was necessary to exclude her. Mrs. Pierson, however, was much drawn to her and visited her in her home. She says: I found the family to consist of father, mother and grandmother, all of whom the poor girl undoubtedly supports. They did not seem to care to hear the message of our King, proclaiming pardon to the penitent through faith in His precious blood; but whether they would or not, we delivered it, and rented a room in the neighborhood for one evening in the week, where we are holding meetings. The man in whose house they are held is a stranger to us, and we know little of his past or present circumstances. We learned recently that he was engaged in a nefarious business. I was led to speak most plainly and unreservedly of the great sin and terrible penalty of unhallowed traffic in immortal souls. The man was converted, destroyed his sign-board, which I had not seen, as it was always taken down the evening we are there, and gave up his business. We are praying that some other means of support for his wife and children may be opened to him.

AN OPERATION AVERTED.

The remarkable healing of a tumor, in answer to prayer, when eminent physicians and specialists pronounced it incurable by any other means than a dangerous operation, is described in this month's number of Thy Healer.* It appears that a Mrs. Houldey, of Gloucester, England, was afflicted with an abdominal tumor, which became so critical that she was taken to the City Infirmary for treatment. She was there for over two months without relief, and was then advised to go to an institution in Birmingham to have a noted specialist remove the tumor by the knife. The poor woman was at that time so weak that she could not stand, and had to be lifted in and out of bed by two nurses. She naturally shrank from the operation, and wrote to Bethshan. The following is her own account of what followed: "As I did not feel led to go through the operation, I made it a matter of prayer, and asked the Lord what I was to do, and I wrote to Bethshan three weeks ago. On the following Thursday I was examined by another surgeon, and he said that the sooner I was under the surgeon's hand the better, as the tumor was very much larger. I asked the doctor to allow me to go home for a few days, and I was permitted to go for a fortnight, but they would much rather I stayed in. I had mentioned to nurse that I was going to trust God to heal me, but they seemed to think it would be a thing impossible. Praise God; nothing is impossible to him that believeth. I must now add that, after I came home—from the Thursday till the Sunday night—I was in dreadful pain. I even went so far as to get the young woman that is with me to get up at twelve o'clock on the Sunday night to get some hot salt to see if I could get easier; but just as she was about to get it I got easier, and said: 'Never mind, now, the pain is better,' and from that time I have had no pain to speak of, and from last Wednesday I have felt quite healed. I was anointed for healing on the Thursday. On the Saturday I got up, and on the Sunday I came down, and have been down ever since, and have helped in the household duties, and in washing and nursing baby. I could not do anything before—not even lift the baby, but now, praise God, I am healed and in better health than I have been for eight years. Praise God, I can say I am perfectly whole."

THE LIMIT TO A SHEIKH'S POWER.

In a report from the American Board's Mission in Syria a case of persecution is reported with a significant comment. Some time ago three Moslem men asked permission to attend the evening services at one of the mission stations. They had become interested in Christianity by means of a Bible possessed by one of their number. They were cordially invited to attend all the meetings. They came regularly for three months. They appeared very attentive, and made occasional visits to the missionaries to talk about religion, and to ask for explanation of Bible texts. When they ceased coming, a native teache met one of them, and asked him why he and his friends did not come to the meetings any more. He replied that they had been summoned before their sheikh, and imprisoned for two weeks. Then they were required to give bonds for a large sum that they would never attend the meetings, never visit the missionaries at their homes, never talk on the Protestant religion with any one. This they promised faithfully to do. They were told to go and sin no more. "And remember," said the sheikh, "if you violate this agreement, I will collect these bonds, and you will be imprisoned for life." The men added, "They can prevent us from attending your meetings, and from talking with you on religion, but they cannot stop us from thinking."

AN OFFENDING LAMP.

Two missionaries in Mexico have been called to account in court for an illumination, with the result that the curiosity of the people has been excited, and larger audiences secured. The story is told in the course of Mr. Wright's report to the Missionary Herald. He says: "One day Mr. Case and I made an illumination, a simple frame covered with cloth, on which was printed an announcement of the services, and, with a candle placed inside, this was hung over the door. The words were 'Evangelical Service' on one side, and 'Entrance Free' on the other. It attracted a great deal of attention, and within half an hour a policeman came with an order that it be removed. Our audience had already been attracted, so we complied with good grace. Later we were both summoned to appear before the mayor of the place. We went, glad of the opportunity to talk of our work. He expressed surprise that we had dared to put up such a notice without first asking his permission. We begged his pardon, explaining that we had done the same thing both in Parral and Chihuahua without thought of previous notice. He explained that he feared it would excite opposition, perhaps a mob, which with his small police force he would be unable to quell.

Mr. Case embraced the opportunity, as did Peter before the council, to preach a good gospel sermon to the mayor, explaining the object of our meetings. I asked him in what consisted the offence. He said that it was in the letters or words on the sign. I asked if there would be any objection to placing over the door such a light without the words, to light up the entrance. He replied that there would be none whatever. With that we were quite content, although we well knew that there was no law against the full notice. But we expressed ourselves as much pleased with this result, and thanked him for this permission, and were dismissed. We took the offending letters off, put on new cloth, put up the light the next night, and it now attracts a great deal more attention than before. People ask what those words were and why they were taken away. Sunday evening at the communion service there were over one hundred present, in the room and at the door, and all were as attentive and quiet as can be imagined."

PALESTINE AND THE JEWS.

By Rev. Joseph Wild, D. D., of Toronto.

Palestine, its Glories and Advantages—An Emigration Fever—How the Jew Himself Regards the Question—The Custom at the Close of the Feast of the Passover—Jewish History, a Proof of the Existence of Providence—Rest at Last.

A STRIKING passage in reference to the Jews occurs in Isaiah 10 : 23 : "For the Lord of hosts shall make a consumption even determined in the midst of all the land." By the phrase, "in the midst of all the land," we understand all the world in general. At the appointed time, which will be, I presume, in a few years, a fine fever with respect to the return of certain people to Palestine, will possess all men—a fever that will spread itself out in all parts of the world. It is determined upon already in the counsel of the Divine mind. A perfect mania will possess the nations, and the general topic of conversation in a very few years from to-day will be Palestine and its Advantages.

This emigration fever will rage most violently among the Jews; then it will take hold of other races and nations; for the prophet Isaiah assures us that God will gather others to Him besides the literal seed of Judah and of Israel. The exertions of the Church, the forces of the nations, are hastening on the preparatory conditions of this great consumption. Very soon Jerusalem will become pre-eminent. Salem will stand once more, lifting her head from the dust, and standing with majesty among the nations of the earth, she will again be the glory of all lands. Many men are ready to ask how this consumption will be brought about, and because they are not now interested in any great degree, they rather doubt the matter. Neither their doubts, nor anything, any difficulties that they can see in their mind just now, will stand in the way of Him who reigns in the heavens, who will, in His own good time, bring His own purposes to pass.

It is often very difficult beforehand to say by what means God is going to produce certain things, what means He will adopt to bring about certain events. The great point for us all to settle is, Is this thing to take place? The signs of the times seem, I think, in some degree, to forecast this great event. Think of the beautiful imagery of the Saviour, "Ye see the fig-tree putting forth its leaves, and ye know that summer is nigh." So, also, when certain things are fulfilled, do we know that other things must come to pass. The signs of the times indicate very clearly that the period of this consumption is Not Very Far Distant.

The method and enthusiasm attending upon such a work we may form an idea of by looking in our own times, and, in times past, at similar movements. Twenty years ago no man could have predicted the enthusiasm that rages through Canada touching Manitoba. There was not a man who had prescience enough to see that that part of the Dominion would take possession of homes, of hearts, of minds, of interests, from one end of the Dominion to the other. The land was thought to be barren, the climate uncongenial, and no one would suppose that he could leave the fair fields and the lakes of the province of Ontario and go to that far-off land. But we see how soon a rage is created, how soon a consumption can be started. Now this is an evidence of what can be done if men can only get up an excitement or fever upon any point. You crowd out reason, and men become subject to the law of impulse, and follow out the line of that interest.

You may ask, Do the Jews take any knowledge of this? The Jews throughout the world are getting keenly alive to this question; their papers are now discussing it, and a great change is taking place in the Jewish mind on these points. The London Standard remarks, "It is interesting to notice the way in which the Jews, scattered throughout the world, are beginning to turn their eyes toward their own land. Palestine is not altogether a place to please a capitalist, but yet even such keen financiers as the Jews are busy buying it up. The Jewish Chronicle reckons now some 18,000 Jewish brethren in Jerusalem alone. It is said they are not a desirable population to maintain, yet $300,000, is sent to help these people maintain themselves.

The Occupation of Palestine

by a people who have retained an indestructibility as a race, while they have learned a complete cosmopolitan character during these eighteen centuries—a nation at once European in education and Asiatic origin—would be by no means a bad arrangement. It might not be impolitic on the part of the European Powers to assist in placing so influential a people in so important a position, and would solve what, before many years, will be the vexed question among the nations—namely, the territory of Syria." Now, you might ask one of the Jewish brotherhood in Toronto here, and probably he would not know as much about it as I do, because he is not as much interested in the prophecies as I am. He is interested in doing business; he knows his own line of thought remarkably well, but he does not know the line of thought that runs in this direction. A man's eye is keen in the direction his interest lies.

Some time ago the Hebrew Observer had an article, which asked: "Is there no other destiny for Palestine but to remain a desert? Syria will soon be the entrepot between the East and the West, and the old trade will revive. Old cities will revive, and new ones will be built; the old time will come back, and the steam-car will run in the track of the caravan. Syria will be a place of trade; but the people who are pre-eminently the traders of the world, will they be there when the coming change takes place? The country wants capital and population. The Jew can give it both."

Do you know what the Jews do now at the close of the Feast of the Passover, and have done for the last 1800 years? At the close of that solemn day's services they take each other by the hand and say, "Good-by; next year." They did so here in Toronto last year, and will do so again next year. They will as surely meet in Jerusalem some year as they have carried out the idea. They say, "Good-by; we meet in Jerusalem next year;" and they will say it until they do. Ah, brethren of Judah, some of your children, I believe, will live to realize this long-expected blessing. The outlines of history are fast filling in, and you will ere long be placed in your own land, with the accumulated experience of centuries to guide you to duty and labor.

How Will This Be Brought About?

It will be brought about, as was the great deliverance in the land of Egypt; it will be brought about by God's own purpose. "For thus saith the Lord, It shall come to pass that they shall say no more, the Lord God which brought us up out of the land of Egypt, but, The Lord God liveth which brought us from all countries whithersoever He had scattered us, and placed us in our own land"—that is, they will forget about the deliverance from Egypt, and say, "The Lord God which brought us from all countries," etc. And the latter will be as true as the first; and when will it be? God has determined this great consummation, and it must take place. Are the Jews to be always outcasts, wandering over the earth? And yet all their sufferings may be traced to this—they prayed the prayer, "His blood be upon us and upon our children." Oh, that they had a clasp on their mouths when they asked that for their children! But it has been upon them, has it not? If you, free-thinker, if you, man that disbelieves the Bible, if you want a proof of an answered prayer, the bloody lines and tracks down the centuries tell you that one prayer, at least in God's Word has been terribly answered.

What is it God said? That they should be wanderers, without national life, without government or king, until He should return them to their own land. And this has been true for 1800 years anyway. Has not it? Do you not see that what He has been telling you about them is true? And He says there is to be a great consumption in the land. That is true also. There is to be a great consumption, in the providence of God, and they are to be gathered together. They will be persecuted, until they say in their sorrow:

"Let Us Go into Our Own Land."

We shall be glad to see them go, my brethren, to that land which is theirs of right. We may argue as we will, but I am myself under the impression that the time is now near for the call to go forth, as the cry is said to have run like an electric shock through the French when Bonaparte gave out his first proclamation: "Frenchmen, come home!" And so God will cause those wandering ones to come home, and they will hear the call and return in peace to their ancient land.

THE FOUR EPOCHS.

DIAGRAM OF CONJECTURAL LENGTH of each of the Four Epochs or Intervals which have yet to elapse during the ensuing Six Years between the present month of June, 1888, and April 21, 1894.

FIRST EPOCH of Continuance of the existing general European Peace onward from the present month of June, 1888.	Certainly no longer than two years until about the middle of 1890, but more likely to be not longer than one year, until near the middle of 1889. We may be thankful if even the rest of 1888 passes without a European war.
SECOND EPOCH of the Greatest European War ever known, which will end with changing the existing 23 kingdoms of Cæsar's Roman Empire into 10 Confederated Kingdoms ruled by ten Kings as foretold in Daniel 7, 24; 2, 41.	Most likely not shorter than eighteen months, nor longer than three years, and beginning in 1889 more probably than in 1890, and ending in 1891, or less probably in 1892.
THIRD EPOCH of ensuing interval of peace from the Confederacy of the Ten Kings until the rise of Napoleon as an Eleventh Little Horn or King in or near Macedonia.	This interval may be expected to be scarcely less than several months, not longer than about a year, and probably in 1891 or 1892.
FOURTH EPOCH of Napoleon's earlier career, from his first rise as a Little Hellenic King, and his "waxing great toward the South and the East and Pleasant Land," until he becomes King of Syria and makes a seven years' covenant with the Jews on Passover Day, April 21, 1894.	Napoleon's initial exploits included in this Epoch would seem to occupy at least eighteen months, and, therefore, as they culminate in April 21, 1894, to commence not later than the latter part of 1892, but they might occupy as long a time as two or two and a-half years, and therefore begin toward the close of 1891, or the early part of 1892.

We pass out of the present "unchronological" interval into the "chronological" interval of the first seven years upon April 21, 1894—after which the sacrifices are renewed on November 8, 1894, and the Resurrection and the Translation of the 144,000 watchful living Christians is on March 5, 1896, and Antichrist's 1,260 days begin on August 15, 1897, and the end of this age is on April 11, 1901.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Sudden Death of General Philip Sheridan on Sunday night, took the country by surprise. The reports of his condition, especially those since his removal to Nonquitt, Mass., encouraged the hope that the General was on his way to recovery The nature of his disease, however, must have led his physicians to expect that the end would be sudden, though it might be delayed for some months, or even years. No alarming symptoms appear to have been observed on the day of his death. About nine o'clock in the evening the General's brother, Colonel Sheridan, bade him good-night, and went to his hotel. Half an hour later the dreaded signs of heart failure manifested themselves, and the physicians who were with the patient administered the remedies which had relieved him in previous attacks. But this time they failed. The illustrious soldier sank into unconsciousness, and at twenty minutes past ten he died. He was fifty-seven years of age.

The Effort to Defeat the Organization of trusts by legislation appears likely to be defeated. The House Committee appointed to deal with the subject has submitted a partial report, not having had sufficient time to thoroughly investigate the system of operations. The committee, however, has discovered that the legislation proposed will not touch the trusts under their present system. All such legislation is directed against combinations to fix the price or regulate the production of articles of merchandise or commerce; whereas the trustees do not fix prices or regulate production, and the several corporations absorbed are not in combination with each other. The effect of the trusts, however, is evidently to curtail production and so to raise prices, though the trustees have craftily avoided the appearance of regulating either. The companies agrees with each other as to production, and all the trustees do, is to receive and distribute dividends on the stock surrendered. It will, therefore, be necessary to revise the bills submitted, so as to meet these subtle tactics.

The Committee on Pauper Immigration, now pursuing its inquiries in New York, made a discovery last week which shows that it is not from Italy only that undesirable immigrants come. A witness informed the committee that there was a society at Munich, Germany, that bent its energies to sending discharged convicts to this country. This society had branches in different parts of Germany. The reports of the society for the years 1883 and 1884 were among the records of the State Department. They showed that in 1883 the society had assisted twenty-seven discharged criminals to emigrate to the United States. In the following year the society and its branches had assisted thirty discharged criminals to come here. Criminals had been sent back from this country, and had been returned by way of England. This society assisted none but discharged criminals to emigrate, and those it assisted were generally of the most vicious kind. Every emigrant of this sort landed in America with $25 in his pocket. A general feeling is now growing that the time has arrived for restricting immigration from all countries, and especially that funds must be provided for maintaining a vigilant watch at European ports against the export of criminals.

The System of Private Letter-Boxes which has long been an aid to fraud and immorality, has at length been denounced in Congress. The Committee on Post Offices last week favorably reported a bill for the suppression of the evil. In New York and other large cities small stores have been doing a considerable business by the rental of these private letter-boxes. Persons carrying on a clandestine correspondence, and others engaged in fraudulent advertising are able to hire a box in a store for fifty cents a month. Their mail is deposited there instead of being taken to their residences by the carrier or placed in the family box at the Post Office. A great deal of swindling has been carried on through this medium, and many homes have been wrecked by the facilities afforded by private letter-boxes. It may be hoped that Congress will find time to pass the bill now reported, which prohibits the delivery of mail matter outside the usual Post Office channels.

The Famous Struggle between a Plain Farmer and a great corporation which has attracted public attention throughout the country, has passed the ordeal of the Interior Department with gratifying results. Guilford Miller is to keep the farm which the Northern Pacific Railroad Company endeavored to wrest from him, so far as the Department has the power to confirm his title. Secretary Vilas issued his decision on Thursday last. He holds that Miller's quarter section was not included in the lands withdrawn from settlement, on account of the first provisional location of the route of the road, which was the only one allowed by law. It was, however, within the limits from which the company could choose its indemnity lands, but the final location of the road left the section open for settlement when Miller took possession in 1878. Finally, assuming the company's contention as to the lands withdrawn from settlement to be correct, it is held that it had no right to include this land in its selections for indemnity for lands lost within the granted limits. If this decision is sustained, the country may congratulate itself that for once a greedy monopoly has been foiled. It is stated that over two thousand homesteads depended on this decision.

The Sioux Indians Appear Unalterably Opposed to the treaty submitted to them by the United States Government. At the conference on Thursday last, at Standing Rock Agency, the speeches of the chiefs clearly showed that no progress had been made by the Commissioners in removing the objections of the tribe. The Commissioners, however, profess to feel hopeful of success. The object of the treaty is to acquire, by the payment of one million dollars, eleven million acres of the twenty-five million assigned to the tribe in Dakota. The lands are to be sold to actual settlers at fifty cents an acre, and the proceeds invested for the benefit of the Sioux. The tribe is to give up its hunting habits and to settle on farms to be selected individually. The objections of the Indians are, first, that they do not want to sign any treaty, because the Government has never kept faith with them, but has always cheated and defrauded them; second, they do not wish to part with their lands; and third, that if they did, the compensation offered is ridiculously inadequate. The only consideration that appears to weigh with them is that the whites are resolved on having the lands anyway, and it may be better to accept the million dollars than to fight and be compelled to surrender the lands without any compensation.

Another Change in the Rule of Bulgaria appears to be imminent. Prince Ferdinand, it is stated by well-informed press correspondents, is to be removed from the throne by diplomatic means. The Emperor of Germany and the Czar of Russia agreed upon that step at their recent interview. The Emperor of Germany adheres to the policy of Prince Bismarck, which is opposed to interference in Bulgarian affairs, but being desirous of removing the Balkan question from European disquieting elements, he has promised to support Russia in demanding Ferdinand's deposition. That Austria will take up arms in defence of her protégé, is deemed improbable and, therefore, Ferdinand's expulsion is regarded as settled. Various petty princes are mentioned as his probable successors. Among them the Duke of Cumberland, whose claims on Hanover Germany might thus liquidate. Prince Waldemar, a son of the King of Denmark, is also mentioned. He is a brother of the King of Greece, and a brother-in-law of the Czar and of the Prince of Wales.

Alarming Rumors Respecting Mr. H. M. Stanley continue to be received. But little credence is given to them, though it is an ominous fact that, though they differ in detail, their general tenor is alike gloomy. They all represent him as deserted by the bulk of his followers, and in imminent danger of massacre. A despatch from Zanzibar, dated August 1, said that reports which had filtered from tribe to tribe were in circulation there that Stanley was denuded of men and supplies, and hemmed in between the Naboda country and the Albert Nyanza. Other reports were to the effect that Stanley, after several conflicts with the Matongora and Mino tribes, had been compelled to divert his course in an unknown direction. Deserters from Tippu Tib's caravan testify to his willingness to assist Major Barttelot, but they say that, owing to the rumors regarding Stanley's fate, he had the greatest difficulty in obtaining men willing to penetrate into the interior. A letter has also been received from Mr. Jamison, the naturalist, from Kasongo, on the Congo River, stating that he is making preparations to leave with Major Barttelot, Tippu Tib, and 900 men, to search for Henry M. Stanley. He says all the Europeans in the expedition are well. That information implies that Tippoo Tib is re-establishing his supremacy over the Arab tribes, and is still faithful to Stanley.

The Commission to Investigate the Charges of the London Times against Mr. Parnell and his party was the subject of debate all last week in the British House of Commons. The Parnellites presented a number of amendments with the object of limiting the scope of the inquiry, and making more specific the questions to be considered by the Commission, but they were all rejected by the vote of the majority of the House. The Government has excited prejudice and suspicion as to its impartiality by admitting that its leader in the Commons had a long interview with Mr. Walter, the proprietor of the Times, on the very day that an important change was made in the bill appointing the Commission. Mr. Parnell reiterates his statement that the letters purporting to be written by him, and published in the Times are forgeries, and he promises to bring clear proof of his assertion. A member of the Government said, however, that the letters were not the charges but only evidence of the charges against Mr. Parnell. He admitted that the letters were extremely important, and said that without doubt the Commission would early inquire into their authenticity.

Clergymen and Evangelists who will Allow Copies of the CHRISTIAN HERALD to be placed in the seats of churches, or will have them distributed at the doors, will be supplied with assorted parcels of back numbers if they will write to the Manager, 63 Bible House, New York.

Mr. Moody's Bible Conference, at Northfield, commenced on August 1. The attendance is larger than ever before. Mr. Sankey, assisted by Mr. and Mrs. Stebbins, has charge of the musical arrangements, and among the speakers are Rev. J. Hudson Taylor, of the China Inland Mission, Rev. George Needham, Dr. E. W. Faunce, Rev. W. W. Clarke, and other well known ministers. Marquand Hall has been turned into a hotel, principally for ladies. Its beautifully appointed chapel, with large open fireplaces at either end, serves as a dining-room, where the young lady students, with their bright, cheery manners and very evident desire to make every one as happy as possible, assist in making a most ideal place for physical refreshment. East Hall, a building used almost exclusively for a dormitory in term time, is now an abode for the gentlemen, with a restaurant on the lower floor. Other cottages on the grounds are filled with sleeping-arrangements, and the occupants can go to either Marquand or East Halls for meals. Besides these there are the white tents on the lawn, which, at present, are occupied chiefly by young men, mostly members of the Mt. Hermon school for boys.

A Delay in Performing an Operation has proved fatal to an injured man in New York. Three weeks ago a laborer was engaged in lifting stone in the cellar of a building on the Bowery. One of the stones slipped from his grasp and fell on the little finger of his left hand, crushing it badly. He went to the Chambers Street Hospital for treatment, and was told that the finger would have to be amputated. The man strongly objected to the operation, but after a few days of suffering, returned and had a part of the finger cut off. His suffering did not abate, and, after two days more, he went into a hospital and had the whole of the finger taken off. The surgeons were then of opinion that the operation had been delayed too long. So it proved. The man began to complain of stiffness of the neck, which rapidly grew worse, and in spite of repeated doses of chloral hydrate, lockjaw set in, and on July 29 he died. The surgeons insist that if he had consented to the operation immediately after the injury, he would have lived. Similar reluctance to undergo a painful ordeal has often involved a still more terrible result. A sinner who clings to his sin, and tries to get the better of it by degrees, instead of abandoning it once for all, trusting in Christ for strength, generally protracts his suffering and loses his soul. (Matt. 5 : 30.)

A Man Buried for a Week in a Well was rescued on July 28, at Omaha, Neb. While digging the well the sand caved in, and the man would have been smothered but for some boards under which he took refuge. It was at first supposed that he must be dead, and the coroner and undertaker were summoned. Digging was commenced to extricate the body. The operation caused the boards above him to sink in a threatening manner, and the man, fearing they would give way, attracted the attention of the diggers and notified them of his being alive. They easily perceived the danger to him of continuing their efforts, and therefore suspended the attempt to reach him directly, and commenced to tunnel toward him. After working two days and nights they succeeded in getting a tube to his place of confinement, which was fifty-eight feet below the surface of the earth. Through this tube small quantities of nourishing food were passed to him to sustain life. He was then able to communicate with his rescuers, and warned them that the slightest motion would bring down the sand upon him. A long box, open at both ends, and large enough to admit the man's body was made and pushed through the cutting toward him. Through this a rope was passed, which the man tied around him under the arms. He then crept into the box and was drawn through it into the tunnel, and so after being immured for seven days, he once more saw the light of the sun. The excitement in the neighborhood was intense, and the man was overwhelmed with congratulations when he was delivered. In his case, unlike that of the rescue of sinners through Christ, there were no discussions about free will and predestination. When the rope was passed to him he attached himself to it and was saved. The sinner sometimes fails to perceive that his faith serves the same purpose of availing himself of Christ's finished work. (Rom. 5 : 2.)

The Troubles of a German Immigrant were indignantly described in a New York court last week. When the German steamer arrived at her dock on Tuesday, a stalwart young German pushed through the crowd and made his way to the steamer's side. He closely scanned the passengers, and at length his eyes rested on a pretty woman, whom he clasped in his arms with demonstrations of joy and love. A few hours afterwards, however, he applied for her arrest, and the next day appeared in court to give evidence against her. He said that they were betrothed in the Fatherland, and he came to America to earn money to be married, leaving the woman behind. He sent her small sums from time to time to help support her, and finally, when he had a home well furnished for her reception, he sent her money to pay her passage out, and begged her to come. He calculated by which steamer she could come, and went to meet her. To his amazement she came accompanied by her husband, to whom she had been married more than a year and whose passage had been paid with the money he had sent her from time to time for her support. He wanted her imprisoned for obtaining money by false pretences. The woman's perfidy was disgraceful, but even it was not so wicked as is that of some who profess to belong to Christ, yet are married to the world and spend their lives in its pleasures and pursuits. (II Pet. 2 : 20.)

An Offence Against Good Form is Charged against the wife of the President. As it is mentioned by a Republican journal which applauds Mrs. Cleveland's conduct, there is no reason to doubt its veracity. It appears that among the guests at the White House last winter, was a young lady who had been a school-friend of the hostess. Personally charming, she delighted all the assemblies by her skill as a pianist, and her wonderful singing. Aristocratic society in Washington was completely taken captive by her, and hoped that her visit would be prolonged. But a rumor began to circulate that the young lady was poor, and had to earn her own livelihood. It was confirmed when she accepted the position of musical instructress in a seminary in Washington. Then aristocratic society was shocked, but it went into convulsions when Mrs. Cleveland continued to receive her old friend, and actually went driving with her. Her conduct has been condemned by ladies whose husbands and fathers belong respectively to each of the political parties. It is stated that several consultations have been held to devise some means of convincing Mrs. Cleveland that "so daring an outrage on good form" as associating with a person who has to earn her own bread will not be tolerated by the ladies of Washington. It may be hoped that they will not succeed. They should try to overcome their objections, otherwise even Heaven itself would not be a happy place to them. In the court of the King of kings, the poor of this world have a place of honor. (1 Sam. 2 : 8.)

The Title and Rank of a Russian Princess was recently declined by a young Canadian lady. The romantic story is told by a journal of Cleveland, O., in which city an interview between her and her suitor occurred on July 28. Two years ago, while traveling in north Germany, the young lady, who comes from Chatham, Ont., and her companions, were detained by snowdrifts in a small country village. They could not speak the dialect of the village, and would have been much embarrassed but for the help of a Russian gentleman, who spoke English fluently, and interpreted for them. He became quite intimate with the Canadians, and finally asked permission to visit them, as he intended coming to America. He gave them his address in Russia, and references to persons of the highest rank. He said that he was a noble of high rank, distantly related to the imperial family, was commander of a Russian brigade, a member of the Czar's personal staff, and was enormously wealthy. He seemed particularly anxious that his social and financial position should be investigated. On meeting the lady at Cleveland last month, he at once renewed the acquaintance, and made her an offer of marriage. To his astonishment, he was rejected. It is stated that inquiries had been made by the lady's family, at the noble's suggestion, which fully confirmed his statements as to his rank and wealth, but they extended further, and elicited the information that his moral character was bad, and this secured his rejection. Probably his astonishment arose from an opinion that his rank and wealth were sufficient qualifications, and that moral leprosy was of no importance. A similar mistake is made by many who expect to be received into heaven when they die. Outward qualifications and large benefactions will avail nothing without regeneration and imputed holiness. (Matt. 7 : 22, 23.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The National Temperance Hospital of Chicago, founded two years ago, has treated successfully seven hundred patients without alcohol.

Dr. Cullis's Faith Training College will open for its fourteenth annual course of lectures on October 1, at Beacon Hill Church, Boston, Mass.

Mr. Charles Herald has been conducting services in Bethesda Chapel, Brooklyn, N. Y. The mission is in connection with the Central Congregational Church, of which Dr. Behrends is pastor. Much good has been done.

About seventy delegates from American Young Men's Christian Associations have sailed for Stockholm, Sweden, to attend the World's Conference, commencing August 15.

The revival services conducted by Rev. Thomas Harrison in the Old John Street Methodist Church closed on Thursday last. Three thousand persons have made a profession of faith.

It is reported from Batavia that the Governor-General of the Dutch possessions in the East has prohibited the importation of all spirituous liquors into the Dutch portion of New Guinea.

A sporting man said, after hearing Ingersoll's recent oration in New York, "It's a spicy thing to laugh at for an hour, but not a very cheering doctrine to have around when there is a funeral in the house."

In Philadelphia a home for Baptist ministers is nearly ready for occupation. Deacon George Nugent, of the Second Baptist Church of Germantown, Philadelphia, left by will over $250,000 to found such a home.

A volcanic eruption at Bandaisan, fifty leagues from Yokohama, has destroyed several villages and killed 1,000 persons, including 100 visitors at the Thermal Springs. A fresh crater has formed and the eruption has not yet ceased.

The New York Y. M. C. A. has opened a Savings-Fund for the use of its members. It has proved a very helpful agency in enabling the subscribers to save small sums at frequent intervals. Since March 26 $559.60 has been received on deposit.

Merton Smith has been conducting services every night during the past month in the large gospel tent on State and Twenty-third streets, Chicago, under the Evangelization Society. The opening sermon was given by Rt. Rev. Charles Edward Cheney, D. D.

Recent advices report great progress in missionary work in some parts of China. Mr. Stanley Smith, of the China Inland Mission, reports 210 baptisms in central China at one time, and another missionary reports that he preaches to audiences, sometimes numbering 4,000.

A camp-meeting is to be held at Wilmington, Mass., September 6–16, under the direction of Rev. William A. Thurston. The following preachers and evangelists among others are expected to assist in the services: Rev. William McDonald, Rev. J. W. Hamilton, D. D., Rev. E. R. Thorndike, Rev. A. McLean.

The Young Men's Christian Association in Toronto is doing a good work. A tent has been built at Little York, a suburb, to be used as a reading-room and for gospel meetings. A great number of railway employees are connected with the works there, whom it is hoped the tent work will reach.

A time of danger for American missionaries in Corea is reported in the Shanghai journals. It seems that a Chinaman started the report that American missionaries had bought native children and killed them, using their bodies for medicine. Aid was asked and received from the foreign men-of-war in the harbor, but not until several natives had been decapitated by the mob.

HOW TO BE SAVED FROM SIN.

A New Sermon, by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Stand in awe, and sin not: commune with your own heart upon your bed, and be still. Selah. Offer the sacrifices of righteousness, and put your trust in the Lord."—Psalm 4 : 4, 5.

David's Refuge in Persecution—His Four Directions to Sinners—I. Stand in Awe—Ours a Flippant Age—Reasons for Awe—A Soldier's Swoon—II. Thoughtful Self-Examination—The Subject—The Method—Bells Heard in the Night—III. A Right Approach to God—By Confession—Through Christ—IV. Exercise Faith—The Surest of all Sin-Killers—Attended with a New Nature—Christ's Hospital—The Coming Glory.

DAVID was surrounded with many wicked and cruel enemies. They touched him in a tender place when they mocked his religion, and so turned his glory into shame. They invented all kinds of lies against him; but the worst of all was that they said, "There is no help for him in God." As much as to say, "God hath cast him off; therefore, let men cast him off. He that is forsaken of the Lord is not fit to sit upon the throne of Israel; let us set up Absalom in his place." This was malice indeed.

David first made his appeal to God in prayer. Herein he showed his wisdom. You can drive a better bnsiness at the mercy-seat than in the world's jangling markets. You will get more than from ungodly men. To enter into debate is never so profitable as to enter into devotion. Carry not your complaint into the lower courts, but go at once to the Court of King's Bench, where the Judge of all presides. Copy David, and David's Lord, who in the days of his flesh with strong crying and tears poured out his soul before the Father.

After David had prayed, he expostulated with his adversaries. The first showed his sonship towards God, the second his brotherliness towards men. There is nothing of bitterness in the words I have read to you: they have a kindly voice in them. If his foes had been at all reasonable, they would have listened to his pleadings; but it is to be feared they were otherwise minded. He urges them to cease from sin, and he teaches them the way to do so. In four sentences he helps them to escape from their evil ways, and to become better men. Upon these four precepts I would speak this morning as the Holy Spirit shall give me utterance, trusting, hoping, believing that many who desire a better life may find it while I speak. Here are four stepping-stones across the filthy slough of sin; may you mark them well, and step from one to the other by the help of God's Spirit, till you reach the other shore, and stand on safe and clean ground!

I. First, feel reverent awe: "Stand in awe." It might be translated, "Tremble, and sin not." Awe is not a common emotion now. This is

A Flippant Age.

Men are rather triflers than tremblers. If there be any doctrine which has peculiar weight and solemnity about it, they try to pare it down to less terrible proportions. Sin is not exceeding sinful to them, nor its punishment exceeding terrible. They would not have us know the terrors of the Lord, though by these very terrors we persuade men. But true religion must have a savor of awe about it: "My heart standeth in awe of Thy word," is the expression of one that knows God, and is reconciled to Him. Let me say, then, to you who have been thoughtless and careless about your souls until now—we earnestly desire you to consider these words: "Stand in awe."

Remember, there is a God: whatever you may desire, or others may declare, there is a God who is everywhere present, at all times. He has seen all your evil ways, and heard all your hard speeches. No night is so dark as to hide from His eye; no chamber so retired as to shut Him out. He has even read your thoughts and imaginations. He notes all, and forgets nothing. Remember, that this God, who is everywhere and sees everything, is your Judge. He is pure and holy, and cannot bear iniquity. He is angry with the wicked every day, and will surely visit them for their transgressions. Every sinful act shall have its recompense of reward. Do not doubt it. The world is all in a tangle now, but there will be a day when the Lord will draw out a straight thread for each man.

Stand in awe of God because he is infinitely good. To me personally, some little time ago, the Lord drew very near in a most special and memorable providence. As I saw the hand of the Lord stretched out so marvellously, I felt my very flesh creep, not with alarm, but with a joyful awe of One who could work so tenderly and condescendingly for His tried servant. I knew that He was God by His marvellously gracious care over me, and nearness to my soul in adversity. God has dealt with me very graciously. Oh, His great goodness! A sense of it is overwhelming. We fear and tremble for all the goodness which the Lord makes to pass before us. Think of sin forgiven, of righteousness imputed, of spiritual life imparted, of that life preserved, supplied, nurtured. Think of providence with all mindful foresight, and abounding supplies. The love of God should make us reverent as angels, and humble as penitents. If the impudence of pride might dare to insult justice, yet it should scorn to injure love.

A Soldier's Swoon.

My dear hearers, stand in awe in reference to a future state. You do not doubt the truth which the Holy Spirit has revealed, that when you die you will not cease to be. There will be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and of the unjust; "for we must all appear before before the judgment-seat of Christ." Oh, that all persons would remember this wherever they go! I have heard of a soldier—I think he was employed in the survey of Palestine—who was in the valley of Jehoshaphat, outside Jerusalem, and some one remarked that it was reported by some that this valley would be the scene of the last judgment, and in that place the multitudes would be gathered. The soldier, hearing this, said, "What a crowd there will be! I shall be there, and I will sit on this stone." He sat down to realize the scene, and his imagination acted so powerfully that he seemed to himself to be among the throng, and to behold the great white throne. He was seen to swoon, and fall to the ground. Do you wonder? If any one of us could, in our inmost souls, behold that scene, should we not be overcome? I wish I could so speak this morning that some of you would picture that last tremendous day, for which all others were made.

O my dear hearers, do not forget that you have to live in a future state, and that you will see Him who died upon the cross, seated on the throne, in that day when all nations shall be gathered before Him, and He shall divide them, the one from the other, as the shepherd divideth the sheep from the goats. May the thought of the eternal reward also rest on your minds! Hear ye, even now, that word of the King to the righteous—"Come, ye blessed of my father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." Hear, also, that dread sentence to those on His left hand, "Depart from Me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels." Oh, think of these things, and "stand in awe, and sin not!"

II. In the second place, David admonished the ungodly to practice

Thoughtful Self-Examination.

"Commune with your heart upon your bed, and be still. I am not trying, my dear hearer, to preach a sermon this morning, but I am longing to take you by the hand, and to lead you in the right way. I pray the Holy Spirit to make you willing to follow my gentle guidance. My dear friend, you are now asked to think about yourself—"commune with your own heart." When once men choose the way of evil, they run in it with their eyes shut. They do not wish to consider; it is easier to go blindly on. They will think about their worldly concerns, their profits and losses, their pleasures and amusements; but they refuse seriously to consider their condition before God. O my friend, think of what you are, and where you are, what you have done, what you are doing, what it will all lead to! Are you such a fool that you will not consider? Then put on the cap and bells, and wear motley, and take to

Your Proper Trade.

Especially think of the state of your heart. This is the vital point. Are you right with God? Do you serve your Maker? Have you truly repented of former sin? Have you fled to Christ as your refuge? Have you been born again? Are you the subject of sanctifying grace? "Commune with your own heart" upon these essential points. He that would have his face clean must look in a glass to see his spots; and he that would have his heart clean must gaze into the looking glass of God's Word, that he may discover his secret faults.

I commend this text most heartily to your immediate practice. If you are unsaved—think rather than sleep. The tendency of most men with regard to eternal things is to go to sleep, and let matters drift: I pray you do not so. I dare not let you take your rest while all is wrong with you. Sleep, if you like, in a house that is on a blaze; sleep, if you like, in a ship that is settling down, and rapidly sinking; but I charge you, do not sleep while you are an unforgiven man, and your soul is nearing the eternal woe.

I beseech you, give yourselves space for thought, before thought becomes the worm of eternal misery to you. Remember, before you hear that voice from heaven which spoke to the rich man in hell, and said to him, "Son, remember." Ye slaves of fashion and frivolity, think, I pray you! Ye serfs of daily money-grubbing, rest a while, and hear what God the Lord shall speak to you! You can hardly hear the great bell of St. Paul's when the traffic is thundering around, but it sounds solemnly in the stillness of night. We who live in the more remote suburbs hear Big Ben of Westminister at night, but we seldom note it amid the stir and noise of the day. Do give an opportunity for the eternal voices to pierce the clamors of the hour. Do for God's sake, and for your own soul's sake, hear what wisdom teaches concerning everlasting things!

III. Very briefly, let us note that David gives a third piece of advice, which in essence means Approach God Aright.

"Offer the sacrifices of righteousness." Now, I do not quite know what David himself may have intended by it, but this is how I interpret it. Come to God; come to God in His own way; come as Israel came to the tabernacle in the wilderness, bringing their sacrifices with them.

When they brought their sacrifices, the first thing they did was to lay their hand on the victim, and make a confession of sin. Come then, with broken and contrite hearts unto the Lord. "The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit." Own your shortcomings and transgressions. Do not cloak or excuse your sins. Get to your chamber, and tell the Lord what you have done. Pour out your hearts before Him, turn them upside down, as it were, and let all flow out, even to the dregs. Confess your pride and unbelief, your Sabbath-breaking, your dishonesty, your falsehood, your disobedience to parents, your every breach of divine law; whatsoever you have done amiss, confess it before Him, and thus go to Him in the only way in which He can receive you, even as sinners owning your guilt.

Go also to the Lord with gracious desires to be rid of sin. Entreat reconciliation, saying, "I would no longer be what I have been. I throw down the weapons of my rebellion, I pluck out the plumes of my pride; O Lord, I stand before Thee, guilty, and I pray Thee forgive me, and then rid me of the tyrant evils which now rule me so terribly! Oh, that I may sin no more! If I have been a drunkard, help me from this day to relinquish the intoxicating cup; if I have been a swearer, wash out my mouth; may ceforth, speak nothing but that which will acceptable to Thee! If I have been unchaste, nse my mind, that I may keep my body e!" In this way come to God with contrite rts. How much do I long that you may w nigh to God with true repentance and rty resolves to conquer sin!

he main thing, however, is to bring unto Lord the offering which He has divinely ointed and provided. You know what that There is one sacrifice of righteousness with- which you cannot be accepted. Come to l by faith in Jesus Christ, plead the precious od of atonement, and say, "My Lord for His r sake who died upon the tree, receive Thy nderer, and now be pleased to grant me that ntance and remission of sins which He is lted to give." If you come through Christ, will never be cast out. The Father will re- e any sinner that pleads the name of Jesus; Jesus is willing that you should plead His ne. He died on purpose to be the propitia- n for our sins: God grant that you may ept Him as such!

V. I must now close with the fourth point, ch is, in some respects, the most important:

Exercise Faith.

When holy awe and thoughtful self-communion e led us to seek the Lord, then we are prepared the great precept which follows. It is the com- nd of the gospel in its Old Testament form: ut your trust in the Lord." First, trust Him willing to receive you, to forgive you, to ac- t you, and to bless you. Especially trust in Lord as He reveals Himself in the person of Son Jesus Christ. In Him you see love tten out in capital letters. "Put your trust he Lord" as having provided the one sacri- for sin, whereby He has put away for ever the sins of those who believe in Him. God ust, and the justifier of him that believeth. ieve that the precious blood can make you ter than snow, scarlet sinner as you are. ne with that daring trust which ventures all n the bare promise of a faithful God. Say, will go in unto the King, and if I perish, I ish." If you do not trust in Christ, you must ost; therefore come and

Try the Divine Way.

Trust in the Lord, next, that by the work of Holy Spirit He can renew you. The glori- Lord, who made the world out of nothing, make something out of you yet. If you are en to anger, the Holy Spirit can make you n and loving. If you have been defiled with urity, He can make you pure in heart. If have been grovelling, He can elevate you. ay be addressing a forlorn man, who thinks t nothing can be made of him. I tell you, have no idea what God can do with you. can put heavenly treasure in earthen vessels. can set you at last among the heavenly choris- s, that your voice, sweeter than that of angels, y be heard amongst their symphonies.

ly closing theme is this—it has been asserted certain of the modern school that we preach salvation by a simple intellectual operation alvation by merely believing a certain doc- nal statement. This is their way of stating, mis-stating, justification by faith, which we assuredly preach, and preach most distinctly l confidently. We are not responsible for ir caricatures of our teaching, but we would moved thereby to be more and more explicit. far as faith is an intellectual operation, it is ple enough; but simple faith is no trifle. e is a simple element, but it has a measure- s power. Connected with faith there are ces of the mightiest kind for influencing racter and purifying life.

Faith is the Surest of all Sin-Killers;

fact, its tendency is to extirpate sin. The ral and spiritual change which accompanies h, and grows out of it, is of the most remark- e kind. Faith's work in the soul is some- ng to be wondered at, and to be admired to eternity. For, mark, when a man believes he Lord Jesus Christ, when he believes that us so died for him that he is effectually re- deemed, when he believes that the Lord Jesus has cleansed him, and that he is saved, the result upon his heart and life cannot be commonplace. So divine a persuasion operates upon his whole nature. He is filled with adoring gratitude, and that gratitude breeds an intense love, which fervent love sets itself to work for the glory of God by

of the soul from sin. "My Jesus died because of my sin," says the pardoned sinner, "therefore no sin shall abide in my heart. Away, O sin! Away, for ever." Some favorite sin cries, "Let me lodge within thee," but he cries, "It cannot be, for I love Jesus." Sin slew our Saviour; how can we be on friendly terms with it? We hate it with perfect hatred. Sin pleadeth, "Is it not a little one?" But the grateful heart sees great evil in a little sin, since the great Father abhors all iniquity. Nothing creates more indignation and revenge against sin than a grateful sense of "free grace and dying love." Surely this is no mean help toward moral purification.

Faith feels that she cannot buy the transient joys of earth at the cost of an immortal soul. Faith destroys the power of temptation. When Satan says, "You are in trouble, and here is an easy way of escape: only do a little wrong, and you will get a great good." "No," says faith, to get me out of my trouble, and I will not go to the devil for His aid." "Ah!" says Satan, "everybody else does so!" Faith answers, "I have to do with nobody but God, and that which is right." Moreover, faith is always attended with a new nature. That is a point never to be forgotten, No man has faith in God of a true kind unless he has been born again. Faith in God is one of the first indications of regeneration. Now, if you have a new and holy nature, you are no longer moved toward sinful objects as you were before. The things that you once loved you now hate, and, therefore, you will not run after them. You can hardly understand it, but so it is, that your thoughts and tastes are totally changed. You long for that very holiness which once it was irksome to hear of, and you loathe those very pursuits which were once your delights. When the Lord renews us it is not half done; it is a total and radical change.

If there were no work of the Holy Spirit connected with faith, and if faith were nothing more than human assent to truth, we might be blameworthy for preaching salvation through it; but since faith leads the van in the graces of the Spirit of God, and turns the rudder of the soul, we are more and more concerned to place faith where God places it, and we say without hesitation, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." Remember you will thus be saved from the power of sin, and from the practice of sin, by being saved from the love of sin. Our Lord and into it He receives all manner of sick folk; yet He does not receive them that they may continue sick, but that He may heal them, and make them whole.

If by believing in Christ Jesus you receive a change of nature, and live a different life, and stand at the last day accepted in the Beloved, what bliss it will be! What joy will be yours when Jesus comes, when His smile shall light up the universe, and when He shall acknowledge you before the angels of God! You were with Him in His humiliation; you shall be with Him in His exaltation; you loved Him and served Him here below; you shall sit upon His throne, and reign with Him for ever and ever. Ah! then, whatever little you may have suffered for His sake will be as nothing in comparison with the exceeding weight of glory. Whatever struggling of heart and pain of soul you felt in escaping from the sin which enthralled you will be your joy when the result is seen in your eternal perfection. The bliss of beholding the face of our Beloved will be heaven enough for us. Even now I feel eager to quit this feeble body at the bare thought of being with the Bridegroom of my soul.

"Mine eyes shall see Him in that day,
The God that died for me;
And all my rising bones shall say,
Lord, who is like to thee?"

May you and I behold our Redeemer when He shall stand in the latter day upon the earth!

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

ASCENDING A MOUNTAIN IN MEXICO.*

NINE miles below the city of Zacatecas the railroad begins to rise, by a triumph of magnificent engineering, up a grade of one hundred and seventy-five feet to the mile, making on the passage some of the most abrupt curves conceivable. It recalled the old Colorado cañons, only that here we went around the hill-side instead of plunging over precipices and bridging gorges with trestles. The powerful engine panted like some hard-pressed animal, and the train of heavy cars dragged wearily up after it. We forgot fatigue, forgot fear, forgot—what is harder to forget then either—supper, and crowded the narrow platforms with an excitement almost painful. At last, with one mighty final effort, we turned the last sharp mountain spur, and with the Bufa rising high on the left, its enormous crest of rock above like the dorsal fin of some fossile monster, with a glow of red gold over all the western sky and the evening star shining palely in the east, we rested on the crest on the hill above the dark, little, sleeping town, with only three faint points of light to indicate its location, or give any sign of life.

An Answer Through a Grating.

"Barter and the obtaining of gold for Spain," which was all that Cortes and the Spaniards asked, when they landed in Mexico, have left a stamp upon the country which one generation of comparatively tranquil independence cannot be expected to efface. A traveller who passed through Mexico mny years ago, saw a face peering out of a window upon a vista of wonderful beauty. Whether prisoner or recluse he knew not, but said, through the grating: "How beautiful!" "Transeuntibus" (to those who pass by) was the laconic answer. So has it has been with Mexico. Beautiful to those who robbed her, beautiful to the tourist, her real condition is one which depresses her own people, whose poverty, ignorance, and loneliness, make them the most pitiable, as they are certainly the most kindly and polite people on this continent.

The Houses of the Poor.

The very poor live within four walls of dried mud on a floor of the same material. Anywhere upon this a fire of mesquite faggots may be kindled, to cook the universal tortilla, which forms almost the sole food of a large class. A few crockery utensils for cooking and eating, a hand-brush for sweeping, some water-jars and baskets, perhaps a bundle of maguey fibres for a bed, and the furniture is complete. The zarape is a cloak by day and a covering by night; the smoke flies out of open door or four-paned window, as it listeth; the floor is at once chair and table; and that is all—or rather it is not all; for with it stay patience, kindness, and content, three graces hard to account for with such meagre plenishing.

courtyard, tiled with marbles, bright with flowers, statues, and splashing fountains, surrounded by all the appliances which wealth can suggest to indolence. Around this inner pleasaunce the house rises in a series of light arched galleries resting on carved pillars, communicating by broad outer stairways of stone, and opening into every room by windows and doors of plain or stained glass. Vines and hanging plants cover the low stone balustrades; and inside the broad dimly lighted salons and chambers, whatever luxurious taste can bring to aid comfort is lavishly supplied. A host of servants divide among them those more personal services which our rigid aristocrats prefer to render themselves, and a clap of the hands brings instantly a swift and silent attendant. Below, under the arches, on the ground floor, horses stand in their open stalls; there are carriages, store-rooms, and servants' quarters; so that when the great gates leading to the street are closed, all the elements of luxurious living are complete within.

JOSEPH RABINOWITZ.

(See Portrait.)

A REMARKABLE movement among the Jews of eastern Europe has recently attracted general attention. The leader of it is Joseph Rabinowitz, a Jew of considerable learning and strong national enthusiasm. He has gathered around him a large number of sincere Jewish converts, to whom he preaches Jesus as the Messiah, and the hope of Israel. The account of his own conversion is remarkable. It appears to have been through the direct influence of the Holy Spirit, without the intervention of human instrumentality.

He was born at Regina, in Bessarabia, in 1837, and was brought up by his grandfather, a learned Rabbi, and himself the son of a Rabbi. The old man was at great pains to instruct the boy thoroughly in the Talmud, and was so proud of his progress that he used to take him to the chief of the Chasidim, to which sect he belonged, that his proficiency might be admired. When Joseph was only ten years of age, he was sent to Orgieff, where he distinguished himself as a diligent and successful student of the Talmud. As he grew older, however, the youth separated himself from the orthodox Jews and joined the Reformers. At eighteen he married and commenced business, but two years later he lost the whole of his stock in trade by a fire. Thereupon he commenced the study of law, and settled at Kischeneff. In 1882 he paid a visit to Palestine, and was deeply moved by the spectacle of the desolation of Jerusalem. He read and re-read the closing chapters of Jewish history, and as he did so the passage, "They mocked the messengers of God, and misused His prophets until the wrath of the Lord arose against His people, till there was no remedy" (II Chron. 36: 16.), gave him cause for thought. It was then that, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, he was led to see that in their rejection of Jesus of Nazareth the Jews filled up the cup of their iniquities, and brought upon themselves the judgments of God. He returned home full of this new light, devoted himself to the study of the New Testament, and soon began to preach. His followers continue to practice the rite of circumcision, keep the feasts, but have ceased to look for the promised Messiah, acknowledging Jesus as "Him of whom Moses and the prophets did write."

A VISIT TO A SMYRNA JEW.

(See Illustration.)

THE Rev. J. M. Eppstein, one of the agents of the Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews, and who is stationed at Smyrna, the seat of one of the seven churches mentioned in the Book of Revelation, thus writes: "One of my casual inquirers was taken ill, and I at once set out to see him, to administer medicine to his body and the means of spiritual healing to his soul. I was amply rewarded for my trouble by the hearty welcome I received from him and his wife. It required a good deal of caution and tact to make the necessary inquiries after my friend, for the simple fact of my visiting him was quite enough to throw suspicion on him, and expose him to persecution and suffering. I could do it with a better grace on my next visit, as I stated to those from whom I sought the information that Mr. S. was very unwell, and that I wished to examine him in my medical capacity.

"I found him seriously ill, and in very low spirits. His wife, to show her gratitude to me, hospitably left the room to make a cup of coffee, and that gave us an opportunity of speaking together about the Saviour. He showed me the copy of the New Testament which I had given him, and assured me that it gave him great pleasure and comfort, although there were several things in it which he could not quite understand. I offered to explain to him some of his difficulties, but he said that his opportunities were limited, as his wife was violently opposed to the Christian religion. She retur with the coffee while we were talking, and wi my friend still held the Testament in his ha As she was deeply grateful to me for the ph cal benefit her husband had received thro me, I took the opportunity to speak to he the Great Physician, and she did not resen remarks. Since then my friend has comple recovered, and both he and his wife are am my most promising inquirers, and neither, I lieve, is far from the Kingdom of God."

She continued to despise them and their work until trouble came upon her. Deserted and disgraced, cast out by worldly society, she sought a refuge with them, and found that, like their Master, they were prepared to welcome the repentant sinner.

THE EPOCHS OF A LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. L. S. Keyser.

A Jealous Woman.

AN engagement Hadley Madelling had made to take Belle Havelock to a literary lecture in Chapel Hall fell due on the Tuesday after that sermon of Mr. Mardont's. The fascination which the highly cultured girl exercised over him was very potent that night. The subject of the lecture was not connected with religion, and therefore there was an absence on her face, and in her manner of the cynical spirit which the mention of religion always brought there, and which repelled Hadley and counteracted her attraction of him. He thought he had never seen her look so beautiful, so intelligent, and so brilliant as on that evening.

In accompanying her to her home after the lecture Hadley spoke of the subject which was uppermost in his mind. He told her of the sermon he had heard, and of the result of the effort he and Dane had made to follow Mr. Mardont's advice. A sneering, contemptuous smile curled Belle's lips as she listened.

"I have been through all that," she said, as they reached her door, "I have studied several books of so-called Christian evidences, and I have read the Bible more perhaps than many believers, but I have not been convinced. Will you come in? I can show you how my line of investigation has run, and we can dip into these books together for an hour."

Hadley readily consented, and Belle took down first one book and then another from the well-filled shelves. "See," she said, opening a popular treatise in defence of Christianity, "this author begins by asserting that one of the chief causes of infidelity is want of knowledge, or as the author puts it, varying his phraseology, lack of information. You see, he begins by insulting the sceptic, and so I flung the book aside, and have never looked into it since. But the Bible must stand on its own merits. What does it signify if it is bolstered up by a huge pyramid of 'historical evidences,' if it does not bear the impress of the divine mind upon its ethical teachings? Now, there are certain men held up in Scripture as models for imitation. Abraham is called 'the friend of God,' but we cannot forget the falsehoods that he told in Egypt, or his harsh treatment of Hagar and her son in sending them out into the wilderness. The Bible teaches that Jacob was arbitrarily chosen to fulfill God's purposes, while he hated Esau, and was one of the most selfish, calculating and perfidious plotters of history. David is especially extolled. Have you ever read the dying requests of this so-called "sweet singer of Israel?"

"I do not remember, although I know something about his vindictive spirit from reading the imprecatory Psalms," replied Hadley.

"His dying anathemas are entirely in keeping with the impression that you have received from his writings. Look," she said, taking down a well-worn Bible from the bookcase, and turning the leaves rapidly, "here are David's instructions to Solomon, his successor on the throne. Solomon is enjoined to take vengeance on his father's enemies. David from motives of policy had forgiven them, but Joab's hoar hair is not to go down to the grave in peace. Shimei who had David's pledge that he would not kill him, is to be brought down to the grave in blood. And Solomon executed both behests. Look at the laws of Moses. Venial faults, mere errors, if committed against the priests or the temple are punished with death, while vile crimes can be expiated by an offering."

"That is what puzzles me. The Bible is held up as the rule and standard of morality, yet cruel wars of extermination, immorality, slavery, and polygamy are mentioned there with approval, tacit or explicit, and men who practice them in these days can quote passages in their defence."

"True, and what is needed now," said Belle, "is that some man of logical and forensic abilities undertake to expose the false ethical teachings of this book, and strike the fetters from the minds of the uninformed and priest-ridden." And she bent her flashing eyes upon him with a look of expectancy.

It was not difficult for him to interpret the significance of her words and looks. "And you think that I ought to be the one to begin the work of emancipation?" he remarked.

"I do," she answered.

"As soon as an opportunity affords—"

"Create an opportunity."

"In a few weeks an oration will be expected of me in Chapel Hall on Saturday morning, and then—"

"Will be the opportune time."

"Yes."

"Will you take advantage of it?" she asked, her eyes full of interrogation points.

"I will see."

A shadow of disappointment flew across her face like a cloud at his evasive answer; but she said: "I shall anxiously wait for the time."

He walked home in a deeply meditative mood. This girl exercised a commanding influence over his intellect. She had the faculty of placing every objection to the Bible in a strong, electric light, so to speak, and under the new impetus she had given him he now felt that he had gained sufficient courage to make the long-projected assault on the Bible.

Then his thoughts reverted again to the strange and heterogeneous emotions that the girl had aroused in him. While she had been steadily gaining a more potent influence over his intellect, her power over his conjugal affections was becoming more and more minimized. It was only when he thought of Miss Winters that his pulses tingled with an emotion at once passionate and tender, and her name could not be mentioned in his hearing without causing an uncomfortable flow of color to his face. Yet he was somewhat in a quandary. His attentions to Belle Havelock had revealed to him the fact that she was taking a deep personal interest in him, which was of a more potent quality than mere pleasure in intellectual affiliation. Although he was not endowed with a superabundant amount of vanity, this conclusion was forced upon him, and if it were true he disliked to cease his attentions to her and transfer them to another. What reason could he give for a sudden cessation of his calls at the Havelock residence? For awhile he oscillated between two lines of conduct, not knowing to which of the girls he should pay his addresses.

Yet, with his customary decision of character, he finally decided to seek the society of Miss Winters, and cultivate her acquaintance, and at the same time he might perhaps occasionally visit Belle for intellectual stimulus and social pleasure without compromising himself. He had purposely refrained from making an appointment with the latter for Sunday evening, because he wished to be free to call upon Miss Winters if he should conclude that it was desirable to do so. When he reached his room that evening his resolution was formed.

In order to make an appointment with Miss Winters for the coming Sabbath evening the young student had recourse to one of the social customs of the college. The next day he said to his room-mate: "George, you have been introduced to Miss Winters, have you not?"

"Certainly; you introduced me yourself, old Forgetfulness."

"Oh, yes, I remember. Will you carry a note to her for me this afternoon?"

"Of course I will. I shall gladly be your Mercury."

Hadley seated himself at his writing-desk, and after destroying a number of sheets of note-paper, he at last had his brief missive complete. It was a simple communication, asking courteously for the pleasure of accompanying her to church on the following Sunday evening, if his proposition did not conflict with any other engagements which she might have made.

George took the note and hurried to the house in which the young lady roomed. When the door was opened he inquired for Miss Winters, who was immediately sent for, and appeared the next moment in the hall-way. After interchanging the usual civilities he handed her the note, which Hadley had intrusted to him, and said:

"I am requested to remain for a reply."

"Please step in," she said, with a smile, as she took the missive.

He was shown into the parlor, where he remained while the young lady retired to her own room to read the letter and pen an answer. When she came back he noticed that there was a pleased flush, which reminded him of a summer sunset, upon her cheeks, and a smile wreathed her lips, and he leaped instinctively to the conclusion that her response to Hadley's epistle was a favorable one. "No wonder," he thought, "that Hadley admires this beautiful girl!"

Never before had she appeared so fascinating to George's eyes as she did then, in her light evening dress. He was loathe to leave immediately, feeling that it would be delightful to have an half-hour's conversation with so charming a girl; but, as he was acting in the capacity of a messenger for another, he feared that it would be straining the rules of social decorum to linger. After exchanging a few commonplaces with her, he bowed himself out of the room, and reluctantly took his departure.

Young Madelling was waiting his friend's return in a state of nervous anxiety. His hand trembled visibly as he took the small, rose-tinted envelope from George. With breathless haste his eye scanned the neat, brief lines, and, when he had read the missive through, a sigh of relief escaped his lips. A heavy burden of suspense was lifted from his mind.

"Why, Hadley," said Dane, after a respectful pause, "you were actually pale! I hope that your anxiety is allayed."

"Yes, the note is entirely satisfactory," replied Hadley, with a smile.

"I congratulate you," said George, warmly. "You have reason to feel elated, Hadley, for you will appear with the most beautiful and clever girl in the college or town. Let me tell you confidentially, that if you had not made me your Mercury this afternoon, I should have been tempted to make an appointment with the bright being myself."

"Ah! you will be my rival yet, I fear," returned Hadley, with a rather mechanical attempt at hilarity.

Had Belle Havelock known of that invitation and its acceptance, she would have better understood a question that was puzzling her. She could easily perceive that Hadley admired her, and was susceptible to her charms. He had given clearer proof of it on that Tuesday evening than at any previous interview. Yet he had not suggested any future meeting. Why had he not proposed taking her to hear Mr. Mardont next Sunday evening, as he seemed so much interested in the preacher, and as her experience of the college customs told her would have been a natural thing for a young man to do, who had spent the evening in so intimate and personal a conversation as they had enjoyed?

Still, why should she care about what he did or did not do? She sat down to think the matter out. Was this young Madelling becoming more to her than other young men had been whom she had known? She examined herself, and she had to acknowledge that he had stirred depths in her being that no one had ever touched before. Mere intellectual affinity was not sufficient to explain the emotion his presence and words aroused. Was this love? Belle's cheeks flushed as the thought rose in her mind, and her heart beat quickly. If this was really love, was it reciprocated? No word or sign could she recollect that encouraged any such hope. The survey of their past intercourse brought her to the point from which she started: Why had he not proposed to take her to church the next Sunday night? Perhaps he intended to do so, and would write her before Sunday. And with that thought to support her, Belle went to bed and to sleep.

Each day brought its disappointment, for no letter of invitation came. Belle could not understand it, and there was growing up in mind a feeling of resentment at the appa slight. True, she had no claim on the young but the discovery she had made of her own re for him would be, to one so proud and han as she, a humiliation, if it was not retu No one knew of it; but she knew, and her respect would be hurt, which was really a bitter humiliation to one so independent a careless about the opinions of other people to have them despise her. With her own science approving her she could have met and ridicule with contempt, but to know she had given love where it was not apprec nor sought would be an unutterable shame would make her loathe herself. She gre most fierce as she thought of it, and th she could never stoop to woo, she resolved such power as she knew she had, should b forth to the utmost to bring Hadley to he as a lover. No other result could save her self-reproach.

Not until Sunday morning dawned did abandon hope of receiving an invitation fo evening. None came, but she must see Ha Perhaps he wished to go with Dane t church, as they had gone together last He would surely be going, and she decide she would go too, if only to solve her do Accordingly as the hour for service approa she dressed, and walked alone to the Ma Street church, taking her seat in the rear auditorium a few moments after the mi had entered the pulpit. The audience wa gathering rapidly, and soon all the pews, e a few at the side of the pulpit, were occu With an anxious eye Belle watched ever arrival.

What was it that caused her to start, and turn pale, as if her heart had refused to the vitalizing fluid to her face? A young c were just walking up the aisle, brushing a against her, and almost instinctively her vigilant eye recognized them. They were ley Madelling and Miss Winters, the g had saved on the railroad bridge. Here, then, was the explanation of Ha apparent neglect of her. Even on the pre Tuesday evening, he must have had th pointment with Miss Winters in view, an was the reason he had not spoken about c again at the Havelock residence. Belle through it all. After the first pang, whic one of genuine grief, another feeling suc ed. It was that of jealously, fierce and v tive. She could not submit tamely t thought of a rival in the young man's tions; for in this light she regarded Winters. She did not believe that M ling would seek the society of a young for mere social enjoyment. He was busy with his studies to spend his time i way, and therefore she believed that an who would be able to lure the industrious dent from his college work, must have ar his interest to an unwonted degree.

Although the services were of an unu interesting character that evening, holdin audience with spell-bound attention, the ing thoughts fell unheeded upon Belle lock's preoccupied mind. With the eyes o con she watched the changing expressions faces of Hadley Madelling and his compa

THE FEAST OF TABERNACLES.

:he rule of God over His people Israel, was no distinction made between political piritual; the government was immediately irectly under the control of God, and His nd word were sought in all particulars. it came to pass that the seasons of the vere not marked by Easter, Whitsuntide, st and Christmas public holidays, but by special feasts unto the Lord. The Pass- which was the first and was celebrated in pring, the beginning of the Jewish year, o commemorate God's deliverance of His e from the land of Egypt and from the of bondage. This was calculated to stir e gratitude of His people's hearts and fill with thankful joy. Would that our ob- ıce of Good Friday and Easter Day were an universal thanksgiving of saved souls ghout the land for redemption through lood of the Lamb! The second feast is erfully significant; it is

The Feast of Pentecost;

; the offering of the first fruits, not memo- ke the Passover. It is a type of how a soul, after being forgiven, and washed in ood of Jesus, is now in a position to give hing to God which He can accept. "Ye eat neither bread, nor parched corn, nor ears, until the self-same day that ye have ht an offering unto your God. (Lev. 23: Seek ye first the kingdom of God and His ousness" (Matt. 6:33). It is our glorious ge under the gospel to present our bodies e are) a living sacrifice to God (Rom. 12: d to count all that we have, not our own, is. er the offering of the first fruits the harvest e land was reaped, the first fruits, being to God, sanctified the work; it was to be nder His eye, in His name, to manifest manner of God ruled over them, and what er of rule His was. Therefore, "when ye he harvest of your land, thou shalt not a clean riddance of the corners of thy when thou reapest, neither shalt thou every gleaning of thy harvest; thou shalt them unto the poor, and to the stranger; he Lord your God."

In the seventh month another feast was to be observed. It is called the feast of tabernacles, but also "the feast of ingathering." (Ex. 23:16; 34:22.) It was commanded concerning all the feasts of the Lord that no servile work was to be done, but on the Sabbath and on the day of atonement, which preceded the feast of tabernacles, "no manner of work." The day of atonement, as we have seen, prefig- ured the work of Christ upon the cross; no work of man can add to that one work of God. "Not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to His mercy He saved us by the washing of regeneration." (Tit. 3:4.) "And whatsoever soul it be that doeth any work in that same day, the same soul will I destroy from among His people." What shall I do? What must I do? is ever the sinner's cry, and the cry of the doubting Christian. Appreciate, receive, rest on what God has done, for "this is the work of God, that ye believe on Him whom He hath sent." (John 6:29.) What, then, have we nothing to do? Yes, again and again we are taught to "keep His commandments."

As the Passover is a type of salvation, and Pentecost of consecration and sanctification, so the feast of tabernacles is

A Type of God's Indwelling.

The first fruits have been offered by a reconciled people and accepted by God, who is well pleas- ed, the harvest has been gathered, the fruits of the earth are garnered; it is time to rest. It calls us to look forward to the fulfilment of the prophecy, "Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and He will dwell with them, and they shall be His people, and God Himself shall be with them and be their God. And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain; for the former things are passed away." (Rev. 21:3, 4.) But this is future, and God wills even now to dwell in man: "I will dwell in them and walk in them." (II Cor. 6:16.) "He that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him." (I John 4:16.) "I in them and Thou in Me that they may be made perfect in One, that the world may believe that Thou has sent Me." (John 17:23.)

On the very first day of the seventh month, ten days before the day of atonement, the people were to have a holy convocation, accom- panied with blowing of trumpets (Num. 29:1); this was peculiar of the feast of tabernacles. Although the solemn day of atonement was to follow, yet they would commence with praise and with joy. There was also a peculiarity in the offerings which celebrated the feast of tabernacles. On the fifteenth day of the seventh month they were to offer thirteen young bul- locks, two rams, and fourteen lambs, for a burnt offering, and each day of the seven days the bullocks were to be decreased by one; on the second day twelve young bullocks; on the third day eleven, and so on, while the two rams and the fourteen lambs were to continue each day the same. The bullock was the highest type of the burnt offering. The bullock was strong to labor and implied a fuller and more complete surrender. But on the seventh day seven bul- locks (the perfect number) were to be offered. Never less than a perfect offering, i. e., our all. On the eighth day, the type of resurrection, but one, the type of the perfect sacrifice of Jesus, which cannot be added to. (Num. 29:12–36.) Each of the burnt offerings must be supple- mented with meat and drink offerings, all min- gled with oil (the Holy Spirit), the wine of the drink offerings poured out, not drunk. These were the portion of the priests.

But besides all these offerings, there was an- other peculiarity of the feast of tabernacles. The people were to bear witness before the world that they were pilgrims and strangers. "Ye shall take for the first day the boughs of goodly trees, branches of palm-trees, and the boughs of thick trees, and willows of the brook; and ye shall rejoice before the Lord your God seven days. . . . Ye shall dwell in booths seven days: that your generations may know that I made the children of Israel to dwell in booths when I brought them out of the land of Egypt; I am the Lord your God." Jesus is coming; our hearts say, come quickly, and we watch for the signs of His appearing. He exhorts us, "Let your loins be girded about, and your lights burning, and ye yourselves like unto men which wait for your Lord." (Luke 12:35, 36.) Not like men who take root on earth, but whose citizenship is in heaven. If we for God's marching orders—whether to another sphere on earth, India, China, Africa, or to some dark village in our own land, or whether away to heaven—our root is not deep in things present. As pilgrims and strangers it is our privilege to live in hourly gratitude for all the comforts and privileges we have, but to be ready to leave them at an hour's notice, if God wills. Oh, how much of sorrow would be spared if we held all we have on earth as subject to be taken away at any time, and, therefore, not to be reckoned on. If we reckon on a certain in- come, it may soon become uncertain; if we count on a situation we are holding, we may soon have to leave it; nothing on earth is sure—but the living God changes not. We may be pilgrims and strangers upon earth, hav- ing no certain dwelling-place, but if we dwell in God we have a house built upon the rock, and no storm or tempest can make it fall.

The feast of tabernacles points us to the mil- lenial glory. When the Lord shall have come and taken away His people, when He permits the great tribulation, with all its attendant horrors, to sweep away "the third part of men" (Rev. 11:15), when the winepress of the wrath of God shall have been trodden after the harvest has been gathered, (Rev. 14:14–20)—then Christ shall reign with His people upon the earth, and there shall be again a yearly observance of the feast of tabernacles. "And it shall come to pass, that every one that is left of all the nations which came against Jerusalem, shall even go up from year to year to worship the King, the Lord of hosts, and to keep the feast of tabernacles. And it shall be that whoso will not come up of all the families of the earth unto Jerusalem to worship the King, the Lord of hosts, even upon them shall be no rain" (Zech.: 14: 16, 17.) Then the feast of tabernacles will have its glori- ous fulfilment; then the Lord will dwell with men and probably visibly appear on earth. And then there will be no longer the distinction be- tween secular and spiritual. In that day shall there be upon the bells of the horses, Holiness Unto the Lord.

And the pots in the Lord's house (the most common things) shall be like bowls before the altars. Yea; every pot in Jerusalem and in Ju- dah shall be holiness unto the Lord of Hosts; and all they that sacrifice shall come and take of them, and settle thereon." Oh, how things will be reversed! Holiness popular! Holiness recognized! Holiness universal! and Christ reigning! Lord, hasten the time. No wonder that then there shall be no more the Canaanite (the trader) in the house of the Lord; no more preaching for the sake of gain.

COMMUNION; OR,
"A LITTLE TALK WITH JESUS."

A LITTLE talk with Jesus—
How it smoothes the rugged road!
How it seems to help me onward,
When I faint beneath my load!
When my heart is crushed with sorrow,
And mine eyes with tears are dim,
There's naught can yield me comfort
Like a little talk with Him.

I tell Him I am weary,
And I fain would be at rest,
That I'm daily, hourly, longing
For a home upon His breast;
And He answers me so sweetly,
In tones of tend'rest love,—
"I am coming soon to take thee
To My happy home above."

Ah, this is what I'm wanting—
His lovely face to see,
And, I'm not afraid to say it,
I know He's wanting me!
He gave His life a ransom
To make me all His own,
And He can't forget His promise
To me, His purchased one.

I know the way is dreary
To yonder far-off clime,
But a little talk with Jesus
Will while away the time;
And yet the more I know Him,
And all His grace explore,
It only sets me longing
To know Him more and more.

I cannot live without Him,
Nor would I if I could:
He is my daily portion,
My medicine and my food.
He's altogether lovely,
None can with him compare—
The chief among ten thousand,
The fairest of the fair.

I often feel impatient,
And mourn His long delay,—
I never can be settled
While He remains away;
But we shall not long be parted,
For I know He'll quickly come,
And we shall dwell together
In that happy, happy home.

So I'll wait a little longer,
Till His appointed time,
And glory in the knowledge
That such a hope is mine.
Then in my Father's dwelling,
Where "many mansions" be,
I'll sweetly talk with Jesus,
And He shall talk with me.

Readers of the CHRISTIAN HERALD have undoubtedly seen the large advertisement of a prominent Soap manufacturing firm which appeared in our July 12 issue. A good many will wonder how any one in this grasping age is willing to give so much for so little money.

"How do you like your bargain" was asked of a well-known lawyer a few days ago.

"Like it? Why, man, how can I help but like it. The laundress says 'Sweet Home' is the best soap she has ever used. Think of it. Enough soap to last a year, toilet soap enough to start a drug store, and presents for the lady of the house, seven children, two servant girls and the hired man;" and he passed down the street whistling "Sweet Home."

It will only cost a cent for a postal card to send your name and address to J. D. Larkin & Co., Buffalo, N. Y. The great bargain box will then be delivered at your door, and if in thirty days, you are not pleased with the goods in every way, you need not feel under any obligation to keep the case, but it will be called for and taken away free of all expense to you.

Christian Work in Mexico.

Through the reading of the Holy Scriptures translated into Spanish some earnest souls in Mexico have, by God's blessing, been led to a clear knowledge of the Gospel. From their numbers able preachers of the Christian faith in its primitive purity have been raised up, around whom congregations have been gathered from among the humble poor, who have been the first to publicly welcome and defend the pure Gospel in Mexico. The members of these congregations, rich in faith, have worked earnestly and bravely for Christ and His truth among their fellow countrymen in that beautiful Southern portion of North America called Mexico. Schools have been established by them, in which large numbers of bright boys and girls have received a good secular education and have been carefully taught the Christian faith. From the children thus educated faithful Christian workers have been raised up. A Mexican Branch of the Church of Christ, that maintains the faith in its purity and integrity, has been organized among these native Christians in the Republic of Mexico. The members of this Mexican Church of Christ, though gathered mostly from among the poor, are yet doing a most important Christian work. To continue that work, we need to pay a few leading workers small monthly salaries, and also to defray some current expenses. To raise the needed funds we have formed a society with an office at 43 Bible House, New York, U. S., and should be pleased to have many of our fellow Christians join this society by becoming regular contributors to its treasury. We are trying to secure monthly or quarterly contributions to meet the regular monthly expenses of the work. In order to continue and extend the work, we wish to raise four hundred dollars a month, by endeavoring to have four hundred persons each give on an average one dollar every month to this object, leaving the donors to give less or more as they may be able and willing.

We earnestly invite all who will, to join us in this systematic effort in behalf of the cause of Christ in Mexico, by becoming monthly subscribers to this fund. We have already regular subscribers whose gifts amount monthly to over eighty dollars, and a growing circle of friends who are forwarding us occasional donations.

This Mexican Church of Christ is a very effective instrumentality through which to do Christian work among the many millions on this Western Hemisphere who speak the Spanish language, comparatively few of whom have ever had a Bible in their hands. A beautiful church building has been secured in the City of Mexico as the centre of the activities of this Mexican Church of Christ. Through the workers connected with that centre more than forty congregations have been gathered from among the poor in different parts of the Republic of Mexico. We have some faithful and able preachers now in the field, but more young men need to be trained for the ministry. Multitudes of Protestant children in Mexico, some of them orphans, need to be educated. We make three requests of you, Christian reader: first, that you will, if possible, become a monthly or quarterly subscriber in behalf of this Christian work; second, that you will try and induce your friends also to contribute to it; third, that you will remember this precious work in Mexico in your prayers.

We most sincerely thank all who are already generously contributing to this Christian work for their timely and generous gifts, and we earnestly invite many others, to unite with us in aiding it by also becoming monthly subscribers in its behalf. Those who may not feel that they can give as much as a dollar a month are earnestly asked to give what they can, whenever they are able—EVERY LITTLE HELPS. Fellow Christian, if you will generously consent to contribute a dollar a month or more or less to the work, will you kindly inform me of the fact? Contributions either large or small can be mailed directly to my address as follows:

NIECE'S
India Ink Portraits.

Portraiture in India Ink is certainly the most beautiful process of producing the human face in monochrome.—Black and white as more commonly termed.

The skill, artistic taste and care required to produce India Ink Portraits have prevented them from becoming more widely known, and their beauties have only been enjoyed by the wealthier classes of our large cities.

We have recently perfected an ingenious process whereby we secure the most beautiful effects with India Ink with much less labor than heretofore.

Resplendant in rich shadows full of detail, cool gray half tints, and pure, silvery lights, they possess such a beautiful life-like appearance that to introduce color in them would seem superfluous.

Avoiding the two outrageous extremes so commonly practised, viz., deceptive cheapness and fancy high prices, we give our customers the finest results, at very moderate prices.

Our special feature in India Ink is a Life Size Portrait framed in a Carved Oak Frame, steel lining and white Torchon Mat, or Florentine Bronze Frame and Torchon Mat, boxed complete for $20.00.

One-half the amount must accompany order when goods are to be sent C.O.D.

DR. DONALD FRASER.

The portraits and lives of four of the prominent speakers at the recent Pan-Presbyterian Conference, which appeared in this journal on August 2, are this week supplemented by five of their brethren of the Free Church, whose standing among Presbyterians, and whose work in the cause of Christian religion at large, demand and receive world-wide recognition. In the first of the five, Dr. Donald Fraser, America has a kind of proprietary interest, as he received his early scholastic and theological training at Knox College, Toronto, and was for nine years a popular preacher in Montreal.

Dr. Fraser is a native of Scotland, and is sixty-two years of age, having been born at Inverness in 1826. His father having settled in the Dominion, the future preacher received, as we have said, his early training in Toronto. He was licensed to preach in 1851, when he accepted a call from Cote Street Church, Montreal, where he was ordained. Throwing himself with characteristic energy and whole-heartedness into his pastoral work, he soon became widely known as an efficient and influential preacher and platform speaker.

In 1860 an urgent call from the Free Church in Aberdeen, Scotland, reached him, which special circumstances led him to accept. He labored there for eleven years with signal and growing success, entering with ardor into the revival work which at the time was stirring all Scotland. He often preached to thousands of attentive hearers in the open air, and was instrumental in leading many of them to the acceptance of Christ. The congregation under his more especial care greatly increased and prospered; the church building was enlarged, and a much-needed Mission Church was erected through his untiring exertions.

In 1870 he was honored by a call from London, and became pastor of the Marylebone Presbyterian Congregation, as successor to Dr. William Chalmers. There the most affluent of blessings has rested upon him and his fervid ministry. From the first the capacious church was crowded in every part, and it had to be rebuilt on a considerably larger scale. At present it is the largest church building in England connected with the Presbyterian Church, and has the largest congregation and membership. In addition to his pastorial work, Dr. Fraser is one of the Hon. Secretaries of the Evangelical Alliance, and is a vice-president of the British and Foreign Bible Society.

Dr. Fraser is a voluminous author. He has written many articles in reviews and magazines, and several books. His chief work, however, is entitled "Synoptical Lectures on the Books of Holy Scripture," in two volumes. This work is now in its fourth edition, and is well known and highly prized in America as well as in England. With this may be mentioned "Metaphors in the Gospels," and "Speeches of the Holy Apostles." Dr. Fraser rejoices to be of the number of those who are looking for the Speedy Personal Pre-millennial Coming of Christ.

REV. PRINCIPAL BROWN.

The Principal of the Free Church College, Aberdeen, Dr. David Brown, was born in that city in 1803, and has, therefore, now attained the venerable age of eighty-five years. His father was twice chief magistrate of the city, and the family was one of much influence in the locality. David received a very careful educational and religious training at home, and was then sent for the usual course of literary study to the local grammar school, proceeding thence, in due course, to the University, where he took his Master of Arts degree in 1821.

He was designated for the ministry, and his own inclination harmonizing with the wishes of his parents and friends, he began the prescribed course of Divinity. Unhappily, however, through the too eager study of German rationalistic theology, and too close association with a learned sceptical friend, his views of Bible truth became so unsettled that he seriously contemplated abandoning his intention of entering the Christian ministry. His life, for some months, was unhappy, and his future prospects uncertain. At length he went to Edinburgh, where he remained for six months, during which time his doubts were removed, and he returned to Aberdeen to resume his studies. His sceptical friend also overcame his doubts, and was afterwards known to the world as Rev. Dr. Duncan, Professor of Oriental languages, New College, Edinburgh.

Mr. Brown was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of the Church of Scotland in 1826, but continued a course of private study till 1830, when he became assistant to the Rev. Edward Irving, and remained in this capacity for two years. He then became colleague of the parish minister of Dumbarton, whence in 1835 he removed to a small rural charge in Banffshire, and in this place he was ordained in 1836.

The disruption of the Church of Scotland, which occurred in 1843, severed the relation of Mr. Brown with his church, for he threw in his lot with his brethren who felt it their duty to quit their manses and establish the Free Church. At the close of the year he was appointed minister of Free St. James's, Glasgow, and it was while he was in this sphere of labor that he wrote his book on the Second Advent of Christ. In 1857 he was appointed Professor of Divinity in the Free Church College, Aberdeen, and in 1876, he became Principal of his college. In 1885 he was unanimously elected Moderator of the General Assembly, a position which he most efficiently filled; and in 1886 he resigned his Professor's chair, after thirty years of honorable and arduous service; but he still retains the office of Principal much to the satisfaction of the Church of which he is so distinguished a representative. His "Commentary on the Gospels" has had a large circulation, not only in Great Britain, but also in the Colonies and the United States. Dr. Brown was one of the courageous and learned men who undertook the work of revising the New Testament in 1870. In common with his fellow laborers in that work he labored earnestly and conscientiously to give the Church a correct and reliable translation of the Word of God, and has received, instead of the gratitude to which he was entitled, the obloquy of men whose prejudices are greater than their regard for truth and accuracy.

DR. H. SINCLAIR PATERSON.

The most active and valiant champion of Rev. C. H. Spurgeon in that minister's recent trouble with his brethren in the Baptist Union was Dr. Hugh Sinclair Paterson, who frequently preaches for the famous pastor in the Metropolitan Tabernacle, when illness renders Mr. Spurgeon unable to occupy his usual place. Dr. Paterson wields a powerful pen, and has no mercy for any preacher who does not hold by the orthodox creed. He also is a Scotchman. He was born at Campbelltown, Argyllshire, in 1832, and is consequently fifty-six years of age. He received his early education at the Grammar School of his native place, and so marked was his success, the result of patient, untiring industry, that when he was only twelve years old, he received the gold medal for classics and mathematics from the Duke of Argyll. Thence he proceeded to the University of Glasgow, passed through the usual curriculum for five sessions, and won for himself a position of considerable distinction, gaining, before he was twenty-one, the second place for the Blackstone Gold Medal, a prize most eagerly desired by the students.

When his literary course was ended, he underwent a theological course at Edinburgh for four years. In 1849, with the intention of becoming a foreign medical missionary, he studied medicine for five years, and took his M. D. degree. But suffering from rheumatic fever, which he has had no fewer than five times in his life, he was unwillingly compelled to abandon the prospect of foreign mission-work, and, entering the Free Presbyterian Church, he was ordained in 1854, as minister of Free St. Mark's, Glasgow. His success there was remarkable, especially among the intelligent artisans.

At the time of the Moody and Sankey revival movement in Scotland, he labored so strenuously that his health failed, and a change of sphere was strongly recommended. By a coincidence, a call came to him at that time from a Free church in London, which he accepted, and he has since labored successfully in the British metropolis. Dr. Paterson has published several valuable works, some in exposition and some in defence of orthodoxy; and also some excellent lectures delivered to the London Young Men's Christian Association, entitled "Studies in Life." "I like," he said, on one occasion, when speaking of his own work, "to have a definite subject before my mind, and endeavor to get the exact sense of the Scripture, and to found on that such lessons as may be most suitable. I have always been accustomed to do this. When in Glasgow, I had many engineers among my people, and that mode of preaching was relished by them." Dr. Paterson's language is precise and clear; there is no straining after rhetorical effect; he is almost conversational in style, yet can be very emphatic on occasions, when he considers emphasis to be necessary. His point is to aim at a clear, instructive "talk," as he himself expresses it, and to teach and suggest thought, rather than to amuse his hearers.

PRINCIPAL CAIRNS.

To Christian readers in the United States the venerable scholar whose portrait accompanies that of his Free Church brethren on the first page is best known through his famous work on "Unbelief in the Eighteenth Century," published by Messrs. Harper and Brothers, New York. To his own countrymen, however, Principal Cairns is held in quite as high honor as a preacher. He is a native of Berwickshire, where he was born in 1820, so that he is now sixty-eight years old. He was little more than a boy when he became a student at Edinburgh University, but speedily made his mark there, far out-distancing all his competitors of a similar age. Metaphysics had a peculiar fascination for him, the result in great measure of the lectures of Sir William Hamilton, who then occupied the chair of Logic and Metaphysics. Young Cairns gained the highest place in the class, and, what he esteemed of greater value, the cordial personal friendship of the gifted Professor himself. An anecdote is related of how, after his conversion to Christ, the former student wrote Sir William a tender and respectful, yet courteous letter about his soul's welfare. He never received an answer; but after the brilliant teacher's death, the letter was found most scrupulously preserved among his private papers.

Vacation times were always eagerly anticipated by young Cairns with delight, and employed to the utmost advantage. "They gave him time," he said, "to grow both mentally and spiritually." Book in hand, and wrapped in a plaid, he would go among the sheep on the hills of his native district, and as he wandered to and fro, would read and think and pray. It was an excellent preparation for the work of his life for which his Heavenly Father had designed him.

Having completed his theological curriculum in 1843–44 in the United Secession Hall with marked distinction, he spent nearly a year in Germany, for the purpose of equipping himself yet more thoroughly to become an expounder and teacher of the truths of Holy Scripture. His fixed ambition now was to enter the ministry. His ordination took place on August 6, 1845, when he was appointed minister of the United Secession Congregation, Golden Square, Berwick-on-Tweed. Signs of prosperity were soon apparent. A heavy outstanding debt on the church was cleared off, and the rapidly increasing numbers attending Mr. Cairns's ministry made it necessary to erect a much larger structure, and this, too, when it was completed, was also regularly filled to its utmost capacity.

The minister's reputation became so brilliant that it seemed a wrong to the church that he should be preaching in so obscure a corner of the country, and the calls he received to other spheres of labor were so many, that it was recognized as a kind of joke in a vacant congregation that Mr. Cairns should be called first. But he turned a deaf ear to all such invitations, happy in having won the love and attention of his people, which he retained to the end. In 1867, however, a call came to him which he recognized as imperative, but in accepting it he resolved on cleaving to his church, and so doing double duty. He was appointed Professor of Apologetics in the Theological Hall of the United Presbyterian Church. For some years he combined pulpit and educational work, but in 1876 he was finally driven by the double burden to choose the one of most value to the church at large, and he resigned his pastorate. In 1879 he became principal of his college.

DR. J. THAIN DAVIDSON.

THE name of "the Young Men's Bishop" has been won by the eminent preacher, lecturer, and author, whose portrait is fifth of the group on the first page. He believes in young men, because a young man converted and set to work is the most valuable acquisition he can lay at the feet of his Master. Dr. Davidson has won many such trophies, not only by his preaching in his own land, but by his books in this country and Canada. (Messrs. A. C. Armstrong & Co., of New York, are his publishers on this side of the Atlantic.) His "Talks with Young Men," "Forewarned—Forearmed," and "The City Youth," are the best books a father can put into the hands of his son, and they have been abundantly blessed.

Dr. Davidson is fifty-eight years of age. He was born in 1833, in the manse of a Presbyterian minister near Dundee, but when the boy was ten years old, he was initiated into a life of faith by his father quitting pulpit and home for conscience sake. The lad gave early indications of piety and ministerial capacity; he was therefore prepared for college, and sent to Edinburgh University. His first charge was as assistant pastor at Free St. Mary's, in Edinburgh, and his next, at Maryton, in Forfarshire. His next charge was at Salford, Manchester, where he remained for three years, and then he accepted, in 1863, a call to a church at Colebrook Row, Islington, the northern district of London, where he still continues. In 1872 Dr. Thain Davidson was elected Moderator of the English Synod, the highest official position in the Presbyterian Church.

Islington is a sphere of Christian service that might satisfy the most ambitious and energetic of men, especially if he is an enthusiastic and patriotic Scotchman. It has often been described as a little Scotland, from the fact that so many of the young Northerners, who come in considerable numbers to push their fortunes in London, reside within its borders. With a quick and sympathetic eye to the situation and its exceptional opportunities, the pastor of the Colebrook Church laid himself out to catch this very class of the Islington community, and his success has been phenomenal. He commenced a series of Sunday afternoon services for young men in a large hall, which have been continued with the most blessed results for over twenty years. Dr. Davidson has been assisted in this work by preachers of all denominations, including bishops of the Protestant-Episcopal Church and Christian laymen.

In company with Rev. Newman Hall, Dr. Monro Gibson, the late Rev. William Fraser, of Brighton, and other clerical brethren, Dr. Davidson paid a three months' visit to Egypt and Palestine in 1886. He found much stimulus and benefit from the interesting journey, and doubtless his congregation has reaped the fruits of his observation. Having devoted considerable attention to the study of popular science, he has given in his own church and in other places a series of astronomical discourses, which have been much appreciated by young men.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A Nail in a Sure Place.—The Rev. William Ross observed: "A ship which for many years had done useful service, at last became old and rotten. In this condition it was painted up and made to look good and strong, and sent to sea for the last time. When about half of its voyage was accomplished she sprang a leak. The leak was found, and they proceeded to nail planks on to the leaking part; but such was the state of her timbers, that whenever a nail was driven in she seemed to spring a fresh leak. Under such circumstances work was hopeless, and nothing could save the ship. But the Bible says that the words of God are like nails in a sure place; where they are put in they hold; if we nail ourselves to Christ with a text of Scripture, with one of His blessed promises, then we are safe: the nails of God hold fast."

An Aged Pilgrim's Victory.—A Christian worker related: "A minister was visiting an aged man who for many years had been stricken with paralysis, and was now approaching the river of death. The minister wanted to know how he felt in prospect of the grim change which was imminent, and asked the aged pilgrim if he were at all afraid. The invalid could not speak, so the minister handed him a pencil and a piece of paper. With trembling hand the old man attempted to write, but failed. A second attempt only produced a few illegible scratches. Then a sudden gleam of light overspread his dying features, as for a third time seizing the pencil he began painfully to print in Roman characters the one word, 'Victory.' 'Ah,' said the minister, 'I know the text you mean, "Thanks be unto God, who giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ."' The dying man smiled, and nodded his head. He was meeting death, thanking God for the victory He had given him over self, the flesh, the devil, and even death itself."

A Flag for Christ.—A Few Years ago a Converted Sikh lay dying at Amritsar, in the Punjaub, India. Before he passed triumphantly into the glory he expressed his desire to put up a flag for Christ, and left some money for the purpose. To-day a flag waves in the breeze above the houses of that city, bearing simply the words, "For Christ," in bold letters on a scarlet ground. "That bright flag seemed to us," says a missionary, "a monument of the grace and mercy of God, who could transform an idolater into a saint: and also a glad prophecy of the future when all nations shall own the sovereignty of our coming King. Below in the city the Hindoos bow before their idols; the Mohammedans perform their religious rites, not acknowledging the Saviour, and in ignorance of His love; and within a short distance the Golden Temple of the Sikhs shines and glitters in the sunlight. But still the flag floats calmly above it all, a reminder of the glorious fact that Christ shall reign and all His enemies be put beneath His feet."

An Infidel Don Juan Saved.—Mrs. Emily Lopez Rodriguez relates: "The recent conversion of Don Juan Salvador Borras has given us great joy. Having lost his parents when young, he was placed by his guardian as a boarder in the Royal Academy in Madrid, where he studied as a civil engineer. Like many other students he had imbibed infidel views, and was utterly indifferent on religious subjects. Don Juan, on seeing the reality of the Lord's work here, had his infidelity shaken, but when personally appealed to about his soul's salvation he would invariably put the subject off, urging that he had never consciously injured anyone nor done anything particularly wrong. One Sunday last month the pastor preached a very earnest sermon on the words, 'You must be born again.' At the close we had personal conversation with Don Juan on the subject, but still there was no conviction of sin. The following day we wrote out some texts for him under the heads of 'What is sin?' 'The sinner and the Saviour!' with earnest prayer for blessing. The Word proved 'quick and powerful,' for soon after Don Juan came to tell us the joyful news that 'Those texts have taken away the veil from before my eyes.' In earnest but broken prayer he accepted Christ as his Saviour, and dedicated his life to His service. He is very anxious, and so are we, for the conversion of his young wife, Dona Rosa. The influence of a Christian home in this country is of great importance."

A "Poor Lost Lassie" Found.—Mr. W. B. Dunn related: "Some time ago I was speaking in Edinburgh, and in the course of my remarks I said that the Saviour who saved me could save any sinner within reach of my voice if he would but come to Him. At the close of the address, as I was walking through the audience, a fine-looking young woman seated at the end of one of the pews, touched me on the shoulder, and asked if I could speak with her for a moment. I replied 'Yes,' and when we had moved a little aside she said, 'Towards the end of your address you said that Christ could save from the very brink of hell, and I wish to know if it be strictly true?' 'Yes,' I answered, "He is able to save to the uttermost."' Then with eyes overflowing she told me her sad story. She had left her home in Glasgow, and had gone to Edinburgh, where she had plunged into sin. With a heart full of sorrow for the lost one, I sat down by her side, and pointed her to Jesus, the friend of sinners, and soon I had the joy of seeing her, like Mary of old, sitting at the feet of her Saviour, and committing herself to His keeping. On the following night she was again at our meeting, and when I spoke to her, she said, 'You are from Glasgow, Mr. Dunn; when you go back will you call upon my father and mother, and tell them that God has found and saved their poor lost lassie?" Yes, thank God, He saves the lost. He is the Saviour we need."

Wonderful Deliverances.—A Sailor Said: "If ever a man had reason to thank God for frequent deliverances from imminent danger, I am that man, though even these repeated perils and warnings did not bring me to Christ. While in India, working on a railway line, I was caught between two trucks and almost smashed to death. I was taken to the hospital, and for three days was insensible. However, I recovered, and my first request was for brandy. This the doctor absolutely refused, saying it would kill me, but after he left the hospital the chief gave me brandy until my brain was aflame. For days I again lay unconscious, and when I did come to myself I could not bear to be alone with my thoughts. God was awakening my conscience and calling me to Him, but still I would not come. When I was able I left the place and became a sailor on board a steamboat. One day I was sent aloft to scrape the mast, and when shifting from one part to the other, I missed my hold, and fell into the Pacific. For some cause there was great delay in bringing the ship to, and then they seemed to think that they had steamed too far from the spot to do any good, and calmly pursued their voyage, leaving me to the mercy of the waters. I paddled to keep myself afloat for a time, when my hand struck a plank that had been thrown overboard. To this I clung, with the despair of a drowning man to his only hope of rescue, for two days. The third morning rose, and cold and weary I was almost tempted to let go. I saw the sun overhead, I saw it as it neared the horizon, then all was blank. The next thing I knew was my hands being chafed by some good-hearted sailors. So God in His mercy had again rescued me, yet even then I did not thank God as I ought. The vessel came into port and I went ashore. I heard singing at the corner of a street there; God arrested me, and I left that place trusting in Christ and a saved man."

QUEER CHRISTIANS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached near Atlanta, Ga., last Sunday Morning, August 12, 1888.

"Is the elder son of the parable so unsympathetic and so cold that he is not worthy of recognition? The fact is that we ministers pursue the younger son. You can hear the flapping of his rags in many a sermonic breeze, and the cranching of the pods for which he was an unsuccessful contestant. I confess that for a long time I was unable to train the camera obscura upon the elder son of the parable. I never could get a negative for a photograph. There was not enough light in the gallery, or the chemicals were poor, or the sitter moved in the picture. But now I think I have him. Not a side-face, or a three-quarters, or the mere bust, but as he appears to me. The father in the parable of the prodigal had nothing to brag of in his two sons. The one was a rake, and the other a churl. I find nothing admirable in the dissoluteness of the one, and I find nothing attractive in the acrid sobriety of the other. The one goes down over the larboard side, and the other goes down over the starboard side; but they both go down.

From the window of the old homestead bursts the minstrelsy. The floor quakes with the feet of the rustics, whose dance is always vigorous and resounding. The neighbors have heard of the return of the younger son from his wanderings, and they have gathered together. The house is full of congratulators. I suppose the tables are loaded with luxuries. Not only the one kind of meat mentioned, but its concomitants. "Clap!" go the cymbals, "thrum!" go the harps, "click!" go the chalices, up and down go the feet inside, while outside is a most sorry spectacle. The senior son stands at the corner of the house,

A Frigid Phlegmatic.

He has just come in from the fields in very substantial apparel. Seeing some wild exhilarations around the old mansion, he asks of a servant passing by with a goatskin of wine on his shoulder what all the fuss is about. One would have thought that, on hearing that his younger brother had got back, he would have gone into the house and rejoiced, and if he were not conscientiously opposed to dancing, that he would have joined in the Oriental schottische. No. There he stands. His brow lowers. His lip curls with contempt. He stamps the ground with indignation. He sees nothing at all to attract. The odors of the feast coming out on the air do not sharpen his appetite. The lively music does not put any spring into his step. He is in a terrible pout. He criticises the expense, the injustice, and the morals of the entertainment.

The father rushes out bareheaded, and coaxes him to come in. He will not go in. He scolds the father. He goes into a pasquinade against the younger brother, and he makes the most uncomely scene. He says, "Father, you put a premium on vagabondism. I stayed at home and worked on the farm. You never made a party for me; you didn't so much as kill a kid; that wouldn't have cost half as much as a calf; but the scapegrace went off in fine clothes, and he comes back not fit to be seen, and what a time you make over him! He breaks your heart, and you pay him for it. That calf to which we have been giving extra feed during all these weeks wouldn't be so fat and sleek if I had known to what use you were going to put it! That vagabond deserves to be cowhided instead of banqueted. Veal is too good for him!" That evening, while the younger son sat telling his father about his adventures, and asking about what had occurred on the place since his departure, the senior brother goes to bed disgusted, and slams the door after him.

That Senior Brother Still Lives.

You can see him any Sunday, any day of the week. At a meeting of ministers in Germany some one asked the question, "Who is that elder son?" and Krummacher answered, "I know him; I saw him yesterday." And when they insisted upon knowing whom he meant, he said, "Myself; when I saw the account of the conversion of a most obnoxious man, I was irritated."

First, this senior brother of the text stands for the self-congratulatory, self-satisfied, self-worshipful man. With the same breath in which he vituperates against his younger brother he utters a panegyric for himself. The self-righteous man of my text, like every other self-righteous man, was full of faults. He was an ingrate, for he did not appreciate the home blessings which he had all those years. He was disobedient, for when the father told him to come in he stayed out. He was a liar, for he said that the recreant son had devoured his father's living, when the father, so far from being reduced to penury, had a homestead left, had instruments of music, had jewels, had a mansion, and instead of being a pauper, was a prince. This senior brother, with so many faults of his own, was merciless in his criticism of the younger brother.

The Only Perfect People

that I have ever known were utterly obnoxious. I was never so badly cheaten in all my life as by a perfect man. He got so far up in his devotions that he was clear up above all the rules of common honesty. These men that go about prowling among prayer-meetings, and in places of business, telling how good they are—look out for them; keep your hand on your pocket-book! I have noticed that just in proportion as a man gets good he gets humble. The deep Mississippi does not make as much noise as a brawling mountain rivulet. There has been many a store that had more goods in the show-window than inside on the shelves.

This self-righteous man of the text stood at the corner of the house hugging himself in admiration. We hear a great deal in our day about the higher life. Now, there are two kinds of higher-life men. The one are admirable, and the other are most repulsive. The one kind of higher-life man is very lenient in his criticism of others, does not bore prayer-meetings to death with long harangues, does not talk a great deal about himself, but much about Christ and heaven, gets kindlier and more gentle and more useful, until one day his soul spreads a wing, and he flies away to eternal rest, and everybody mourns his departure. The other higher-life man goes around with a Bible conspicuously under his arm, goes from church to church, a sort of general evangelist, is to his own pastor when he is at home, and a nuisance to other pastors when he is away from home; runs up to some man who is counting out a roll of bank-bills, or running up a difficult line of figures, and asks him how his soul is; makes religion a dose of ipecacuanha; standing in a religious meeting making an address, he has a patronizing way, as though ordinary Christians were clear away down below him, so he had to talk at the top of his voice in order to make them hear, but at the same time encouraging them to hope on, that by climbing many years they may after a while come up within sight of the place where he now stands! I tell you plainly that a roaring, roystering, bouncing sinner is not so repulsive to me as that higher-life malformation. The former may repent; the latter never gets over his pharisaism. The younger brother of the parable came back, but the senior brother stands outside entirely oblivious of his own delinquencies and deficits, pronouncing his own eulogium. Oh, how much easier it is to blame others than to blame ourselves! Adam blamed Eve, Eve blamed the serpent, the serpent blamed the devil, the senior brother blamed the younger brother, and none of them blamed themselves.

Incredulous Christians.

Again, the senior brother of my text stands for all those who are faithless about the reformation of the dissipated and the dissolute. In the very tones of his voice you can hear the fact that he has no faith that the reformation of the younger son is genuine. His entire manner seems to say, "That boy has come back for more money. He got a third of the property; now he has come back for another third. He will never be contented to stay on the farm. He will fall away. I would go in too and rejoice with the others if I thought this thing was genuine, but it is a sham. That boy is a confirmed inebriate and debauchee." Alas! my friends, for the incredulity in the Church of Christ in regard to the reclamation of the recreant. You say a man has been a strong drinker. I say, "Yes, but he has reformed." "Oh," you say, with a lugubrious face, "I hope you are not mistaken, I hope you are not mistaken." You say, "Don't rejoice too much over his conversion, for soon he will be unconverted, I fear. Don't make too big a party for that returned prodigal, or strike the timbrel too loud; and if you kill a calf, kill the one that is on the common, and not the one that has been luxuriating in the paddock." That is the reason to their father's house. It is the rank infidelity in the church of God on this subject. There is not a house on the streets of heaven that has not in it a prodigal that has returned and stayed home. There could be unrolled before you a scroll of a hundred thousand names—the names of prodigals who came back, for ever reformed. Who was John Bunyan? A returned prodigal. Who was Richard Baxter? A returned prodigal. Who was George Whitefield, the thunderer? A returned prodigal. And I could go out in all directions in this audience and find on either side those who, once far astray for many years, have been faithful, and their eternal salvation is as sure as though they had been ten years in heaven. And yet, some of you have not enough faith in their return.

Why More Prodigals Do Not Come Home

You do not know how to shake hands with a prodigal. You do not know how to pray for him. You do not know how to greet him. He want to sail in the warm gulf-stream of Christian sympathy. You are and shivers. You say he has been a prodigal, I know it. But you are the sour, unresponsive, censorious, saturnine, cranky, elder brother, as if you are going to heaven one would think some people would be tempted to go to perdition to get away from you. The hunters say that if a deer be shot the other deer shove him out of their company, and the general rule is away with the man who has been wounded with sin. Now, I say, the more bones a man has broken the more need he has of a hospital, and that the more a man has been bruised and cut with sin, the more need he has to be carried into human and divine sympathy. But for some men there is not much room in this world—for men who want to come back after wandering. Plenty of room for elegant sinners, sinners in velvet and satin and lace, for sinners high-salaried, for kid-gloved and patent leather sinners, for sinners fixed up by hair-dresser, pomatum and lavendered and cologned and frizzled and crimped and "banged" sinners—plenty of room. Such we meet elegantly at the door of our churches, and we invite them into the best seat with Chesterfieldian gallantries; we usher them into the house of God, and put soft ottomans under their feet, and put a gilt-edged prayer-book in their hand, and pass the contribution box before them with an air of apology, when they, the generous souls! take out the exqui-portemonnaie, and open it, and with diamonded-finger push down beyond the ten-dollar gold pieces and delicately pick out as an expression of gratitude their offering to the Lord of one cent. For such sinners, plenty of room, plenty of room. But for until his coat is threadbare and his face is erysipelased, and his wife's wedding-dress is in the pawnbroker's shop, and his children, instead of being in school, are out begging broken bread at the basement-doors of the city—the man, body, mind, and soul on fire with the flames that have leaped from the scathing, scorching, blasting, consuming cup which the drunkard takes. trembling, and agonized, and affrighted, and presses to his parched lip, and his cracked tongue, and his shrieking yet immortal spirit—no room.

Oh, if this younger son of the parable had not gone so far off, if he had not dropped so low in wassail, the protest would not have been so severe; but going clear over the precipice as the younger son did, the elder son is angry and will not go in.

Oh, be not so hard in your criticism of the fallen, lest thou thyself also be tempted. A stranger, one Sunday, staggered up and down the aisles of my church, until the service had to stop, until he was taken from the room. He was a minister of the Gospel of Jesus Christ of a sister denomination. That man had preached the Gospel, that man had broken the bread of the Holy Communion for the people. From what a height to what a depth! Oh, I was glad there was no smiling in the room when that man was taken out, his poor wife following him with his hat in her hand and his coat on her arm. It was as solemn to me as two funerals—the funeral of the body and the funeral of the soul. Beware, lest thou also be tempted.

Disturbing the Service,

An invalid went to South America for his health, and one day sat sunning himself on the beach, when he saw something crawling up the beach, wriggling towards him, and he was affrighted. He thought it was a wild beast, or reptile, and he took his pistol from his pocket. Then he saw it was not a wild beast. It was a man, an immortal man, a man made in God's own image; and the poor wretch crawled up to the feet of the invalid and asked for strong drink, and the invalid took his wine flask from his pocket and gave the poor wretch something to drink, and then under the stimulus he rose and gave his history. He had been

A Merchant in Glasgow,

Scotland. He had gone down under the power of strong drink until he was so reduced in poverty, that he was lying in a boat just off the beach. "Why," said the invalid, "I knew a merchant in Glasgow once," a merchant by such and such a name, and the poor wretch straightened up and said, "I am that man." "Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall."

Again, I remark that the senior brother of my text stands for the spirit of envy and jealousy. The senior brother thought that all the honor they did to the returned brother was a wrong to him. He said, "I have stayed at home, and ought to have had the ring, and I ought to have had the banquet, and I ought to have had garlands." Alas, for this spirit of envy and jealousy coming down through the ages! Cain and Abel, Esau and Jacob, Saul and David, Haman and Mordecai, Othello and Iago, Orlando and Angelica, Caligula and Torquatus, Cæsar and Pompey, Columbus and the Spanish courtiers, Cambyses, and the brother he slew because he was a better marksman, Dionysius and Philoxenius, whom he slew because he was a better singer. Jealousy among painters: Closterman and Geoffrey Kneller, Hudson and Reynolds. Francis, anxious to see a picture of Rafael, Raphael sends him a picture. Francis, seeing it, falls in a fit of jealousy, from which he never recovers. Jealousy among authors: How seldom do contemporaries speak of each other. Xenophon and Plato, living at the same time; but from their writings you never would suppose they heard of each other.

Religious Jealousies:

The Mahommedans praying for rain during a drought, no rain coming. Then the Christians begin to pray for rain, and the rain comes. Then the Mahommedans met together to account for this; and they resolved that God was so well pleased with their prayers, He kept the drought on, so as to keep them praying; but that the Christians began to pray, and the Lord was so disgusted with their prayers that He sent rain right away, so He would not hear any more of their supplications. Oh, this accursed spirit of envy and jealousy! Let us stamp it out from all our hearts.

A wrestler was so envious of Theogenes, the prince of wrestlers, that he could not be consoled in any way; and after Theogenes died, and a statue was lifted to him in a public place, his envious antagonist went out every night and wrestled with the statue, until one night he threw it, and it fell on him and crushed him to death. So jealousy is not only absurd, but it is killing to the body, and it is killing to the soul. How seldom it is you find one merchant speaking well of a merchant in the same line of business! How seldom it is you hear of a physician speaking well of a physician on the same block! Oh, my friends, the world is large enough for all of us. Let us rejoice at the success of others. The next best thing to owning a garden ourselves, is to look over the fence and admire the flowers. The next best thing to riding in fine equipage, is to stand on the street and admire the prancing span. The next best thing to having a banquet given to ourselves, is having a banquet given to our prodigal brother that has come home to his father's house.

Besides that, if we do not get as much honor and as much attention as others, we ought to congratulate ourselves on what we escape in the way of assault.

The French General,

riding on horseback at the head of his troops, heard a soldier complain and say, "It is very easy for the general to command us forward, while he rides and we walk." Then the general dismounted and compelled the complaining soldier to get on the horse. Coming through a ravine, a bullet from a sharpshooter struck the rider, and he fell dead. Then the general said, "How much safer it is to walk than to ride!"

Once more I have to tell you that this senior brother of my text stands for the pouting Christian. While there is so much congratulation within doors, the hero of my text stands outside, the corners of his mouth drawn down, looking as he felt—miserable. I am glad his lugubrious physiognomy did not spoil the festivity within. How many pouting Christians there are in our day—Christians who do not like the music of our churches, Christians who do not like the hilarities of the young—pouting, pouting, pouting at society, pouting at the fashions, pouting at the newspapers, pouting at the church, pouting at the government, pouting at the high heaven! Their spleen is too large, their liver does not work, their digestion is broken down. There are two cruets in their castor always sure to be well supplied—

Vinegar and Red Pepper!

Oh, come away from that mood. Stir a little saccharine into your disposition. While you avoid the dissoluteness of the younger son, avoid also the irascibility and the petulance, and the pouting spirit of the elder son, and imitate the father, who had embraces for the returning prodigal, and coaxing words for the splenetic malcontent.

Ah! the face of this pouting elder son is put before us in order that we might better see the radiant and forgiving face of the father. Contrasts are mighty. The artist in sketching the field of Waterloo, years after the battle, put a dove in the mouth of the cannon. Raphael, in one of his cartoons, beside the face of a wretch put the face of a happy and innocent child. And so the sour face of this irascible and disgusted elder brother is brought out, in order that in the contrast we may better understand the forgiving and the radiant face of God. That is the meaning of it—that God is ready to take back anybody that is sorry, to take him clear back, to take him back forever, and forever, and forever, to take him back with a loving hug, to put a kiss on his parched lip, a ring on his bloated hand, an easy shoe on his chafed foot, a garland on his bleeding temples, and heaven in his soul. Oh, I fall flat on that mercy! Come, my brother, and let us get down into the dust, resolved never to rise until the Father's forgiving hand shall lift us.

Oh, What a God we Have!

Bring your doxologies. Come, earth and heaven, and join in the worship! Cry aloud! Lift the palm branches! Do you not feel the Father's arm around your neck? Do you not feel the warm breath of your Father against your cheek? Surrender, younger son! Surrender elder son! Surrender, all! Oh, go in to-day and sit down at the banquet. Take a slice of the fatted calf, and afterward, when you are seated, with one hand in the hand of the returned brother, and the other hand in the hand of the rejoicing father, let your heart beat time to the clapping of the cymbal and the mellow voice of the flute. "It is meet that we should make merry, and be glad: for this thy brother was dead, and is alive again; and was lost, and is found."

AN ENCOUNTER WITH A WOLF.

A STARTLING encounter with a wolf occurred in broad daylight during a missionary's journey in southern Russia recently. The Rev. M. Walkenberg, who is laboring among the Jews in that region, set out from Jassy for a town distant about three hours' ride, and located on the river Pruth, which constitutes the boundary between Moldavia and Russian Bessarabia. Accompanying him was a colporteur of the Bible Society, who went in the hope of selling some Christian books in the Hebrew character to the Jews who trade on the frontier. The roads were almost impassable with the unmelted snow, and when the conveyance in which they travelled arrived at the foot of a steep hill, the ascent appeared so difficult that both men alighted to relieve the horses. They toiled up the hill and at the top waited for the vehicle. They could hear the driver below encouraging the horses by his queer cries, and judged that he was about fifty yards below them. As they were waiting and talking they were alarmed by seeing a wolf emerge from the forest and approach them. That they were in some danger was obvious, for reports were in circulation of travellers having been attacked and injured, and in some cases killed, in these very regions by the wolves, whom the unusually severe winter had made bold. They had no weapon but that of "All-prayer," which Bunyan's pilgrim used. That, however, sufficed; for the wolf, after eyeing them hungrily, turned tail and trotted leisurely back to the forest, leaving the two Christian men to thank God for their preservation.

WONDERFUL HEALING IN JAPAN.

A letter from Tokio, Japan, published by Dr. Cullis in his Times of Refreshing, describes one of the most remarkable instances of Divine power, exercised in answer to believing prayer, that has been recorded in modern times. In the course of his letter, the writer, Joseph Cosand, says: "On January 4, a shoemaker in Tokio, who had attended our meetings, brought a deaf and dumb boy, who had been so afflicted from his birth, and asked us to pray for him, that he might receive his hearing, and become able to hear the gospel. We promised to do so, and they went home; but the next night only a young man from the family came back to the meeting. He said the shoemaker had lost his faith, and had returned to his idol worship, and that, though Jesus performed miracles when on earth, He was not here now, and we did not know that He was alive, and it was, therefore, impossible for the boy to be healed.

"Upon hearing this, we felt condemned for not having the boy kneel down with us the night before in the face of the meeting, and publicly ask God to heal him, thereby showing that we had faith in Him. Our feeling of shame was so great that my wife and I, in company with two of our Christians, went to their house at 10 o'clock at night, and asked permission to pray for the boy's healing. The shoemaker at first resisted, but finally consented that he would bring the boy to the meeting the next evening.

"They brought him, according to promise, the next evening, and at the close of the meeting we announced that such a boy was present, and why he had been brought. Then I asked them to bring him forward, where all the Christians could kneel down with him. About ten prayers were then offered, occupying one hour, but he could not hear.

"All were invited to come back the next evening at five o'clock, and pray until six o'clock for him, at which time the usual meeting would begin. This was done, with about as many vocal prayers as before, after which the meeting went on perhaps until 7:30 o'clock, when it was discovered that our prayers were answered, for the deaf and dumb was no longer deaf; he could hear the speaker in the far part of the house from him. It created almost a panic among his relatives and friends. He is not the shoemaker's son, but word had been sent to his parents and they were both present. They went home with him, and at ten o'clock, less than three hours from the time he first heard distinctly, they returned with him to show us that he had begun to lisp the vocal sounds said to him.

"It is now the tenth day since, and he is learning as fast as could be expected. The family gave us their two idols, which we sent to the Association at Philadelphia, where any one can see them. There are many witnesses who can testify to the truth of the above. The Tokio Christian published an account of the healing."

MR. MOODY'S BIBLE CONFERENCE.

The interest manifested in the Conference at Northfield increases day by day. The Rev. J. Hudson Taylor, of the China Island Mission who is taking a prominent part in the meetings, referred in one of his addresses to the work of the college students in China. He said that he had seen them in their labors, and they were filled with the Spirit, and were rejoicing in having left home and friends and fortune for Christ. "There is such a thing as spiritual barter. Paul knew this and counted all things, the good as well as the bad, as loss that he might know Christ. If you would be filled with the Spirit you must be emptied of sin. Let sin out of your hearts and the Spirit of God will come in. Two bodies cannot occupy the same space; no more can the Spirit and sin dwell in the heart at the same time. Let sin out and the Spirit will come in. I find that men's faces brighten when they have made room for Christ."

Evangelist Yatman wished to plead for India, but was so impressed with the need of work among the young men of America that he must place that work first. "Out of every hundred young men, seventy-five never darken a church door. If you wish to see the evidences of sin, go with me to Baltimore. A mother raised a beautiful boy. He became a murderer, not with the knife, but of his mother's heart. She had worried over that boy till she was dying. Her last request was to see her boy. She asked him in her dying breath to give up drink. He promised his mother never to touch another drop, but hell had hold of his appetite, and he went in where his mother lay dead with his liquor and drank damnation to his soul and body. We need to reach our boys. It makes my blood tingle. We want to work for America."

Dr. Chester, of South India, was astonished to find on returning to this country after twenty years' labor in India, that there were people here who thought mission work a failure. The promise "Lo, I am with you alway" was to missionary Christians. Every one should be doing something for the Evangelization of the world. What greater service can we give than ourselves? We should give our dearest objects, our own children, to the cause of Christ. "It grieves me to see parents, from selfish motives, keeping back their children, who are willing to go. Some say there are heathen in this country, but in Dindigal, where I am, it is as if there was one missionary to the whole of Philadelphia. Every church that is able should have a missionary in the field."

Mr. D. L. Moody, in expounding the thirteenth chapter of 1 Corinthians said: "This chapter is the highest peak that Paul ever reached. Without love a man might as well blow a trumpet or sound a tea-bell in his pulpit on Sunday morning. A man may be a good doctor, and not love his patients; a good lawyer, and not love his clients; a good geologist and not love the science; but he cannot be a good Christian without love. Love is greater than prophecy, greater than faith. If a man is unsound in the faith we cut his ecclesiastical head off, but he may be unsound in love or patience, and he was still regarded as a good Christian. What we need is a baptism of love. Love makes gifts acceptable before God. Love will keep a mother up night after night, waiting for her wandering boy. Love does away with that spirit of envy and jealousy which is the greatest obstacle in the Christian life. It is a sign that we are growing in love when Christ becomes larger and we smaller in our own estimation. We are to keep ourselves in the love of God by doing more for him every day."

Among the later arrivals at the Conference are Rev. E. P. Hammond, Father Chiniquy, and Miss Vassilka Stefanora, from Bulgaria.

REV. W. F. RE QUA'S INDIAN WORK.

In a letter from this faith missionary, who is laboring in the Indian territory and whose support hitherto has mainly come from readers of this journal whom God has moved to contribute, he describes the camp-meeting to which we referred in a former number. He praises God that many souls were converted both whites and Indians, some of whom had travelled twenty miles to attend the meeting. Mr. Re Qua goes on to say: "We camped out, of course, but the people were very kind to us in bringing to our tent plenty to eat.

"The chief of the Creek Indians, who is a fine looking, intelligent full-blood Indian, was at the meeting, and urged that we come among his people to hold meetings, and we have arranged after a few days' rest at home, to go and spend two weeks out among the Creeks, about seventy-five miles from here. We shall go by wagon, and then shall go on out west among some other tribes. How we do desire all the dear, kind readers of The Christian Herald to pray that we may see many of the red-faces brought to Jesus! Some have come, but we want so much of the power of the Holy Spirit to arouse their stoical natures, convicting and impelling the people toward Christ, that scores will come to surrender and find pardon. I wish you could have seen my wife in these meetings, speaking and laboring for the people. She says sure we have a work out here, and the Lord has shown her that it is He who has led us hither, and gives us grace to remain and work among them.

"The Indians do love music so much, and can be drawn by it and held by it so well, that I cannot give up asking the Lord to send us a good portable chest organ, and I somehow feel that, as the Lord has so blessedly provided us with a team, wagon, and a harness, that He will send us the organ soon for the mission. Time would fail us to tell how good the Lord has been to us. There are now 114 names on our "Providence memorandum-book," who have contributed toward our Indian mission, and about all of these are subscribers of the "C. H.", for whom we pray that the Lord will abundantly reward and bless them for their kindness, and who have written us that they felt as they learned of our work, that the Lord prompted them to help us prosecute the work. Oh what encouraging words have come to us to hold on; they were praying for us, and they felt the Lord has led us out into this work and He would see us through. This, of course, we have always believed, even when we have passed through trying times, not knowing just how we were coming out for means; but, bless God! when we have gone and asked the Lord to send us means, directly it has come. It's true, we have received nowhere as much as when we were in the pastorate, but the Lord has gloriously provided for our needs.

"I can't tell you how the Lord has touched our hearts to pray for means for Christian Manual Training Orphanage, into which we may gather Indian orphan boys and girls of every tribe into such a home, and fit them to care for themselves in life and some to return to their tribes as teachers and missionaries, and we believe the Lord will yet—if He has not already—touch some man or woman's heart or move more than one perhaps and incline him or her to furnish the means to erect such an orphanage.

"If there are any who would like to send us at once lithograph cuts illustrating Bible lessons we shall be glad of them, and can use them effectually in our work among the Indians. Also as some write us to know how they can remit to us, I would like them to know that drafts, cheques, by express or registered letter we consider safe, and a cheque or draft the traders will cash for us. Four persons who sent us contributions said they did not wish to be known or to receive any receipt, but we should like them to know that we received their money safely, if you would mention it in The Christian Herald. We are setting out again to visit the tribes and hope your readers will pray earnestly for the Holy Spirit to go with us and bless the Word to the people."

A COUNT IN LIVERY.

A titled bell-boy waits on the guests of a Chicago hotel. About two years ago a young man of aristocratic appearance, and speaking English with a foreign accent, applied to the manager of the hotel for employment. As he was urgent and was evidently in extreme poverty, he was taken on as a bell-boy, and was quite willing to accept that office. He was attentive to his duties and polite to the guests, and soon became a favorite in the hotel. He was reticent about his past history, but his distinguished bearing and courtly manners won him the soubriquet of "Count." Recently a clue to his identity was obtained, and as ridiculous reports were circulated about him, the young man told his story. He is the grandson of the Marquis Sainte-Croix, who was some years ago French ambassador at St. Petersburg. He was born in Odessa, and was educated there. His liberal notions led to his affiliation with one of the insurrectionary societies, and he was implicated in a plot which was discovered. The youth made his escape, for he was aware that not even his aristocratic French connection could have saved him from condign punishment had been caught. Besides, his relations were disgusted with him for mixing himself up in seditious plots, and were not disposed to shield him. He, too, had conceived a dislike for monarchy and aristocracy. America attracted him, and he came here to make his fortune. It was not quite so easy as he expected, and he wandered around until his funds were exhausted, unable to obtain employment. It is his intention now to read law as soon as he has saved enough money to support him. Meanwhile the guests at the hotel have the gratification of being waited upon by the scion of an ancient and noble house. It may be hoped that the young man, though he has abjured his titles and cut himself off from his aristocratic family, will be led to aspire to a higher order of nobility, and in becoming a son of the King of kings, have a title to an eternal inheritance. (1 Peter 1 : 3, 4.)

PROPHETIC EVENTS BETWEEN 1889 AND 1901.

"BEHOLD, THE BRIDEGROOM COMETH."

Mr. William Birch's 776th Printed Sunday Sermon, delivered in Free Trade Hall, Manchester, March 18, 1888.

"And at midnight there was a cry made, Behold, the Bridegroom cometh." Matt. 25 : 6.

The Scriptural View of Human Progress—The Events at the End of the Age—The Time Disclosed—The Image of Nebuchadnezzar's Vision—The Setting Up of the Everlasting Kingdom—The Constitution of a Decem Regal Confederacy—The Seven Years' Covenant With the Jews—The Confederacy to Adopt Communism—The Romish Church Persecuting Again—A Kaiser Chosen by Plebiscite.

IT is supposed by many that the world will become better, like a progressive growth, one generation improving on the previous one; but the written word of God does not give us any hope of mankind becoming universally godly before our Lord appears again, nor can we hope for the conversion of the Jews as a people until Christ once more stands on Mount Olivet as the glorious King of kings, but, at the same time, still bearing the marks of the nails in His hands and feet. Scripture chiefly foretells that shall occur in the earth. For one thing, it shows that our Lord Jesus shall come again in the clouds, and draw up to Himself the resurrected bodies of departed saints; secondly, those Christians who are living and watching for Him shall be suddenly changed and also caught up. The number of Christians so changed will only be 144,000 persons; and about five years afterwards, our Lord's angels shall come to remove to heaven the remaining Christians who are left behind, together with new converts, and the faithful ones who meanwhile have died. And then in like manner as He ascended, our Lord Jesus shall descend and stand upon Mount Olivet near Jerusalem, when He will begin the one thousand years of His kingdom on the earth. (Rev. 14 : 4, 15; 19 : 20.)

Does God give us any idea of the time when the End of this Age shall come? He does. May the Holy Spirit open our understanding so that we may see what He means and not be overtaken unawares!

The ancient king Nebuchadnezzar had a vision, which is recorded in Daniel's second chapter, of the Gentile empires of Babylon, Persia, Greece, and Rome, prefigured as a metallic Image of a man, whose head was gold, the breast and arms of silver, the loins brass, the legs iron, and the feet partly of iron and clay. A miraculous stone struck the toes, shattering the entire Image, and the stone then grew bigger until like a mountain it filled the earth. Our Lord Jesus is that Miraculous Stone, who in due time will abolish the present national governments of mankind and establish His personal reign for a thousand years.

The prophet Daniel states that the mean ten kings who are to divide among themselves the original territory of the Roman empire, the whole of which is represented by the two iron legs of the Image, namely, Britain separated from Ireland—and all Europe west of the Rhine and south of the Danube and the Carpathian mountains—and all the north coast of Africa, with Asia Minor, Palestine, and Syria, up to the river Euphrates on the frontiers of Persia.

In Dan. 2 : 44 it is said that "in the days of these ten kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom that shall never be destroyed." It is clear, therefore, that the twenty-three kingdoms now established within the boundaries already named shall be transformed into ten nations. These ten will apparently be, (1) France, (2) Britain, (3) Spain and Portugal united, (4) Italy, (5) Austria, (6) Slavonic States—Roumania, Bulgaria, and Servia, &c.—(7) Greece, (8) Turkey, (9) Syria, and (10) Egypt. As the ten toes are partly clay and partly iron, it shows that the ten nations will be democratic-monarchic; and it is remarkable that the spirit of democracy, that is, the desire for government by the people for the people, through presidents or sovereigns elected by universal suffrage or plebiscites, instead of by hereditary kings and aristocrats, is now spreading on every hand.

Daniel speaks also of the four Gentile empires, already referred to under the forms of wild beasts rising up one after another, namely, a lion, a bear, a four-headed leopard, and a ten-horned wild beast, the latter meaning the territories of Cæsar's Roman empire just the same as the two iron legs of the Image.

Daniel's prophecies show us that the time of the international which are essential in order to change the twenty-three kingdoms into ten, will be between 1888–1891, because the confederacy of ten nations is to be formed by about ten years before the End of this Age, which Daniel shows to be in Passover Week in 1901, at the end of 2345 years from the command to rebuild Jerusalem, in Passover Week, B. C. 445, as stated in Nehemiah 2, and Daniel 8:14; 9:25; 12: 11, 12. Hence between this year 1888 and 1891, France will recover her territory up to the Rhine, and Britain will be drawn into a great European war, and Ireland, taking advantage of the opportunity, will obtain Home Rule, and become practically independent of England. When it is remembered that about one-fourth of the British army consists of Irish Romanists, and that there are many thousands of the same nationality and religion in each of our large towns, it will be seen that if, at a time of European war and bad trade, they join with the socialists and the thousands of discontented, the consequences to Britain may be most disastrous.

As a nation we have forgotten God, and merit His indignation. One among many of our national sins is the widespread disregard of the injunction to "keep holy the Sabbath-day," and the use of it by many as a day of pleasure or business or dissipation, instead of a day for the worship of God. Notice the fashionable dinners and amusements of the rich, and the irreligious pleasures of many of the poor on that sacred day; together with no inconsiderable number of the "cultured classes" looking upon the written word of God as uninspired, and upon the Judgment Day as a superstition. I fear, therefore, that the English people have a dreadful rod in pickle waiting for them, and that bad trade at home and grievous disasters abroad are within measurable distance ahead. Throughout all Europe there is coming a "time of trouble such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time." (Daniel 12 : 1.)

When the allied ten nations have been formed within the territories of the Roman Empire, there will arise, some time near 1892, an eleventh little horn, or

or nature, as monarch over some little State, such as Macedonia for instance, inside the present Turkish Empire. He will then "wax exceeding great toward the South, and toward the East, and toward the pleasant land" (Palestine), and by dint of flatteries climb into power as "King of the North," or Syria, by 1894, (as predicted in Daniel 7 : 24; 8 : 9; 11 : 21, 40). Forthwith he will make a covenant or league for seven years with the Jews—presumably from Passover Week, 1894, to Passover Week, 1901—giving them the right of free worship in Jerusalem, where they will build a temple and offer morning and evening sacrifices as in ancient times, according to Daniel 8 : 14; 9 : 27—probably about November 8, 1894, exactly 2,345 literal days before the Last Day of this Age, which is shown by Daniel's dates to be Thursday, April 11, the last day of Passover Week in 1901.* This Syrian King will then wage three wars against the King of the South (Egypt), and in the second war be hindered by the ships of Kittim; but in about two years and a half after the signing of the covenant with the Jews, he will conquer Egypt; and after heading a red republican revolution in Europe, he will become its Military Dictator, about April, 1897. (Daniel 11 : 25, 29, 40; Rev. 17 : 3, 13)

A Communistic Republic.

At this point of time, which will be about three years after the Jewish covenant, the ten Roman nations will be formed into a red-republican and Roman Catholic confederacy, as stated in Revelation 17 : 3 : "I saw a woman arrayed in scarlet, sit upon a scarlet-colored beast, full of names of blasphemy, having seven heads and ten horns," meaning that the Church of Rome will adopt the doctrines of Communism and Socialism, and will regain her temporal power, and seated upon her seven-hilled city (for the "seven heads are seven mountains," verses 9 and 18), she will inspire the nations of the earth to obey her. Then, as stated in Rev. 17 : 6, she will slay the Christians who refuse to bow down to her, and will boastfully say, "I sit a queen, and am no widow, and shall see no sorrow." (Rev. 18 : 7.) It is obvious that as the scarlet woman is represented as sitting upon the beast with ten horns, namely, the ten nations already enumerated, that she will, by that time, have incorporated with herself the Greek Church and Mahometanism. God's Word calls her the "Mother of harlots and Abominations of the earth" (Rev. 17 : 5); in fact, she will have universal ecclesiastical dominion (Rev. 17 : 1, 15).

The first form of the Ten-kingdomed Confederacy, about 1891, will have been purely monarchical and liberal, but this second or scarlet form in 1897 will be Red-republican and Ultramontane. Then the third form of the confederacy of the ten nations in the latter part of 1897 will be Democratic-Imperial— that of the

as Emperor over the ten kings of the ten nations. The Pope will then be his obsequious servant, and looking upon him as a God, shall command the world to worship him under pain of death. This shall last three and a half years until our Lord descends on Olivet. (Rev. 17; 13.)

(To be Concluded.)

* Passover Week (April 4-11), 1901, is regarded as the Last Week of this Age, because it is 2,34 ; years distant from Passover Week, B. C. 445, when Artaxerxes gave the command to Nehemiah to rebuild Jerusalem, exactly sixty-nine weeks or 483 years before Messiah was "cut off" in a Passover Week (Daniel 8 : 14; 9 : 25), and also because it is forty-five years distant from the Crimean War Treaty of Peace, ratified on the last day of Passover Week, 1856, which "cleansed the Sanctuary" of the Holy Land, at the end of Daniel's 2,300 years, from Mahomedan laws of murderous intolerance, which were then repealed (the forty-five years being the 1,335 minus the 1,290 years in Daniel 12 : 11, 12).

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Funeral of General Philip H. Sheridan took place on Saturday last, at Arlington, the family having expressed a preference for the Washington cemetery over the Soldier's Home, which was at first proposed. The spot selected for the grave is near the mansion on the hill-side that slopes eastward. Standing on the spot chosen as his resting-place one can see Washington City spread out before him in front, right, and left. Georgetown is at the extreme right, and the Potomac and Analostan Island, the bridges, and the Virginia and Maryland shores are included in the broad scene. Behind the spot where Sheridan's grave was dug lie the bodies of some 12,000 Union soldiers, the men who died in camp along the Potomac, the slain at Bull Run and in the Wilderness. In compliance with the wishes of the dead General, the funeral was as private as was possible in the case of so distinguished a man. The body was taken from Nonquitt on Wednesday, under the charge of General Schofield. It was placed in St. Matthew's Roman Catholic Church, in Washington, where it was watched by a local guard of honor until the ceremony of interment.

A Stringent Anti-Chinese Immigration Bill was passed by the Senate on August 8. It absolutely prohibits the entrance into the United States of any Chinaman except officials, teachers, students, merchants, or travelers for pleasure or curiosity, and not even those unless they shall first obtain the permission of the Chinese Government, and hold a certificate establishing their personal identity, to be made out by the diplomatic representative or consul of the United States in the country from which the person named therein comes. The bill also prohibits the return to this country of any Chinaman who may have acquired residence here and afterward visited China, unless he has a lawful wife, child or parent in the United States, or property therein of the value of one thousand dollars, or debts of like amount due him and pending settlement.

General Clinton B. Fisk, and Dr. John A. Brooks, formally accepted their respective nominations by the Prohibition party for the Presidency and Vice-Presidency on August 6. General Fisk in his letter describes his poignant regret at severing his connection with the Republican party, but adds: "Every day since then has shown yet more clearly the logic of my course, and the truth of my conclusions. In Michigan, in Texas, in Tennessee and Oregon, so-called non-partisan efforts to establish prohibition have failed through partisan necessity, born of liquor elements in old party composition. In Iowa, Rhode Island, and Maine the laws have been shamelessly defied for like reason. The entire trend of things these last four years has proved hopeless, the broader range of prohibition effect through non-partisan means, and equally futile, as a final consummation, the narrower methods of local option and high license, while from the Supreme Court itself has come with startling emphasis a declaration so nationalizing this reform that it can never be made of local or State limitation again. No lines of territorial wish or will can hereafter bear the liquor traffic and its fearful brood, while by national policy that traffic is recognized as legitimate, and while under that policy the National Government derives revenue therefrom." Dr. Brooks is equally emphatic, and while endorsing the protection policy of the Republican platform, says: "A proper protection of American labor and the infant industries of our country may and does commend itself to the majority of our people, but of infinitely more importance is the protection of our homes. To this end your platform subordinates all other questions."

Startling Disclosures are being Made to the Committee on Immigration which is pursuing its inquiries in New York. Witnesses testified last week, giving names and dates, that, in spite of the contract labor law, prominent manufacturers import large numbers of men through recognized agents. In one case the witness heard an employer give the order to a Russian agent for a specified number of Poles, who were then in Europe, and who were duly brought over, and set to work, American laborers being discharged to make room for them. In the shirt industry, hands had been brought from Europe under contract, who have displaced the women and girls formerly employed. The women still employed have had their wages reduced from eight dollars a week to four dollars, and find it difficult to get work at that rate. It is a curious and significant fact that the firms most active in thus evading the law are among the most strenuous advocates in New York of high tariff, and are loud in their protestation against reduction, urging the plea that it would reduce the wages of the American workingman. As a case in point, it was stated that the West Shore Railroad, of which Mr. Chauncey Depew is President, recently imported fifteen hundred Italians, who were engaged at lower wages than American laborers received.

Mr. James G. Blaine Received a Royal Welcome in New York on his arrival from England last week. One huge demonstration in his honor preceded his arrival. The steamer by which he came was due on Wednesday, and it was arranged that he should review a monstre procession of Republican clubs, trade organizations, and deputations from several States. The vessel was delayed, however, by an accident to her machinery, and did not reach New York until Friday. Mr. Blaine was, therefore, unable to witness the ovation intended for him. The parade took place on Thursday night, in his absence; but the enthusiasm displayed was clearly evoked by the expectation of his presence. The familiar campaign cry of 1884, "Blaine, Blaine, James G. Blaine," was raised at intervals all along the line, and a large portrait of the statesman, which occupied the place on the reviewing stand that it was hoped that he would have filled in person, was saluted with ringing cheers by each detachment as it passed. It was such a procession as New York has rarely seen. Starting soon after eight in the evening, it had not entirely passed the stand before midnight. The vessel was sighted early the following morning, and a special steamer, laden with personal and political friends, was sent down the bay to meet him at Quarantine, and bring him to the city. On his landing, his enthusiastic admirers wanted to take the horses from his carriage and drag it to his hotel; but Mr. Blaine would not allow it. An immense throng, however, accompanied him, and in the evening he was serenaded, and an address of welcome presented to him. In reply, he made a speech to a vast audience in the open air. Such a reception to a private citizen is unprecedented, and must have been deeply gratifying to Mr. Blaine.

The International Medical Congress, which has devoted all its sessions to the subject of tuberculosis, has come to the conclusion almost unanimously that consumption is a contagious disease, and may be transmitted from animals to human beings, by means of infected food, drink, or air. It is the opinion of these experts that many cases of consumption are derived from tuberculous cows, through the agency of milk, or from tuberculous beef cattle through the agency of half-cooked meat. Consequently the delegates to the congress point out that danger from these sources may be avoided by boiling milk and cooking meat thoroughly.

The Appearance of the Red Flag on the streets of Paris caused a disturbance on August 8. The trouble arose over the funeral of General Eudes, the ex-communist, who dropped dead while addressing a body of strikers on August 5. Fifty thousand persons gathered in the streets adjacent to the house of the deceased, and thousands lined the route to the cemetery, along which cavalry was stationed. The other troops belonging to the Paris garrison were held within their barracks in readiness for any emergency. Traffic in the streets through which the cortège passed was suspended and the stores were closed. Among those who attended the funeral were Henry Rochefort and Louise Michel. Many flowers and wreaths were placed upon the coffin. When the procession reached the Boulevard Voltaire, three red flags were unfurled. A commissary of police attempted to seize one, when some one in the crowd fired a revolver at him, but the bullet went wide of its mark. The gendarmes then took a hand in protecting the police; they used the butt-end of their muskets, and after a short fight arrested twenty-four of the anarchists and captured the three flags. The procession went on to the cemetery shouting, "Vive la Commune!" "Vive la Revolution!"

An Incisive Speech by the British Premier was made on August 10, in the House of Lords, on the Parnell Investigation Bill, which having passed the Commons, was introduced in the upper house. In explaining the character and object of the unusual mode of inquiry, Lord Salisbury said that in recent years the agitation in Ireland had gone on two parallel lines. One party professed to act constitutionally, and to a certain extent had so acted; the other party was connected with crime, violence, intimidation, mutilation and murder, which means were used to intimidate constitutional opponents, and to force from England the concession of a change which England was not prepared to grant. These organizations had been professedly apart, but they worked for the same ends; they had the same friends and enemies, and injured the same persons. An impression had naturally arisen that they were really not so far apart as they seemed to be, and that there was complicity or connection between them. The charges of complicity with crime had not driven the Parnellites to the courts, but they had demanded an investigation by a Committee of the House of Commons, which did not appear to be a competent tribunal. The Government therefore had appointed a Commission of judges which would close these controversies. It was not well that members of the House of Commons should be accused, in the most solemn manner, of having tampered with murder. The truth should be known, whatever might be the issue. The Government was convinced that it had done good service in driving from the arena of political discussion this foul and scandalous controversy.

Deeply Interesting Lectures on Spain, Mexi- o, Central and South America, illustrated by tereopticon views have been delivered by Bishop . C. Riley in Ascension Chapel, New York, nd in other places in the city and neighborhood luring the past few weeks. Pastors of church- s who desire to interest their people in important sphere of labor, would find no better node of enlightening them as to its needs and apacities than by inviting the Bishop to deliver ne of his lectures in their churches. Four Years of Painful Travel have been undergone by a negro in Georgia. The Macon Telegraph states that an aged negro was found on August 7, on the Houston Road, near Giles- ville, who was suffering severely, and was put into a wagon and taken to the Roff Home. He said that he belonged to Macon, but had settled at Jacksonville. There he fell into misfortune, lost his toes by frost-bite and became paralyzed. He had an irrepressible longing to get back to his old home in Macon, but having no money he deter- mined to make the journey by crawling on his hands and knees. He travelled in this painful manner by unfrequented roads, only going near human habitations to beg for food. His strength and condition would not permit him to cover more than a quarter of a mile a day, and, crawling over the ground as he did, he was often compelled to remain off the road for days and weeks by reason of rain and severe weather. He lived on what was given him, and sometimes, being a great distance between villages, he suffered much for both water and food. It was four years since he left Jacksonville, and he had had no ride until that which took him to the Roff Home. The man's perseverance through such obstacles is truly wonderful. Christians travelling through life to their heavenly home often have need of such patience and perseverance as the old negro exercised. Though the way may seem hard to them their welcome is assured, especially if, like him, they journey on their knees. (Zech. 13: 9.)

A Curious Reason for Confession and Resti- tution was given by a thief in the Tombs Police Court, New York, on August 7. Among the prisoners brought up before the justice on that day was a youth about eighteen years old, against whom there were no witnesses. He told the justice that his mother was dead and that she had been a good mother to him, bringing him up honestly and warning him against evil doing. They lived in Philadelphia, but after her death he came to New York, where he fell into bad ways. On August 4, he was in West Street and noticed a lady waiting an opportun- ity to cross the street, which was crowded by vehicles. Her attention being concentrated on the passing drays and cars, he went behind her and succeeded in stealing her watch. She did not notice her loss, and he got away unobserv- ed. He pawned the watch and meant to have a good time with the money, but on going out that night he saw a shadowy form follow him in a menacing manner. He looked at it over his shoulder and recognized his dead mother. He tried to shake off her pursuit by running, by going into crowded thoroughfares, and by drink- ing; but, wherever he went, the shadowy form followed, and when he went home it stood by his bed, terrifying him. He suffered the torture for two days and then, being unable to bear it longer, he went to the police, made a confession and gave up the pawn-ticket and what money was left. Then he said the spectre left him, and the night in his cell was the first night he had slept since his crime. The spectre was, of course, the product of his conscience and his imagination, but to him doubtless it was very real. Better informed rogues would have seen no spectres, but if they could see the vengeance of God which really does follow them, they would be quite as much alarmed as the young man was by his superstitious idea. (Prov. 11 :21.)

A Whole Family Perished in a Tenement house fire in New York, last week. A man and his wife and daughter and mother-in-law occu- pied the highest floor in a crowded building on Fifty-sixth Street, which the driver of an ash- cart discovered was on fire, as he passed in the night. He ran to the nearest alarm box and sent out a call for an engine, and then returned to the burning house to assist in rescuing the inmates. There was the usual confusion for some time, and as the stairs were burning, there was considerable difficulty in getting the people out, which had to be done through the fire es- capes. It was supposed that all were saved, but when the firemen climbed on the roof to "wash down" they found the four bodies of the family on the top floor all dead. In the hurry and confus- ion they had been forgotten by the other tenants. They had evidently been asleep in bed, and not being warned, slept on until it was too late to escape. Doubtless their fellow-tenants reproach themselves now for their neglect, but their responsibility is but slight compared with that of Christian men who see their acquaintances in danger of the far worse calamity of perishing eternally, and make no effort to arouse them. (Ezek. 33: 8.)

An Utterly Friendless Lady Died at Nvack, N. Y., two weeks ago. She was a teacher for seventeen years in the New York Juvenile Asy- lum. Her situation was peculiar. Her parents emigrated to this country from England shortly after her birth, and settled in New York. Some family affairs occurred while she was still a child which necessitated the return of both fa- ther and mother to the old country. As the child was delicate and the parents were obliged to go in the steerage, they were anxious to leave her in this country, especially as they in- tended to return almost immediately. A kind clergyman readily undertook the care of her during their absence, and they gratefully ac- cepted his offer, feeling sure that they were leaving her in good hands. A disaster occurred to the vessel by which they sailed, and both fa- ther and mother were drowned. The clergyman continued to support the child, and when she grew old enough obtained for her the position in the Nyack Asylum, which she held until her death. She always believed that she had many relatives in England, but she was too young when her parents left to remember their names or anything about them; and, though she lived to be forty years old she never heard tidings of any of them. The loneliness of her life was ap- parent at her funeral, in the unusual absence of mourning relatives. That fact, however, would not distress her then, if it had done so in her life. The only question of any concern to her would be whether, through faith in Christ, she had become a child of God, and a member of His family. (Rev. 21: 27.)

An Adventure with a Bear is Described in a despatch from Round Island, in the St. Law- rence River. It states that, on August 6, a citi- zen of Rochester, N. Y., accompanied by a friend, started on a pedestrian trip across the island. They took no guns, as no reports of bears or other wild animals being on the island had reached them. About half the journey had been accomplished, when they struck some rough ground, and had to make their way over rocks, fallen trees, and thick underbrush. They were sitting down on a fallen tree to rest, when they heard a heavy tread and the breaking of branches behind them; and, looking around, they were terrified at seeing a big black bear approaching. The Rochester man ran to the nearest tree, which he climbed as nimbly as a boy, while his companion ran off at the top of his speed. The bear came to the foot of the tree, and made an attempt to climb it, but fail- ed, as it was very thin. He gave a low, fierce growl, and sat down at the foot, as if to starve the man out. Half an hour passed, the man comforting himself with the hope that his com- panion would get the farmers to come with guns to his assistance. Another hour passed, and the man was still in the tree, when it oc- curred to him that he had a revolver in his pocket. It was not large enough to kill the bear, but it might scare him away. He drew it and fired. The bear received a painful flesh wound, and rose, shaking himself savagely. One more shot finished the business, for at the sec- ond wound he started off at a run, and disap- peared in the woods. Glad as the man was at his deliverance, he blamed himself for his folly in not thinking of his weapon before. That is the case with many Christians when they are beset by the enemy of souls. They have a wea- pon which Satan dreads, but they neglect to use it. (Eph. 6: 16–18.)

The Rev. George Duffield, who died at Bloomfield, N. J., a few days ago, was the author of the familiar hymn, "Stand up, stand up for Jesus," and the father of the late Rev. S. W. Duffield, the hymnologist.

The Moravians report for the past year 29,283 com- municants in their mission fields, with a total of 83,052 persons under the care of their missionaries. The total receipts were $95,345. There is a deficiency of upward of $5,000.

Judge T. K. Wilson, of the San Francisco Superior Court, was asked recently what percentage of divorces were caused by intemperance. He promptly replied, "seventy-five per cent." During the year 1887, 399 citizens of that city obtained divorces.

The corner-stone of the Presbyterian Hospital of Chicago, was laid last month with appropriate cere- monies. The new hospital building is to be constructed from an endowment of $100,000 provided for in the will of Daniel A. Jones, who died about three years ago.

A summary of the statistics of the Christian churches of the United States shows that there are now 138,885 churches, 94,457 ministers, and 19,790,323 members in this country. The net gains for the past year were, 6,434 churches, 4,505 ministers, and 774,861 communi- cants.

Rev. E. W. Oakes is rejoicing in signal marks of God's blessing in his work at Manchester, N. H. His church being free, having no pew rents or assessments, the neglected classes in the city have flocked to it, and hundreds of them have made profession of their faith in Christ.

The Young Men's Christian Association of Cincinnati have begun the erection of a new and elegant hall, the cost of which will be $150,000. This will be the cen- tennial gift, in memory of the organization of the north- western Territory, of this Association to the cause of Christianity.

Very successful revival services are being held at Lynn, Mass., in a large tent. The number attending is unprecedented in summer services in that city. Messrs. McLean and Willis, who conduct the meetings, are much encouraged also by the number who have ascribed their conversion to God's blessing on these services.

The Jewish Chronicle intimates that the Jews, stimu- lated by the example of the Pan-Anglican Synod, are meditating the propriety of summoning a Pan-Judaic Synod. The subjects suggested for discussion are the limits of Scripture inspiration, the attitude of the Syna- gogue toward the latest teachings of geology and biology, the restoration of the Jewish sacrifices, and even the more profoundly important question of the Messiah.

PETER'S RESTORATION.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And immediately, while he yet spake, the cock crew. And the Lord turned, and looked upon Peter. And Peter remembered the word of the Lord, how He had said unto him, Before the cock crow, thou shalt deny Me thrice. And Peter went out and wept bitterly."—Luke 22 : 60-62.

The Look—Refreshed Peter's Memory—Penetrated his Heart—Peter Must Have Been Looking at Jesus—III. Peter After the Look—His Awakening—His Foolhardiness Vanished—Ashamed to be Ashamed.

PETER had terribly fallen. He had denied his Master, denied Him repeatedly, denied Him with oaths, denied Him in His presence, while his Master was being smitten and falsely charged; denied Him, though he was an apostle; denied Him, though he had declared that should all men forsake Him, yet would he never be offended. It was a sad, sad sin. Remember

What Led up to It.

It was, first, Peter's presumption and self-confidence. He reckoned that he could never stumble, and for that very reason he speedily fell. A haughty spirit goes before a fall! Oh, that we might look to the roots of bitter flowers, and destroy them! If presumption is flourishing in the soil of our hearts to-day, we shall soon see the evil fruit which will come of it. Reliance upon our firmness of character, depth of experience, clearness of insight, or maturenes in grace, will, in the end, land us in disgrace and failure. We must either deny ourselves, or we shall deny our Lord; if we cleave to self-confidence, we shall not cleave to Him.

Immediately, Peter's denial was owing to cowardice. The brave Peter, in the presence of a maid was ashamed; he could not bear to be pointed out as a follower of the Galilean. He did not know what might follow upon it; but he saw his Lord without a friend, and felt that it was a lost cause, and he did not care to avow it. Only to think that Peter, under temporary discouragement, should play the coward! Yet cowardice treads upon the heels of boasting; he that thinks he can fight the world, will be

The First Man to Run Away.

I desire in this discourse to speak chiefly of Peter's restoration. Peter was down; but he was soon up again. One writer says the story should rather be called Peter's restoration than Peter's fall. His fall was soon over: he was like a little child learning to walk, scarcely down before his mother has him up again. It was not a continuance in a sin, like that of David, who remained for months without repentance; but it was the quick speech of a man carried away by sudden temptation, and it was followed by a speedy repentance. Upon his restoration we are going to meditate.

It was brought about by two outward means. I like to think of the singular combination: the crowing of the cock, and a look from the Lord. When I come to preach to you, it almost makes me smile to think that God should save a soul through me. I may find a fit image of myself in the poor cock. Mine is poor crowing. But as the Master's look went with the cock's crowing, so, I trust, it will go with my feeble preaching. The next time you also go out to try and win a soul for Jesus, say to yourself, "I cannot do it: I cannot melt a hard, rebellious heart; but yet the Lord may use me; and if there come of my feeble words with my Lord's potent look, then the heart will dissolve in streams of repentance." Crow away, poor bird: if Jesus looks whilst thou art crowing, thou wilt not crow in vain; but Peter's heart will break. The two things are joined together, and let no man put them asunder—the commonplace instrumentality and the divine Worker. Christ has all the glory, and all the more glory because He works by humble means. I trust that there will be this morning a conjunction of the weakness of the preacher with the strength of the Holy Spirit; so that stony hearts may be broken and God glorified.

1. First, let us look at the Lord, who looked upon Peter. Can you picture Him in the hall up yonder steps, before the high priest and the council? Peter is down below, in the area of the house, warming his hands at the fire. Can you see the Lord Jesus turning round and fixing His eyes intently upon His erring disciple?

What See You in that Look?

I see in that look, first, that which makes me exclaim: What thoughtful love! Jesus is bound, He is accused, He has just been smitten on the face, but His thought is of wandering Peter. You want all your wits about you when you are before cruel judges, and are called upon to answer false charges; you are the more tried when there is no man to stand by you, or bear witness on your behalf; it is natural, at such an hour that all your thoughts should be engaged with your own cares and sorrows. It would have been no reproach had the thoughts of our Lord been concentrated on His personal sufferings; and all the less so because these were for the sake of others. But our blessed Master is thinking of Peter, and His heart is going out toward His unworthy disciple. Blessed be His dear name; Jesus always has an eye for His people, whether He be in His shame or in His glory.

I exclaim, next, What a boundless condescension! If our Lord's eye had wandered that day upon "that other disciple" that was known to the high priest, or if He had even looked upon some of the servants of the house, we should not have been so astonished; but it is to look upon Peter, the man from whom we should naturally have turned away our faces after his wretched conduct. He had acted most shamefully and cruelly, and yet the Master's eye sought him out in boundless pity! If there is a man here who feels himself to be near akin to the devil, I pray the Lord to look first at him.

But then, again, what tender wisdom do I see here! "The Lord turned, and looked upon Peter." He knew best what to do: He did not speak to him, but looked upon him. How wisely doth Christ always choose the way of expressing His affection, and working our good! If He had spoken to Peter then, the mob would have assailed Him, or at least the ribald crowd would have remarked upon the sorrow of the Master and the treachery of the disciple: our gracious Lord will never needlessly expose the faults of His chosen. Our Saviour employed the most prudent, the most comprehensive, the most useful method of speaking to the heart of His erring follower. He looked volumes into him. His glance was full of unutterable meanings, which it conveyed in a more clear and vivid way than words could have done. As I think of that look, I am compelled to cry out: What divine power is here! Why, dear friends, this look worked wonders! I sometimes preach with all my soul to Peter, and, alas! he likes my sermon and forgets it. I have known Peter read a good book full of most powerful pleading, and when he has read it through he has shut it up and gone to sleep. I remember my Peter when he lost his wife, and one would have thought it would have touched him, and it did, with some natural feeling; yet he did not return to the Lord, whom he had forsaken, but continued in his backsliding. See, then, how our Lord can do with a look what we cannot do with a sermon, what the most powerfull writer cannot do with hundreds of pages, and what affliction cannot do with even its heaviest stroke. The Lord looked, and Peter wept bitterly.

Let me beg you to note what sacred teaching is here. The teaching is of practical value, and should be at once carried out by the followers of Jesus. You, dear friend, are a Christian man or a Christian woman; you have been kept by divine grace, from anything like disgraceful sin. Thank God it is so. I dare say, if you look within, you will find much to be ashamed of; but yet you have been kept from presumptuous and open sins. Alas! one who was once a friend of yours has disgraced himself: he was a little while ago a member of the church, but he has shamefully turned aside. You cannot excuse his sin; on the contrary, you are forced to feel great indignation against his folly, his untruthfulness, his wickedness. He has caused the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme, and has done awful mischief to the cause of righteousness. Now I know what will be suggested to you. You will be to disown him altogether, and scarcely to look at him if you meet him in the street. This is the manner of men, but not the manner of Jesus. I charge you, act not in so un-Christlike a manner. The Lord turned, and looked on Peter; will not His servants look on him? You are not perfect like your Lord; you are only a poor sinful creature like your fallen brother. What! are you too proud to look at the fallen one? Will you not give him a helping hand? Will you not try to bring him back? The worst thing you can do with a backslider is to let him keep on sliding back. Your duty should be your pleasure, and your duty is to "restore such an one in the spirit of meekness, remembering thyself also, lest thou also be tempted."

One more lesson: observe what heavenly comfort is here: "The Lord turned and looked upon Peter;" yes, Jesus looks upon sinners still. The doctrine of God's omniscience is far oftener set forth in a hard way than in a cheering way. Have you never heard a sermon from "Thou God seest me," of which the pith was, "Therefore tremble, and be afraid"? That is hardly fair to the text; for when Hagar cried, "Thou, God, seest me," it was because the Lord had interposed to help her, when she had fled from her mistress. It was comfort to her that there she also had looked after Him that had looked upon her. There is a dark side to "Thou, God, seest me"; but it is not half so dark as it would be if God did not see us. It is true, O sinner, that God has seen your sin, and all the aggravations of it; but it is also true that as He sees your ruin, your misery, your sadness, He has compassion on you. He sees your sin that He may remove it, and make you clean in His sight. As the Lord looked upon Peter, so He looks upon you. He has not turned His back on you; He has not averted the gaze of His pity.

II. Now let us go on to the second point and which the Lord gave to Peter. That look was, first of all, a marvellous refreshment to Peter's memory: "The Lord turned, and looked upon Peter." What a sight it must have been for Peter! Our dear Master's face was that night all red from the bloody sweat. He must have appeared emaciated in body, His eyes weary with want of sleep, and His whole countenance the vision of grief. If ever a picture of the Man of Sorrows could have been drawn, it should have been taken at that moment when the Lord turned and looked upon Peter. By torchlight and the flickering flame of the fire in the court of the hall of Caiaphas, Peter saw a vision which would never fade from his mind. He saw the man whom he loved as he had never seen Him before. Though the lineaments of that reverend face were distained with blood, yet Peter could tell that it was the selfsame Lord with whom he had enjoyed three years of intimate intercourse and tender unveiling. All this must in a moment have flashed upon poor Peter's mind; and I do not wonder that in the recollection of it all he went out and wept bitterly.

Next, that turning of the Master was a special reminder of His warning words. Jesus did not say it in words, but He did more than say it by His look. "Ah, Peter, did I not tell you it would be so? You said, 'Though all men shall be offended because of thee, yet will I never be ded.' Did I not tell thee that before cock-ing thou wouldst deny Me thrice?" No ke was uttered; and yet the tender eye of Lord had revealed to Peter his own extreme , and his Master's superior wisdom.

hat do you think that look chiefly said? thought about it, as I turned it over, was ; when the Lord looked upon Peter, though id refresh his memory, and make an appeal is conscience, yet there was still more evi-tly a glorious manifestation of love. Judg-what would break my heart the soonest if I thus denied my Master, it seems to me that ould be most affected by His saying to me, nd yet I love thee still." Love is nutable love is that divine hammer which aks the rock in pieces. I love to believe that Lord will bring His wanderers back. O ye o are anxious to return to Him, let this cheer u: "Yet doth He devise means, that His ban-ed be not expelled from Him."

Again: this look penetrated Peter's inmost rt. It is not every look that we receive that es very deep. I look with eyes of deep affec-n at men from this pulpit, and I perceive that y know my meaning; but they soon shake off. But our Saviour has an eye to which joints and marrow are visible. He looks o the secret chambers of the soul; for His k is a sunbeam, and bears its own light with lighting up the dark places of our nature by own radiance. Peter could not help feeling, he was pricked in the heart by the arrow of rist's glance. How many persons are affect by religion only in the head! It does not ect their heart and life. I am grieved when I ar of some of you, who are regular hearers, and ke pleasure in my preaching, and yet, after any years, you are not a bit better. Oh that y Lord would give such a glance at you this orning as should dart light into you, and use you to see yourself, and to see Him, and en the tears would fill your eyes!

One fact may not escape our notice: our rd's look at Peter was a revival of all Peter's oking unto Jesus. The Lord's look upon eter took effect because Peter was looking to e Lord. Do you catch it? If the Lord had rned and looked on Peter, and Peter's back ad been turned on the Lord, that look would ot have reached Peter, nor affected him.

The Eyes Met

o produce the desired result. Notwithstanding ll Peter's wanderings, he was anxious about is Lord, and therefore looked to see what was one with Him. Even while he warmed his ands at the fire, he kept looking into the inner all. His eyes were constantly looking in the irection of the Lord Jesus. While he wander-d about among the maids and serving-men, nd got talking to them, fool that he was, yet till he would perpetually steal a glance that ay to see how it fared with the man he loved. He had not given up the habit of looking to is Lord. If he had not still, in a measure, ooked to his Master, how would the look of Jesus have been observed by him? It is through the eye that looks to Jesus that Jesus ooks, and lets fresh light and hope into the soul. Oh that you who have this lingering faith in the Lord may now receive a look from Him, which shall work in you a bitter, salutary, sav-ing repentance, without which you can never be restored!

This look was altogether between the Lord and Peter. Nobody knew that the Lord looked on Peter, except Peter and his Lord. That grace which saves a soul is not a noisy thing; neither is it visible to any but the receiver. This morning, if the grace of God comes to any one of you in power, it will be unperceived by those who sit on either side of you in the pew: they will hear the same words, but of the divine operation which accompanies them they will know nothing; the eye of the Lord will not speak to them as it is speaking to the awakened one. Do you know anything of the secret love-look of the Lord Jesus?

III. Now I must go to my third point: Let us look at Peter after the Lord had looked at him. What is Peter doing? When the Lord looked on Peter was to feel awakened. Peter's mind had been sleeping. He had forgotten his Lord's Deity, and thus he had, in thought, denied his Lord. He was off the lines, and was in a sleepy state. He was what Paul calls "bewitched," and under the influence of a spiritual soporific, administered by Satan. The Lord's look brought him to his better self, and aroused all the spiritual life which had been dormant in him: "Peter remembered," and he was restored.

The next effect was, it took away all Peter's foolhardiness from him. Peter had made his way into the high priests' hall, but now he made his way out of it. He had not felt in any danger though in the worst of company. What did he care for the girl that kept the door? Surely he was too much of a man to mind her remarks. What did he care for the men that were round the fire? They were rough fellows; but he had been a fisherman, and quite able to cope with the priests' bailiffs. But now the brag is gone out of him. No sooner had Jesus looked upon him than Peter declined all further risks.

All Peter's daring vanished; he turned his back on maids and men, and went out into the darkness of the night. We do not hear of his coming near the cross; in fact, we hear no more of him till the Resurrection morning, for Peter was sensible enough to feel that he any more. He immediately placed himself in the background till his Lord summoned him to the front. I wish that some religious professors whose lives have been questionable, had grace enough to do the same. When I see a man who has sinned grievously, pushing himself speedily to the front, I cannot believe that he has a due sense of the evil he has wrought, or of his own unfitness to be in the place of peril. Above all, shun the place where you have fallen. Do not linger in it for a moment. Go out, even though you leave the comfortable fire behind you. Better be in the cold than stay where your soul is in danger. Till Peter had received from the Lord's own mouth abundant assurance of his restoration to his office, by the threefold charge to feed the sheep and lambs, we do not find him again in the forefront.

That look of Christ also opened the sluices of Peter's heart: he went out, and wept bitterly. There was gall in the tears he wept, for they were the washings of his bitter sorrow. Dear friends, if we have sinned with Peter, God grant us grace to weep with Peter. Many will think of Peter's wandering who forget Peter's weeping. Sin, even though it be forgiven, is a bitter thing; even though Christ may look away your despair, he will not look away your penitence. "He went out and wept bitterly." Oh, how he chided himself! He remembered it all his life, and could never hear a cock crow without feeling the water in his eyes.

And now, to conclude, it made Peter, as long as he lived, Ashamed to be Ashamed.

Peter was never ashamed after this. Who was it that stood up at Pentecost and preached? Was it not Peter? Was he not always foremost in testifying to his Lord and Master? I trust that, if any of us have been falling back, and especially if we have wandered into sin, we may get such a restoration from the Lord Himself, that we may become better Christians ever afterwards. I do not want you to break a bone, I pray God you never may; but if you ever do, may the heavenly Surgeon so set it that it may become thicker and stronger than before. Courage was the bone in Peter which snapped; but when it was set, it became the strongest bone in his nature, and never broke again. When the Lord sets the bones of His people, they never break any more—He does His work so effectually. The man who has erred by anger becomes meek and gentle. The man who has erred by drink, quits the deadly cup, and loathes it. The man who has sinned by shame, becomes the bravest of the company.

Oh, Lord Jesus, I have tried to preach Thee this morning, but I cannot look with Thine eye. Thou must look on erring ones Thyself. Look, Saviour! Look, sinner! "There is life in a look AT the crucified One," because there is life in a look from the crucified One. May Jesus look, and the sinner look! Amen.

WASHINGTON'S PRAYER IN A HUT.*

"I REMEMBER an incident," said Wilson, "that will give you some idea of the heart George Washington had in his bosom. I suppose Colonel Harmar has told you something of the sufferings of our men during the winter we lay at Valley Forge. It was a terrible season. It is hard to give even a faint idea of it in words; but you may imagine a party of men with ragged clothes and no shoes, huddled around a fire in a log hut; the snow about two feet deep on the ground, and the wind driving fierce and bitter through the chinks of the rude hovel. Many of the men had their feet frost-bitten, and there were no remedies to be had. The sentinels suffered terribly, and looked more like ghosts than men as they paced up and down before the lines of huts.

"Washington saw how the men were situated, and I really believe his heart bled for them. He would write to Congress of the state of affairs, and entreat that body to procure supplies; but you see Congress had not the power to comply. All it could do was to call on the States, and await the action of their assemblies.

"Washington's headquarters were near the camp, and he often came over to see the poor fellows, and try to soothe and comfort them; and, I tell you, the men loved that man as if he had been their father, and would rather have died with him than have lived in luxury with the red-coat general.

"In the next hut to the one in which I messed an old friend named Josiah Jones lay sick. He was lying on a scant, straw-bed, with nothing but rags to cover him. He had been sick for several days, but wouldn't go under the doctor's hands, as he always said it was like going into battle certain of being killed. One day, when we had no notion of anything of the kind, Josiah called out to us as we sat talking near his hut, that he was dying, and wanted us to pray for him. We were all anxious to do anything we could for the man, for we loved him as a brother; but as for praying we did not exactly know how to go about it. To get clear of that duty I ran to obtain for the poor fellow a drink of water to moisten his parched lips.

"While the rest were standing about, not knowing what to do, some one heard the voice of General Washington in the next hut, where he was comforting some poor wretches who had their feet frozen. Directly he came to our door, and one of the men went and told him the state of things. Now, you see, a commander-in-chief would have been justified in being angry that the regulations for the sick had been disobeyed, and have turned away; but he was a nobler kind of man. He entered the hut and went up to poor Josiah, and asked him how he was. Josiah told him that he felt as if he were dying, and wanted some one to pray for him.

"Washington saw that a doctor could do the man no good, and he knelt on the ground by him and prayed. We all knelt down, too; we couldn't help it. An old comrade was dying away from his home and friends, and there was our general kneeling by him, with his face turned toward heaven, looking, as I thought, like an angel's.

"Well, he prayed to his Heavenly Father for mercy on the dying man's soul, to pardon his sins, and to take him to Himself; and then prayed for us all. Before the prayer was concluded, Josiah's spirit had fled. Washington felt the brow of the poor fellow, and seeing that his life was out, gave the men directions how to dispose of the body, and then left us to visit other parts of the camp."

"Praying at the death-bed of a private!" mused Smith, aloud. "Well, I might have conjectured what he would do in such a case, from what I saw of him. I wonder if history ever spoke of a greater man!"

THE LATE GEN. P. H. SHERIDAN.

(See Portrait.)

Few soldiers of this generation have had a more brilliant career than the distinguished general who died on August 5, and whose portrait we now publish. In the records of the war, his name is conspicuous not only as a strategist, but as a man of marvellous personal courage, and of almost romantic heroism. With no prestige, no aristocratic or official influence, to help him, he rose from the humblest origin to be commander in-chief of the army of the United States, and to have the unanimous consent of his countrymen to his eminent fitness for that exalted position, and in the whole army there was not a soldier who did not speak lovingly and admiringly of "Little Phil." His reputation was one of which the whole country was proud, and even his enemies whom he met on the battle-field held him in the highestesteem.

Philip H. Sheridan was born in Somerset, O., on March 6, 1831, so that he was but little more than fifty-seven years old when he died. His parents were Irish, and had come to America only three years before his birth. He was sent out to earn his living in a dry-goods store when he was thirteen years of age. He served four years in that station, and then at last succeeded in getting what he had long desired, a nomination to West Point. He graduated in July 1853, and was appointed immediately in the army with the brevet rank of second lieutenant of Infantry.

When the war broke out he was serving as Captain of the Thirteenth Regiment of United States Infantry, but his superior ability had already been recognized, and he was appointed Quartermaster to Gen. Halleck in the Mississippi campaign of 1862. His qualities as an inspiring leader on the battle-field marked him out for rapid promotion, and before that campaign ended he was made Colonel of the Second Michigan Volunteer Cavalry. After the memorable engagement at Booneville, Gen. Rosecrans reported his "fearless gallantry" and recommended him for further promotion. President Lincoln thereupon made him Brigadier-General of Volunteers. His career after that was one of glorious activity and usefulness to the Union cause. He led the advance in Kentucky at the head of the Eleventh Division, took part in the battle of Perryville, and was in the subsequent notable march to the relief of Nashville. He was assigned to the command of the Army of the Cumberland, and with his division did brilliant service in the Tennessee campaign, particularly at the battle of Murfreesboro', his splendid work at the latter engagement securing him promotion to the rank of Major-General. He was a conspicuous figure in the actions in and about Cold Harbor, and on August 4 was put in command of the Army of the Shenandoah.

It was in October, 1864, that he made the famous ride on his war horse to Winchester that was the subject of Thomas Buchanan Read's familiar and stirring war poem, "Sheridan's Ride." He dashed into the panic-stricken ranks of Union soldiers who were fleeing from General Early. His presence acted like magic in restoring the hope and spirits of the fugitives. They rallied around the gallant little commander, and he charged upon Early's force, who hadn't dreamt of his coming to the front, and drove them back in disorder. He had splendidly turned a sorry rout into a notable victory. The feat won him the familiar title of "The Hero of Winchester," and the new honor of an appointment of Brigadier-General in the regular army, and the special thanks of Congress.

From Feburary 27, to March, 1865, he made a great raid from Winchester to Petersburg. He was in the Richmond campaign from March 25 to April 9. On April 1 he defeated the Confederates at Five Forks, which battle compelled the abandonment of Petersburg and Richmond by the enemy. He gallantly led the pursuit of the Confederate commander, General Lee, and was present when the latter capitulated on April 9.

After the war he held several important and responsible positions, and finally on the retirement of General W. T. Sherman in Feburary, 1884, he was made Commander-in-Chief of the United States Armies, which position he held when he died. The illness which resulted in his death commenced on May 12, last, when he had a severe attack of heart failure, which was succeeded by others. He rallied with difficulty, and his removal to a more bracing air was said to be the only chance of saving his life. On June 30 he was pronounced able to travel, and he was conveyed in a Government steamer to Nonquitt, Mass., where for two or three weeks he seemed to improve. On Sunday, August 5 however, he was again seized with an attack of heart-failure and in less than an hour afterward he breathed his last. The General leaves a widow and four children—three girls, and a boy who is only seven years old.

"Say, cook, why don't Master Reginald ever come to prayers?" asked the parlor-maid at the rectory, addressing her fellow-domestic as the two returned to the kitchen after attending family worship in the library.

"I don't know," responded the cook; "you had better ask him, if you are curious."

The parlor-maid laughed and made a grimace: "You'd like to be by when I did it, wouldn't you? My! how he'd flare up. I fancy I see him and that French wife of his jabbering to him in her gibberish. She's a spit-fire, she is. I believe there's trouble coming for the poor old doctor, and if there is she's the cause of it. I never liked her from the first time I set eyes upon her."

"Well," said the cook, "you had better set your eyes on your work, now; that's more your concern than Master Reginald and his wife. He didn't marry to please you."

"That's so, and, I guess, not to please his father either. If he's going to be a clergyman, and have his father's church when the old man gives up or dies, as we've all expected, he'd ha' done a deal better to marry a good American girl. There's plenty around better looking than this French woman, and more fit for a parson's wife. I can't understand her talk, but I know it's bad by the look of her eyes. And she don't come to prayers any more'n he does. I wonder the Doctor don't speak about it!"

"You leave Dr. Turner to attend to his own affairs," said the cook.

"I don't think much of his management; else how came Master Reginald to marry a woman like that! Whered' he pick her up?"

"I presume, he met her in Europe," said the cook, whose taciturnity never could resist persistent attacks. "He was always teasing his father to let him go to a German college. He used to be always joking about ours. He used to tell a story about a monkey being made D. D. I guess that was only his fun, but he made his father own up that one preacher as was made a Doctor didn't know a word of Latin or Greek or Hebrew. Once he got punished for guying one of the boss preachers as stopped here. He asked him who wrote Ecclesiastes. The preacher said 'Solomon,' and Reginald burst out laughing. He didn't laugh though when his father was through with him."

"And his father let him go to Germany?"

"Yes, he went. He got through his college there in two years. His father was mighty proud when the papers came, saying how well his Regy had done. I guess he made the Germans open their eyes. They didn't have any idea what Americans could do before. They are slow out there. The Doctor expected Reginald would come home right off; but he didn't. He wanted to look around a bit, and his father was so pleased with him that he sent him a lot of money to go about with. Pretty near all he'd saved, I guess. The Doctor got kind of restless and fidgety about his stopping over there so long, but he didn't say much. At last about a month back he stopped me as I was going down-stairs, and says he, 'Master Reginald's coming home, and he's going to bring his wife with him.' That's all he said, and I didn't ask him anything more about it; but I guess he didn't know himself about the marriage till that morning."

"He'll wish yet he'd never heard of it," opined the parlor maid.

"Mebbe, mebbe," assented the cook. "It'll be a cruel shame, though, for he's been just wrapped up in his boy these ever so many years. There, be quiet, she is in the library now talking to the doctor."

Dr. Turner's Fatal Interview.

The two girls stopped speaking and listened. Through the open window of a room overhead two voices could be heard distinctly in the kitchen. The one high pitched, almost shrill, speaking rapidly with a foreign accent, and the other lower in tone, but sonorous, with which they were familiar—the voice of good old Dr. Turner, whose character and labors had won him the respect not only of that household but of the whole neighborhood, where he had been a Christian pastor nearly forty years.

"It is best that you know," said the shrill voice. "My faith! why, has not Reginald you told for himself? He has not the courage of his opinions. He a priest! No, never will that be. He will be lawyer, doctor, what you will; but a priest—oh, never! He is disillusioned of religion. If he did preach I would laugh! Ah, that would be droll!"

"I cannot believe it." The words came slowly and hesitantly in the good clergyman's voice. "My son cannot have abandoned his faith. Madam, you are jesting with me. It is a painful subject for frivolity."

"Jest? Oh no, it is not I who jest. It is the truth that from you he has too long concealed. He comes not to your devotions, you perceive. Why is that? He believes not one word of your book; then he will not teach. That is right, is it not so? In Paris he was on the opposite, and he spoke grandly, and the people laughed and shouted. I heard them. You should get him to make his speeches for you to hear. Oh, he is a mocker. It is like Voltaire. He was infidel when he came from Germany, but in Paris he grew bold. Oh, he is grand, I adore him. I knew not he had a father so serious."

A deep groan was the only reply. There was silence for a few moments, and then a sudden movement. A minute later the door of the upper room was flung open and a loud, piercing call was heard. The two girls ran up from the kitchen and at the head of the stairs met the daughter-in-law of their employer, coming out of the library. "See," she said, "your master is sick, he faints, get water, get—send for the physician. My faith! but he is pallid."

The girls pushed past her into the room, and there lay the clergyman in his usual chair, his head thrown back and his hands hanging limp over the arms. "Go and fetch Master Reginald," said the cook. "He is out walking," replied the wife; "go summon the physician, as I say to you."

But the clergyman was beyond the help of man. "Apoplexy" was the cause assigned on the medical certificate for his death, and his congregation mourned for him as a friend whose place none could fill. When inquisition is made for blood in the Great Assize not all who are held guilty of murder will be men whose hands have done violence. Many a useful life has been shortened, many a hoary head has been hastened to the grave, by sorrow and shame over the apostacy and misconduct of beloved children.

THE EPOCHS OF A LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. L. S. Keyser.

Plotting.

A GIRL of Belle Havelock's spirit was little likely to exhaust her passion in tears. Those she shed on her return from Mr. Mardont's church were quickly dried. They were the natural effect of feminine weakness, which for the moment could not be overcome. They were by no means an acceptance of defeat. The discovery that she had a rival for the love for which her heart yearned, provoked her, piqued her, irritated her, but did not dismay her. She was sure that the acquaintance between Hadley and Miss Winters could not have reached an advanced stage, and she did not doubt but that with a little tact it might be interrupted.

"Ah!" she said, in an angry whisper, shaking a minatory finger at a mental image in the darkness, "you may be very crafty, Miss Winters, but it is possible to out-general you; and though I should not be capable of putting myself in front of an express-train to win a man's attentions, you will find that you have a rival in Belle Havelock who will be equal to the emergency. Wrong? Who can draw a distinction between right and wrong in a Godless world like this?"

Her atheism soothed her conscience, which had momentarily been aroused into rebellion against a resort to unfair tactics for attaining her ends. It must have been past midnight when she retired. Even then she could not sleep, but tossed restlessly on her bed, revolving one plan after another in her mind; and when morning dawned, although she had not mapped out as yet a definite line of action, she had fully determined to allure Hadley Madelling from her rival, by fair means or foul, and with this purpose in mind she awaited further developments that might help her in her projects.

Nor was she obliged to wait long. A number of the young men and ladies of the best musical talent in the college and town were making extensive preparations to present a popular cantata before a public audience in Chapel Hall. On account of her rich contralto voice Belle had been chosen to take an important part in the musical performance. When she went to the first rehearsal on the following Tuesday evening she found that Miss Winters, who had an excellent soprano voice, and Mr. Duneman, who sang tenor, were also to take part. Belle had met the latter on several occasions, and had succeeded, to her own satisfaction, in gauging his mental and moral qualities.

While the different parts of the cantata were being assigned, Belle was furtively watching Miss Winters, and in doing so she made an important discovery. She noticed that Duneman was constantly hovering about that lady, and his eyes were frequently bent upon her with an admiration he made no attempt to conceal. It was evident to the watchful Belle that the young man was in love. If so, here was an ally whose natural interest it was to aid her in detaching Hadley from Miss Winters. That his aid could be enlisted, Belle did not doubt, nor did she doubt as to its extent. She fully believed from her estimate of his character that he would be utterly unscrupulous about the use of any means that might accomplish an end on which he had set his heart. His jealousy, dexterously aroused, would stifle any protests of honor or conscience and render him a fit instrument for her use.

An opportunity for opening negotiations for an alliance occurred before rehearsal was over. The cantata called for several duets by the leading tenor and alto voices which were somewhat difficult of rendition. It was, therefore, quite natural for Belle to suggest to Duneman, after they had been singing together several times, that a private rehearsal of their parts would be advisable. Duneman assented, and accepted her invitation to come to her home on the following Saturday evening for the purpose.

Revolving in her own mind during the next few days various schemes for effecting her purpose, she more than once felt compunctions of conscience, and a mental effort was necessary to silence them. All things, she reflected, were the result of an evolution without God, and consequently all ethical distinctions were but the figments of a morbid fancy. She herself was only borne along unresistingly on the wave of this great law, which took all moral responsibility out of her hands. Furthermore, she had recourse to a casuistical mode of argument by which she justified her purpose. Miss Winters, she reasoned, was a bigoted Christian girl, and hence her mental attitude was not at one with that of Mr. Madelling. They would therefore not be congenial. It would be a misalliance, and would entail unhappiness upon them both. It was entirely different with herself and Mr. Madelling. Their views on religion and all other important questions were in complete harmony. Yes, if there was any basis for moral distinctions, it was right for her to prevent an unhappy conjugal union. One cannot allow himself to be governed by sentiment alone in marital affairs, she argued, but reason must be the arbiter, and those who are wise will study the laws of intellectual affinity. Hadley's admiration of Miss Winters was only a momentary passion; but still, in his blindness and infatuation, he might succumb to her blandishments, and thus blight his whole life. Belle would therefore save him from such a sad alliance even if she had to resort to strategy to do so.

Of course, the sophistry of this mode of reasoning was obvious to her, but she resolutely closed her eyes to it, and proceeded to mature her plans.

Saturday evening brought Mr. Duneman to her door. When she looked into his eyes she was fully convinced that she could mould him to her purposes.

"His religion is not an inch deep," she thought, "but his selfishness and egotism are unfathomable."

They rehearsed their parts in the cantata with considerable enthusiasm, for the divinity student had an inordinate ambition to distinguish himself as a vocal artist, and he was well aware that his tenor voice was one of unusually fine timbre. After the rehearsal, as they sat talking, Belle dexterously turned the conversation to the students of the college. One after another ran the gauntlet of their criticism, until presently she remarked, with well-feigned nonchalance:

"What do you think of Miss Winters's singing?"

A slight flush came to the young man's face at the sudden mention of the name, but he answered, quietly:

"I think hers is the best soprano voice engaged in the cantata. Did you notice how quiet all the performers became as she sang her solos? And yet it was her first practice. You will not think me guilty of flattery if I say that she holds the same place in the soprano that you hold in the contralto."

Belle blushed slightly, and was not displeased with the compliment paid her.

"I fancy that is the highest praise you could give me," she said, significantly. "I am inclined to think Miss Winters is perfect in your eyes. Oh! do not blush; there is no shame in loving so beautiful and accomplished a girl. I detected your secret at the rehearsal, and I thought then how well suited you were to each other."

"Pray do not speak of it, Miss Havelock; your intuitions have certainly surprised my secret, but I think no one else has discovered it. Still, as I am not engaged to Miss Winters I should be sorry to have the matter talked of in the college. It would be embarrassing for both Miss Winters and me. I admit that you are right as to my own feelings, and that extent of confidence must give me ground for making an appeal to you for reticence."

"Oh, your confidence is quite safe with me, and I most sincerely wish you success in your suit. I think she would make an ideal minister's wife. You intend being a minister, do you not?"

"Yes, that is my ambition, and as you say, Miss Winters is eminently fitted to aid me in that high vocation. Still, it was not that utilitarian motive that drew me to Miss Winters. Do you believe in love at first sight? But why do I ask? It is not fair to a comparative stranger to inflict personal experiences upon her."

"Oh, do not apologize, Mr. Duneman, my sex, you know, is always interested in love affairs. You may confide in me. Besides, I might be able to do you a service of value to you."

"How so?"

"By putting you on your guard. I have reason to think that you have a rival. Perhaps I ought not to speak of it, but I do not like to see a good match thwarted, and besides, I feel quite an interest in your wooing."

"A rival!" exclaimed Duneman, starting and turning pale. "Are you sure? Who can it be?"

"Do you forget that Mr. Madelling saved Miss Winters's life at some personal risk some time ago? Is it not possible that he may be disposed to develop love out of her natural gratitude for the service? I saw them together at the Madison Street Church last Sunday night, and I should judge, from their manner toward each other, that Mr. Madelling has made good use of his advantage. Remember, a girl must feel some obligation to a man who risks his life to save hers."

"Ah! I should have no fear of Madelling. His principles would make him ineligible. Do you know that he is a blatant infidel? A sincere Christian girl like Miss Winters might endure his company for an evening out of gratitude for the service he is supposed to have rendered her, but as a lover, she would never think of him for a moment."

"Perhaps she does not know of his infidelity. Young men are generally shrewd enough to avoid subjects which would be unpleasant to their friends."

"She must know; she shall know! I will warn her."

"That is just a man's way!" said Miss Havelock. "Why, Miss Winters would naturally think you were aspersing your rival's character from interested motives. Now, a woman would go to work in a very different way. She would let the disclosure come from some other lips—his own for instance."

"You are right; why, Miss Havelock, you are a most excellent mentor. Your advice is a treasure. I shall take it with pleasure. There will be no difficulty about it. Madelling's temper is most explosive. If he has sufficient provocation, he will put himself on record beyond the possibility of mistake. I have tried to force him into speaking plainly and publicly on the subject, but not with all the pressure I could bring to bear. Now I will set to work in earnest."

"If you succeed you will do Miss Winters a service, and advance your own interests at the same time; but how will you do it?"

"I have an oration to deliver next Saturday morning, and I will throw hot shot into the infidel camp. It is my duty to fight my Master's enemies, and I shall do it without fear or reservation."

"You are a brave man" said Belle repressing a feeling of disgust at the sanctimonious disguise cast over the man's real object. "I hope you will succeed. If you do arouse Mr. Madelling to come out in his true colors, and yet that fails to set Miss Winters against him, come to me and we will consider what else can be done to prevent this most incongruous match."

"I will, I will!" said Duneman. "You are a true friend. I can never tell you how much I am obliged to you for your counsel."

"Wait until you are married," said Belle, with a smile. Duneman laughed and blushed as he rose and bade her good-night. "I wonder if he thinks that he deceives me," said Belle, giving a sigh of relief when the door closed on her visitor. "I suppose to a certain extent he deceives himself. But what a hollow-hearted hypocrite he is! How any one who has much to do with Christians can believe in the elevating influence of religion, is more than I can understand." Possibly if any one had been there to hear her, she might have been reminded that human nature without religion was also a sorry spectacle, and if an example were necessary Belle herself could furnish it.

A common subject of remark during the following week among the students in the college, was the blunders that Duneman made in his recitations. It seemed as if he had made no preparation for them of any kind, and there was some speculation as to the cause.

On Saturday morning the problem received an unexpected solution; for it was then seen that other matters had been engrossing his attention during the week. A larger audience than usual had gathered in Chapel Hall to hear the speeches of the young aspirants for oratorical honors. Hadley had been mistaken in supposing that his opportunity would come that day. As it happened, the class to which he belonged would not "exhibit" until the next morning devoted to these exercises, which would be in three weeks.

The students were allowed to choose their subjects ad libitum, and usually the title of an oration was not announced until the speaker himself made it known. It was thought best by the Faculty to allow a large measure of liberty among the young men and women in the expression of their sentiments, and thus far no evil results had come from this policy. True, many of the effusions were ridiculously crude and puerile, but as many of the performers were mere novices in public speaking, they were laughed at good-humoredly and their blunders readily excused. However, some of the addresses delivered by the older and better-trained students would, in the opinion of the students, have done credit to a public lecture-platform or to the halls of legislation.

"Let me see," said Dane; "I believe that Duneman belongs to the class that exhibits to-day, doesn't he?"

"Of course he does!" Hadley replied. "I wonder what kind of stuff he will pour into our ears."

"Something sufficiently diluted, I'll wager." And then suddenly changing the topic he added, "Ah! I see that Miss Havelock is here."

And George pointed her out to his friend. She appeared nervous and impatient, having the air of one who was waiting in anxious expectancy for an important event.

There were usually two speakers from each of the four college classes. The representatives of all the lower classes and one of the seniors had spoken, leaving Duneman for the last. As he stepped to the platform, all eyes were bent upon him, and, according to the custom of the Grand Central College, he was soundly applauded while he made his bow. It must not be thought, because his mental endowment was inferior to that of some of his classmates, that he was an intellectual imbecile. He had considerable power of mental grasp, and his abilities, though not remarkable, shone out more conspicuously perhaps in his public speeches than anywhere else.

More than that, his voice was pleasant and well modulated, his gesticulations were graceful, and in the unfolding of a theme he showed not a little logical skill. Another characteristic feature of his public addresses, which was in his favor before an audience, was his faculty of putting a thought in a strategic light, or in a startling and unexpected manner, with a dash of histrionic art, so that his hearers were frequently thrilled by surprises that moved them to applause. Add to this a large amount of self-confidence, concealed under a mask of well-feigned modesty, and the portrait of Mr. Duneman, as he appeared upon the platform, is as complete as necessary.

The announcement of his theme caused a movement of surprise in the audience, especially among those who were inclined to be sceptical. His opening sentence vibrated in clear, modulated tones through the hall:

"The theme which I have chosen for my discussion to-day is, 'The Moral Laxity of Unbelievers.'"

The eyes of the Professors, who occupied seats upon the platform in the rear of the speakers, were bent curiously upon Duneman, and an involuntary rustle in the audience bore witness to the sensation the announcement had produced. Belle Havelock cast a stealthy glance toward the seat where Madelling, with Dane, was sitting, and noticed that his face flushed, and that he made an uneasy movement as if under nervous excitement. Then an angry scowl came to his brow and a fierce gleam shot from his eyes. As Belle noticed these symptoms of perturbation, she settled herself in her seat in full expectation of an explosive interruption of the orator, which would make a sensation in the college that would never be forgotten.

THE PILLAR OF CLOUD AND FIRE.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.

S. S. Lesson for August 26. Numbers 9: 15–23. Golden Text, Ps. 43: 3.

The Tabernacle Hidden—The Presence of God in the Human Tabernacle—Shade and Illumination—Guidance Granted to Those who Depend Upon It—The Voice of the Spirit Recognized and Obeyed—Hurry and Dilatoriness both to be Avoided—The Responsibility of every Movement with God—Every Need Provided for—Patience Demanded—The Desert Experience a Necessary Preparation.

AFTER Moses had completed the Tabernacle—carrying out, in its erection and furnishing, the exact plan of God—both the outside and the inside were filled with glory by the manifest Presence of God. "A cloud covered the tent of the congregation" (the glory was without), "and the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle" within," . . . The cloud of the Lord was upon the tabernacle by day, and fire was upon it by night, in the sight of all the house of Israel throughout all their journeys." (Ex. 40: 34, 38.) The tabernacle was hidden, covered, clothed with the cloud of glory. As God fills His church, the church becomes more hidden. When the child of God is built up into Him, he himself becomes hidden, that the glory may be seen. But the glory of God which is seen upon him is only the index of the glory within. The very purpose of the tabernacle was that God's people should have a witness to His dwelling among them. All the beauty of the tabernacle itself was for the eye of God, the presence of God for the eye of man. The presence of God was not an occasional or an intermittent thing. "On the day that the tabernacle was reared up, the cloud covered the tabernacle," namely, the tent of the testimony; "and at even there was upon the tabernacle, as it were, the appearance of fire, until the morning."

So it Was Alway.

The cloud covered it by day, and the appearance of fire by night. The heat of an earthly sun was tempered by day, and the warmth of a divine fire was kindled by night. The presence of God was a shadow from the heat, but also a glowing light in the darkness. While the heathen around saw in their gods only something to terrify, the presence of God among His people was love and mercy: His glory is His goodness. It is the experience of many Christians that the conscious presence of God with them is an intermittent thing; one day they may bask in its glory, the next day they may think that God has forsaken them. Those who rest in the continued consciousness of the presence of God know also what His guidance is. But, like Moses, they have gone outside the tabernacle of their being, and given up the possession of it to God. They dwell in Him, and He dwells in them. Their home, their citizenship, their claim, is in God; they are heirs of God, that His home, His portion, His inheritance may be in them. And this is not a mere doctrine, but a glorious, precious reality.

"And when the cloud was taken up from the tabernacle, then, after that the children of Israel journeyed"; if God moved, they moved with Him. "And in the place where the cloud abode, there the children of Israel pitched their tents." Where God abode that was the place for them. Oh, how many Christians trust to their own judgment or that of friends, or, it may be, to the way in which circumstances turn, to guide them, instead of waiting for the direct guidance of God! He never guides contrary to His written word, but very often His guidance is contrary to our judgment. We need to be very still in order to perceive when the cloud is taken up. If we are living in habitual communion with God, there will be a quiet consciousness that a kind of sense how really He is at hand, so really within, to undertake anything which is put to Him; that it is just as though a visible person were there; it is a reality, not a dream or an imagination, that He is there. When the cloud lifts, there is a consciousness that something is on the move; God's plan for us may not be developed, but there is a sense that some change is at hand. Then is the time to prove whether, in very deed, our will is given up to the Lord. Philip went down to Samaria, and there was so blest that "the people with one accord gave heed unto the things which Philip spake, hearing and seeing the miracles which he did. . . . and there was great joy in that city." (Acts 8: 6–8.) Philip's human judgment might have led him to think that he was indispensable in the place where he had been so used of God: but the cloud was lifted. God called him to go away into the desert. He did not begin to wonder whether, indeed, it was God who had spoken to him, or whether it was his own idea. The voice of the Holy Ghost was known well by the first discipies; "he arose and went." When the cloud lifts,

However Strange it May Seem to us, we have not to weigh the bearings of the question, but simply to obey. God's directions are clear enough, but we are so little versed in the language of the Holy Ghost that often we do not recognize what He says to us. It is very true that the subject of divine guidance is one which Satan has terribly caricatured. Some have thought they were guided by God into all kinds of extravagances and vagaries, and also into error and sin. The guidance of God is unlike all other—it never exalts man; it keeps him under the cover of the cloud of His presence.

To be always and surely led of God, we need to believe that He wishes to guide us, and really wants us to know His will; perplexity and conflict always come from doubt or from self-will. Some of us have a high value for time, and cannot bear to see the moments wasted, and our temptation is to be in a hurry; but if we would be guided by God, we must learn to trust Him with the use of time; what He can afford, who is the universal Proprietor, we can afford also. "When the cloud tarried long upon the tabernacle many days, then the children of Israel kept the charge of the Lord, and journeyed not." Every step we take without waiting for the Lord's direction, we have to retrace. Jonah had to return to Nineveh when he ran away from God, and Peter had to see God heal the ear of Malchus, which he, in his rash zeal, had cut off.

"So it was when the cloud abode from even unto the morning, and that the cloud was taken up in the morning, then they journeyed; whether it was by day or by night that the cloud was taken up, they journeyed." There was no question as to whether it was convenient or not, whether family circumstances were suitable, or whether they were in health to travel. If God was indeed the Father of His people, all this responsibility belonged to Him. He had already shown His wondrous providence in making a way through the sea. With such a Pioneer, capable of such road-making, overcoming such difficulties, how could they fear any way by which He should lead them? He had rained down bread from heaven, and continued to do so daily. He made the spring of water which He brought forth from the stony rock accompany them all along their journey; how could they fear starvation? He had promised them that He would take sickness from the midst of them (Ex. 23: 25), and the record of their journeyings was this: "He brought them forth also with silver and gold, and there was not one feeble person among their tribes." (Ps. 105: 37.) How, then, could they anticipate sickness? He cared for their very clothing, so that Moses could remind them, "Thy raiment waxed not old upon thee, neither did thy foot swell these forty years." (Deut. 8: 4.) How could they, with their eye upon such a God, fear any step which He might lead them to take?

Most of the fear which believers have of the direct leading of God, arises from the fact that they are not living in the presence of an indwelling God. Christ does not dwell in their hearts by faith (Eph. 3: 17), the mystery which hath been hid from ages and generations, but now is made manifest to God's saints. . . . "Christ in you the hope of glory" (Col. 1: 26, 27), may be held by them as a doctrine, but it is not a living experience, which transcends all the other realities of life. If the tabernacle of their being were filled with the glory of an indwelling God, so near as to dwell within them, they would be sufficiently acquainted with Him to trust Him implicitly, and then there would be to the making known of His will. God would, however, teach us to be attentive to His directions. The ark of the covenant over which the glory rested, was carried before the people on their journeys. "When ye see the ark of the covenant of the Lord your God, and the priests and the Levites bearing it, then ye shall remove from your place (when the ark is gone away, then the place which was God's place before, becomes our place till we follow Him), and go after it. Yet there shall be a space between you and it, about two thousand cubits by measure [about six-tenths, or rather more than half a mile]: come not near unto it, that ye may know the way by which ye must go." (Josh. 3: 3, 4.) There must be a space sufficient for the people to observe the turns which were taken by the priests who carried the ark. God wants us to observe His movements in our lands, our churches, our families, our own souls, that we may learn His ways.

Perhaps there is nothing in which we are exercised so much as in patience by depending upon the Lord for His direction. Oh, let us never forget that we are no more masters of our moments than of anything else; this is God's property; if He holds us back from any course, let us trust His infallible wisdom and true economy of time. Whether it was two days, or a month, or a year that the cloud tarried upon the tabernacle, the children of Israel abode in their tents and journeyed not. What? When God had called them to take possession of the promised land? Was it not a loss of time? Did it not seem most tantalizing? He who had "prepared for them a city," was preparing them for an eternal land of promise, and He sacrificed the lesser good for the greater. Obedience, patience, and trust in God were to them than the milk and honey of the land of Canaan. Therefore, it was only when the cloud was taken up that they journeyed. It needs as much faith not to move sometimes as to move at others. "At the commandment of the Lord they rested in their tents, and at the commandment of the Lord they journeyed: they kept the charge of the Lord at the commandment of the Lord by the hand of Moses."

THE MASTER'S QUESTIONS.

"If any man serve Me, let him follow Me; and where I am, there shall also My servants be: if any man serve Me, him will My Father honor."—JOHN xii. 26.

Have ye looked for sheep in the desert,
For those who have missed their way?
Have ye been in the wild waste places,
Where the lost and wandering stray?
Have ye trodden the lonely highway,
The foul and the darksome street?
It may be ye'd see in the gloaming
The print of My wounded feet.

Have ye folded home to your bosom
The trembling neglected lamb,
And taught to the little lost one
The sound of the Shepherd's name?
Have ye searched for the poor and needy,
With no clothing, no home, no bread?
The Son of Man was among them—
He had no where to lay His head.

Have ye carried the living water,
To the parched and thirsty soul?
Have ye said to the sick and wounded,
"Christ Jesus makes thee whole?"
Have ye told My fainting children
Of the strength of the Father's hand?
Have ye guided the tottering footsteps
To the shore of the "golden land?"

Have ye stood by the sad and weary,
To smooth the pillow of death,
To comfort the sorrow-stricken,
And strengthen the feeble faith?
And have ye felt, when the glory
Has streamed through the open door
And flitted across the shadows,
That I had been there before?

Have ye wept with the broken-hearted
In their agony of woe?
Ye might hear Me whispering beside you,
"'Tis the pathway I often go!"
My brethren, My friends, My disciples,
Can ye dare to follow Me?
Then, wherever the Master dwelleth,
There shall the servant be!

A teaspoonful added to a glass of hot or cold water, and sweetened to the taste, will be found refreshing and invigorating.

The success of some of the agents employed by B. F. Johnson & Co., Publishers, Richmond, Va., is truly marvelous. It is not an unusual thing for their agents to make as high as $20 and $30 a day, and sometimes their profits run up as high as $40 and $50—even more. But we hesitate to tell you the whole truth, or you will scarcely believe we are in earnest. Write them and see for yourself what they will do for you.

Christian Work in Mexico.

Through the reading of the Holy Scriptures translated into Spanish some earnest souls in Mexico have, by God's blessing, been led to a clear knowledge of the Gospel. From their numbers able preachers of the Christian faith in its primitive purity have been raised up, around whom congregations have been gathered from among the humble poor, who have been the first to publicly welcome and defend the pure Gospel in Mexico. The members of these congregations, rich in faith, have worked earnestly and bravely for Christ and His truth among their fellow countrymen in that beautiful Southern portion of North America called Mexico. Schools have been established by them, in which large numbers of bright boys and girls have received a good secular education and have been carefully taught the Christian faith. From the children thus educated faithful Christian workers have been raised up. A Mexican Branch of the Church of Christ, that maintains the faith in its purity and integrity, has been organized among these native Christians in the Republic of Mexico. The members of this Mexican Church of Christ, though gathered mostly from among the poor, are yet doing a most important Christian work. To continue that work, we need to pay a few leading workers small monthly salaries, and also to defray some current expenses. To raise the needed funds we have formed a society with an office at 43 Bible House, New York, U. S., and should be pleased to have many of our fellow Christians join this society by becoming regular contributors to its treasury. We are trying to secure monthly or quarterly contributions to meet the regular monthly expenses of the work. In order to continue and extend the work, we wish to raise four hundred dollars a month, by endeavoring to have four hundred persons each give on an average one dollar every month to this object, leaving the donors to give less or more as they may be able and willing.

We earnestly invite all who will, to join us in this systematic effort in behalf of the cause of Christ in Mexico, by becoming monthly subscribers to this fund. We have already regular subscribers whose gifts amount monthly to over eighty dollars, and a growing circle of friends who are forwarding us occasional donations.

This Mexican Church of Christ is a very effective instrumentality through which to do Christian work among the many millions on this Western Hemisphere who speak the Spanish language, comparatively few of whom have ever had a Bible in their hands. A beautiful church building has been secured in the City of Mexico as the centre of the activities of this Mexican Church of Christ. Through the workers connected with that centre more than forty congregations have been gathered from among the poor in different parts of the Republic of Mexico. We have some faithful and able preachers now in the field, but more young men need to be trained for the ministry. Multitudes of Protestant children in Mexico, some of them orphans, need to be educated. We make three requests of you, Christian reader: first, that you will, if possible, become a monthly or quarterly subscriber in behalf of this Christian work; second, that you will try and induce your friends also to contribute to it; third, that you will remember this precious work in Mexico in your prayers.

We most sincerely thank all who are already generously contributing to this Christian work for their timely and generous gifts, and we earnestly invite many others, to unite with us in aiding it by also becoming monthly subscribers in its behalf. Those who may not feel that they can give as much as a dollar a month are earnestly asked to give what they can, whenever they are able—EVERY LITTLE HELPS. Fellow Christian, if you will generously consent to contribute a dollar a month or more or less to the work, will you kindly inform me of the fact? Contributions either large or small can be mailed directly to my address as follows:

THE obloquy and scorn of both political parties, which must inevitably be endured by the man who accepts the position of standard-bearer of the Prohibition party in the National campaign, will this year fall upon a man who in his boyhood had some experience of the consequences of representing an unpopular cause. Nearly half a century ago a little town in Michigan was in the ferment of political excitement. Not only every man but every boy was expected to declare his preference for Harrison or Van Buren. One lad, however, a poor boy, only twelve years old, the son of a widow, had the audacity to declare that he was neither for Harrison nor Van Buren, but for James G. Birney. Nor was he disposed to make any secret of his political faith. The other boys belonged to old parties with campaign funds, and therefore had no difficulty in getting neat little banners. The widow's son was not so fortunate, but he was not to be beaten on that account. A few cents were earned by the manufacture and sale of molasses candy, and they were invested in a yard of muslin; a little axle grease served for paint, his mother's broom lost its handle to make a staff (which cost him a flogging), and the boy was equipped with a banner bearing the legend

"Birney and Lemoyne."

The little fellow had the courage to show it, too, in the rival camps, and to endure the juvenile molestation it provoked. He even took it into a Democratic meeting, and displayed it in front of the speakers' platform. "See here, boy, go away with your dirty rag," said one of the orators. In no way disconcerted, the Birney boy retorted, "This dirty rag will swallow up all other banners some day." The Birney boy who thus prophesied was Clinton B. Fisk. Twenty years afterward, when the cause symbolized by the dirty rag was triumphant, and the same orator was then singing its praises, Fisk had the gratification of reminding him of the prophecy.

The widow's son was not a native of Clinton. He was born on December 8, 1828, at a little place in western New York, then known as Clapp's Corners, and now as Greigsville—so that he is now in his sixtieth year. It is a curious coincidence that the Prohibition candidate was Born in an Old Distillery.

His father was a blacksmith, the youngest of a family of sixteen children, a hardworking but somewhat eccentric man, who, hoping to better his circumstances, removed from the old location of the family, at Killingly, Conn., to Clapp's Corners. He settled in a small cottage, but, subsequently, as his business grew, and the building used as a distillery became vacant, he removed into it, and there his fifth son, Clinton Bowen Fisk, was born. The blacksmith is said, by people who remember him, to have been neither a temperance man nor a church-goer. He seldom or never heard preaching. But there was one droll exception. A Baptist minister from York drew up one day at the blacksmith's shop, and asked the cost of shoeing his horse all round. "Preach me a sermon right there on that horse-block," said the blacksmith, "and I'll do the job and not charge you a cent." The preacher agreed, the horse was shod, and the minister, nothing loth, mounted the horse-block and solemnly and deliberately gave out his text, divided his subject, and preached a regular sermon, as if in church. (See Illustration, No. 1.)

Education Under Difficulties.

Business prospects in Clapp's Corners proved less encouraging than was expected, and the blacksmith determined on moving farther West. He set out for Lenawee County, Mich., to a village named Clinton, after Governor De Witt Clinton, after whom, also, Fisk had named his boy. Clinton henceforward was the family home. The blacksmith prospered, bought land, and built a house, but did not long enjoy it. He sickened and died in 1832, leaving his widow to bring up her six boys, the youngest a mere babe. Mrs. Fisk was a woman of energy and decision. She settled four of her boys among the farmers of the neighborhood, and, keeping Clinton and his younger brother with her, opened a boarding-house. The chance of obtaining an education seemed to little Clinton very small, and the little boy was very anxious about that. He had learned to read, but he wanted to write well. Seeing one day, outside the village store, a box addressed to the proprietors by some New York clerk, the lad went into the store and tried to buy the box, but that purchase being beyond his means, he bargained for the board on which the writing was. The price was named, the venders agreed to take pay in eggs, and to give credit, and the boy marched off with his prize. He had no slate, but his mother's hearthstone was broad and smooth, and on that, by the light of the fire, he copied the characters over and over again, until he could write the style easily and well. (See Illustration No. 2.)

was in the boy, and he could not fail to get on, but his opportunities were necessarily limited. The mother hoped to keep him with her, but he, too, had to go. When he was nine years old a good deacon agreed to take him and keep him until he was twenty-one. The boy was to do general work on the farm; was to have three months' schooling in each of the next four years, and, when he was of age, to receive $200 in cash, a horse, saddle, and bridle, and two suits of clothes. The mother wept, but she consented, and next day the boy went to the deacon's farm. There the deacon's hearthstone was put in requisition, and Clinton wrote and read in his spare moments, which were all too few. Books, too, were scarce. The first he ever bought was a mutilated copy of Shakespeare, and the price he paid for it was to hoe the vender's corn for two days. Later, and by similar means, he acquired the "Pilgrim's Progress," "Paradise Lost," and a "Columbian Orator."

A Momentous Event

occurred before he had been a year at the deacon's home. The Rev. Robert Powell, a Baptist missionary, was holding revival meetings in a school-house about two miles west. Clinton went after his day's work was done. The text was: "Come unto Me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." (Matt. 11: 28.) The poor, weary lad appreciated the words, and the talk that followed. He was interested, impressed, converted, and a few Sundays afterward Elder Powell baptized him in the river Raisin. A sturdy little Baptist he proved, too, well-grounded in the pros and cons of the immersion doctrine, though he afterward identified himself with the Methodists.

The bargain with the deacon was dissolved the next year by mutual consent. Clinton's little brother died, and his mother coveted her youngest surviving boy. Terms were arranged and the boy returned to his beloved mother.

Important Changes

in Clinton Fisk's life came during the next few years, which must be briefly summarized here. In 1841 Mrs. Fisk became the wife of a wealthy farmer at Spring Harbor. Clinton's opportunity was come at last, for the step-father was kind to him and sent him to Albion Seminary. There, among his fellow students, was the pretty bright-eyed girl who has been his wife now nearly forty years. He fell in love with Jeannette A. Crippen at once, and soon learned that she loved him well enough to wait for the time when he could make her his wife. His college course was interrupted at the end of 1844 by the death of his step-father. He then taught school in Bridgewater for a term. His mother, a little later, made another marriage, her third husband being our old acquaintance Elder Powell, who immersed Clinton in the Raisin. The youth could now return to Albion, but was prevented by an affection of the eyes, the result of his youthful exercises on the hearthstone, where the fitful light and the heat of the logs had injured his sight. He therefore accepted a position as clerk in a store in Manchester, Mich., where he displayed an unexpected capacity for business. There was, however, a powerful loadstone, drawing him elsewhere, in the person of Miss Crippen. Her father was in business at Coldwater, Mich., and thither Clinton Fisk went in 1848, ostensibly to visit his old college mate, her brother. Mr. Crippen, Sen., doubtless understood the affair, and being pleased with the young man, the firm was extended so as to include Clinton B. Fisk and his own son J. B. Crippen. The arrangement proved eminently successful; Clinton was a first-class business man and the most active and energetic member of the firm. Nothing now stood in the way of his marriage, and on February 20, 1850, the ceremony took place.

A Child's Question

was the occasion of the next vital change in Clinton Fisk's life. He had thrown himself into business pursuits with his characteristic ardor after his marriage, pushing the business, opening branches, buying property, establishing a bank, but neglecting his soul's concerns. Gradually he had ceased to think of religion and had given up prayer. One night, about four years after his marriage, his wife being occupied, his little three year-old daughter came and knelt at his knee to say her evening prayer (See Illustration No. 3). It was a trying experience to the young father, especially when Mary prayed, "God bless Papa and Mamma." It was still worse when rising to kiss him good-night, the child asked: "Papa, why don't you pray?" He made some light answer, and went off to the bank to balance the accounts. But he was deeply moved. When he returned home, and he and his wife were alone, he said: "Did you hear the question Mary asked me?" "Yes, Clinton, I heard it," said Mrs. Fisk. "Well, Jenny, I've been thinking it all over, and I've made up my mind, that with God's help we'll have the prayer there ought to be in this household hereafter. If you'll hand me the Bible we'll begin now." They did so; the family altar was reared, and never since, either in sunshine or in storm has it been taken down.

The panic of 1857 caught the young firm, as it caught so many others, unprepared. The bank and the business were swept before it, but creditors were settled with honorably, dollar for dollar. Fisk was terribly shaken by the anxiety and harass through which he had passed, and was for a time in broken health; but under his wife's loving care he speedily rallied and accepted an offer by an insurance company to be its agent in the West, with headquarters at St. Louis. The activity and travel suited him and diverted his mind. He recovered his old energy and did a profitable business for the company. He entered upon it in 1858, and continued it until all such work was suspended by

The Outbreak of War.

Fisk had taken a deep interest in the questions which had this issue, and he was among the first in Missouri to undertake the raising of a regiment, of which he was made colonel. While the regiment was forming, Fisk had religious services conducted in the Fair-grounds, and at the last one before marching, his old friend, Dr. Robert Nelson, officiated. Dr. Nelson took a practical view of the situation, warning the regiment against various sins which army life tended to induce. One of them was that of profane swearing. He told a story of a commodore who insisted that swearing was his department, and that no one else should swear on board his ship. "Now," said Dr. Nelson, "I want you to agree that Colonel Fisk shall do all the swearing for the Thirty-third Regiment. As many of you as will enter into this contract, stand up." Every man rose, and the covenant was made.

A Teamster's Profanity

subsequently recalled the incident. The men had been very careful to observe the contract, but one day, when General Fisk's command lay at Helena, after the Yazoo expedition, the General heard some fearful curses in the woods. He went to a bluff and looked over. There was a teamster with six mules who, coming through the wood, had snagged on a tree and broke the wagon-pole. The teamster's exasperation burst the contract, and he poured out maledictions on the Confederacy, the wood, the mules, and everything around. General Fisk walked back and sat down. By and by, soberly leading his six mules, along came the teamster. (See illustration No. 4.) Saluting him kindly, the General said: "John, didn't I hear some one swearing dreadfully over there a while ago? Who was it?" "That was me, sir," the man replied. "But," said General Fisk, "don't you remember the covenant made up at the Benton Barracks, between you and me and the others of the regiment, that I was to do all the swearing for the Thirty-third Missouri during the war?" "Oh, yes," the man answered promptly, "I remember that; but you were not there to do it, and it had to be done then."

General Fisk was as amused at this reply as he had been pained by the occasion for it, and gave it over to his staff. It gained wide currency, and afterward, through all the Mississippi region, whenever a teamster was heard cursing, some one would suggest that he wait till General Fisk came along to have the job.

A Soldier's Letter.

Shut away from all mail communication, during the six weeks that the Yazoo expedition lasted, when General Fisk returned to Helena all his men were eager for home news, and besieged the post-office tent at once. After receiving his own postal budget, with its precious letters from wife and children, and pastor and Sunday-school, General Fisk sat down on a log near his headquarters tent to peruse them. Presently an old soldier who did not recognize General Fisk came along and said, "Say, will you read my letter for me?" General Fisk turned and looked at him, and then reached out his hand, into which the letter was placed. In a straggling, downhill fashion, it was addressed to "John Shearer, Helena, Ark." "But can't you read it yourself, John?" the general asked. "No," the man answered, half ashamed "Then I will, of course," said the General.

The letter was from his wife, and General Fisk read it through, slowly, aloud. It spoke of the crops, and the harvest, and all the little affairs of home—"mentioning even Susy's new dress," and then it went on with a bit of wholesome reminder like this: "Now, John, I want you to remember the promise you made, as you were leaving me and the children, that you would be a good man." And as the General read on, big tears began to run down John's cheeks, until finally he raised the sleeve of his blue blouse and wiped them away. (See Illustration No 5.) "Well, John," asked the General, finally, "have you been the good man you promised to be?" Then with more tears came a sad story of drunkenness, and gambling, and sinful speech, until the General's heart ached. Disclosing his identity at last, somewhat to the man's confusion, General Fisk talked with him as a brother, and won his pledge of renewed consecration and a better life. John Shearer came to all the brigade prayer-meetings after that, a changed man.

After the War

General Fisk, who had gone through that long period without leave of absence, and without being off duty, taking his full share of the fighting, desired to return to his family and begin some kind of business that would make some provision for them. He was needed, however, for work that few could do so well as he. He was made assistant commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, and assigned to the States of Kentucky and Tennessee. The difficulties of his task were enormous, for the freedmen were prejudiced against their old work, and against their former owners.

The spirit in which he entered upon his task may be inferred from an address he issued to the freedmen, in the course of which he gave this advice as to "your old master": "He has had a hard time of it, during the war, as well as yourselves. His wealth has melted away like wax before the fire. His near relatives, and in many cases his sons, have died on the field of battle, or have been crippled for life. . . . You must think of these things, and think kindly of your old master. You have grown up with him, it may be, on the same plantations. Do not fall out now, but join your interests if you can, and live and die together."

Fisk University

was the direct outcome of the General's efforts on behalf of the freedmen. He recognized at the outset that an education must be placed within their reach. At first the Scriptures and the Spelling book covered the ground within his reach. He opened a school for freedmen in January, 1866, in a Government building west of Chattanooga depot. The charge of it was given to the American Missionary Association, but Gen. Fisk's purse and credit were its mainstay. As the school grew, its course of studies extended and it became Fisk University. The work was wonderfully successful, but its demands for money were awful. One of its crises was grandly met. A band of the students who took the title of the Fisk Jubilee Singers, went on a tour through Great Britain, where Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Bright, Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, Dr. Parker and other prominent men approving their object, recommended them to the public, and attended their concerts. By their efforts a clear profit of $100,000 was realized for the University.

General Fisk was finally mustered out of military service September 1, 1886. At President Grant's urgent request, however, he was for a time drawn into Government service. He was induced to make an attempt to do for the Indians something of the same kind of labor that he had done for the freedmen. The establishment of the Indian schools at Hampton, Va., Carlisle, Pa., etc., were largely due to his efforts. That part of his life's work, important as it was, cannot be described here. General Fisk's later years have been passed in the railroad business, though his interest in Sunday-schools,

Philanthropic and Temperance work, has occupied much of his time. He clung to the Republican party until 1884, but in that year the reception Miss Frances E. Willard and other Prohibition advocates met with at the Chicago Convention, convinced him that the gigantic evil of the liquor traffic could not be grappled with through that party. He was also convinced that by legislation alone could it be successfully dealt with, and he therefore joined hands with the Prohibition party. He ran in 1886 as Prohibition candidate for Governor of New Jersey, and his personal popularity attracted an unexpectedly large vote. The manner in which he conducted the campaign attracted the attention of the whole country, and rendered his nomination for the Presidency inevitable. On May 31 last, the Prohibition National Convention, at Indianapolis, nominated him by acclamation. For Vice-President, its candidate is Rev. John A. Brooks, D. D., of Missouri, whose portrait is on page 540 of this number.

The sketch of General Fisk's life given here is necessarily imperfect and fragmentary. We have endeavored to give such incidents as would throw light on the grand character of the man, but much more is needed to fully describe a life so full of activity as his. We would strongly recommend our readers to read the life of General Fisk, by Alphonso A. Hopkins, in a volume containing also the life of Dr. Brooks, price $1.00, published by Messrs. Funk & Wagnalls, Astor Place, New York, to whose courtesy in supplying us with advanced sheets of the work we are indebted for the materials for this sketch.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

A Man Sells Himself as a Slave.—"Sometimes native Christians develop remarkable zeal. In connection with the Baptist Missionary Society a native assistant became so interested in a number of his countrymen about to emigrate to Demerara, that he began earnestly their instruction. Having no money to pay his passage, he sold his person as a coolie, or slave, in order that he might have the privilege of accompanying them upon their voyage and preaching the gospel. When they reached their destination he gave them his spiritual ministrations, and at the same time diligently worked out his ransom and redeemed himself. He was so successful that he established a church of some two hundred members, who out of their deep poverty had so abounded in their liberality that they have not only sustained themselves, but they are sustaining a chapel and a missionary in their native city of Canton. I think that was an act of zeal worthy to be compared with any event upon our missionary annals."

A Gipsy-Boy's Death-Bed.—Mr. John Barnsley, said: "I read the other day a simple and touching story. A company of gipsies had encamped near a large town. A good lady, doing her Master's work, asked permission to enter one of the vans, and, after some delay, she was allowed to do so. She found inside a poor boy lying upon a wretched bed, and evidently at the very point of death. She spoke to him kindly, but received no answer. Then, stooping down, she whispered in his ear the old verse, 'God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son, that whoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life.' There was no reply. A second time she repeated it, and a second time there was no answer; a third time, kneeling down, she whispered in his ear the same verse, and then the eyes, already glazing in death opened, the thin white lips moved, and the answer slowly came, 'Nobody never told me this before, but thank Him kindly for it.' What a rebuke there was in these words! At this very moment there are myriads of men, women, and little children for whom Christ died, and whom He loves as much as He loves you and me, who, if they could hear the verse, which has helped so many, 'God so loved the world,' would say, 'Nobody never told me this before.'"

A Cannibal Island Converted.—Rev. J. Jones, of Maré, South Seas, said: "The island of Maré is one of the Loyalty Group. Mr. Cray and myself landed there as two young missionaries thirty-four years ago last October. The bulk of the people were then cannibals and savages of the fiercest description. The tribes determined, when they found that the chief of the converted people had resolved no more to fight, to see whether they could not destroy Christianity from the island, and they attacked us. The chief sent a message to me to say that he was coming down, and that he would cook my wife and me in his ovens for his men, and my little children he would not take so much trouble with, but would throw them upon the fire, and roast them as he did his yams. Now, we did not intend to run away from our work, but we wished to act prudently and to retire to some little island on the west, and await the storm blowing over. Although the angry cannibals came within sight of our premises, and attacked the village, and killed five of the people, God so disposed their hearts and so ordered events that they retired to a distant district. Then our Christian people took courage, and went forward to preach to them the Gospel of peace, and the chief who had threatened our lives said: 'I have heard what you have said in days gone by, when I heard you preach the Gospel. I have heard of Pharaoh—how he hardened his heart against God, and perished, and now I begin to fear the word of God. Go back and tell the missionary that I will never attack him again, or any of his people.' Subsequently this chief and all his people embraced Christianity."

TROUBLE ON BOTH SIDES.

A Vacation Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

THE cruel army of the Philistines must be taken and scattered. There is just one man, accompanied by his bodyguard, to do that thing. Jonathan is the hero of the scene. I know that David cracked the skull of the giant with a few pebbles well slung, and that three hundred Gideonites scattered ten thousand Amalekites by the crash of broken crockery; but here is a more wonderful conflict. Yonder are the Philistines on the rocks. Here is Jonathan with his bodyguard in the valley. On the one side is a rock called Bozez; on the other side is a rock called Seneh. These two were as famous in olden times, as in modern times are Plymouth Rock and Gibraltar. They were precipitous, unscalable, and sharp. Between these two rocks Jonathan must make his ascent. The day comes for

The Scaling of the Height.

Jonathan, on his hands and feet, begins the ascent. With strain and slip and bruise, I suppose, but still on and up, first goes Jonathan, and then goes his bodyguard. Bozez on one side, Seneh on the other. After a sharp tug, and push, and clinging, I see the head of Jonathan above the hole in the mountain; and there is a challenge, and a fight, and a supernatural consternation. These two men, Jonathan and his bodyguard, drive back and drive down the Philistines over the rocks, and open a campaign which demolishes the enemies of Israel. I suppose that the overhanging and overshadowing rocks on either side did not balk or dishearten Jonathan or his bodyguard, but only roused and filled them with enthusiasm as they went up. "There was a sharp rock on the one side, and a sharp rock on the other side."

My friends, you have been, or are now, some of you, in this crisis of the text. If a man meets one trouble he can go through with it. He gathers all his energies, concentrates them upon one point, and in the strength of God, or by his own natural determination, goes through it. But the man who has trouble to the right of him, and trouble to the left of him, is to be pitied. Did either trouble come along, he might endure it, but two troubles, two disasters, two overshadowing misfortunes, are Bozez and Seneh. God pity him! "There is a sharp rock on the one side, and a sharp rock on the other side."

In this crisis of the text is that man whose

him at the same time. Nine-tenths of all our merchants capsize in business before they come to forty-five years of age. There is some collision in commercial circles, and they stop payment. It seems as if every man must put his name on the back of a note before he learns what a fool a man is who risks all his own property on the prospect that some man will tell the truth. It seems as if a man must have a large amount of unsalable goods on his own shelf before he learns how much easier it is to buy than to sell. It seems as if every man must be completely burned out before he learns the importance of always keeping fully insured. It seems as if every man must be wrecked in a financial tempest before he learns to keep things snug in case of a sudden euroclydon.

When the calamity does come, it is awful. The man goes home in despair, and he tells his family "We'll have to go to the poor-house." He takes a dolorous view of everything. It seems as if he never could rise. But a little time passes, and he says: "Why, I am not so badly off after all; I have my family left."

Before the Lord turned Adam out of Paradise, he gave him Eve, so that when he lost Paradise he could stand it. Permit one who has never read but a few novels in all his life, and who has not a great deal of romance in his composition, to say, that if, when a man's fortunes fail, he has a good wife—he ought not to be despondent. "Oh," you say, "that only increases the embarrassment, since you have her also to take care of." You are an ingrate, for the woman as often supports the man as the man supports the woman. The man may bring all the dollars, but the woman generally brings the courage and the faith in God.

Well, this man of whom I am speaking, looks around, and he finds his family is left, and he rallies, and the light comes to his eyes, and the smile to his face, and the courage to his heart. In two years he is quite over it. He makes his financial calamity the first chapter in a new era of prosperity. He met that one trouble—conquered it. He sat down for a little while under the grim shadow of the rock Bozez; yet he soon rose, and began, like Jonathan, to climb. But how often it is that physical ailment comes with financial embarrassment. When the fortune failed it broke the man's spirit. His nerves were shattered. His brain was unnerved. I can show you hundreds of men in New York whose fortune and health failed at the same time. They came prematurely to the staff. Their hand trembled with incipient paralysis. They never saw a well day since the hour when they called their creditors together for a compromise. If such men are impatient, and peculiar, and irritable, excuse them. They had two troubles; either one of which they could have met successfully. If, the fortune had been retained, it would not have been so bad. The man could have bought the very best medical advice, and he could have had the very best attendance, and long lines of carriages would have stopped at the front door to enquire as to his welfare. But poverty on the one side, and sickness on the other, are Bozez and Seneh, and they interlock their shadows, and drop them upon the poor man's way. God help him! "There is a sharp rock on the one side, and a sharp rock on the other side."

When the Health Went,

Now, what is such a man to do? In the name of Almighty God, I will tell him what to do. Do as Jonathan did—climb; climb up into the sunlight of God's favor and consolation. I can go through the churches, and show you men who lost fortune and health at the same time, and yet who sing all day and dream of heaven all night. If you have any idea that sound digestion, and steady nerves, and clear eyesight, and good hearing, and plenty of friends, are necessary to make a man happy, you have miscalculated. I suppose that these overhanging rocks only made Jonathan scramble the harder and the faster to get up and out into the sunlight; and this combined shadow of invalidism and financial embarrassment has often sent a man up the quicker into the sunlight of God's favor and the noonday of His glorious promises.

It is a difficult thing for a man to feel his dependence upon God when he has ten thousand dollars in the bank, and fifty thousand dollars in Government securities, and a block of stores and three ships. "Well," the man says to himself, "it is silly for me to pray, 'Give me this day my daily bread,' when my pantry is full, and the canals from the west are crowded with bread stuffs destined for my storehouses." Oh, my friends, if the combined misfortunes and disasters of life have made you climb up into the arms of a sympathetic and compassionate God, through all eternity you will bless Him that in this world "there was a sharp rock on the one side, and a sharp rock on the other side."

Trouble at Home and Abroad.

Again, that man is in the crisis of the text who has home troubles and outside persecution at the same time. The world treats a man well just as long as it pays best to treat him well. As long as it can manufacture success out of his bone and brain and muscle, it favors him. The world fattens the horse it wants to drive. But let a man see it his duty to cross the track of the world, then every bush is full of horns and tusks thrust at him. They will belittle him. They will caricature him. They will call his generosity self-aggrandizement, and his piety sanctimoniousness. The very worst persecution will some time come upon him from those who profess to be Christians.

John Milton—great and good John Milton—so forgot himself as to pray, in so many words, that his enemies might be eternally thrown down into the darkest and deepest gulf of hell, and be the undermost and most dejected, and the lowest down vassals of perdition! And Martin Luther so far forgot himself as to say, in regard to his theological opponents: "Put them in whatever sauce you please, roasted, or fried, or baked, or stewed, or boiled, or hashed, they are nothing but asses!" Ah, my friends, if John Milton or Martin Luther could come down to such scurrility, what may you not expect from less elevated opponents? Now, sometimes the newspapers take after them; public opinion takes after them; and the unfortunate man is lied about until all the dictionary of Billingsgate is exhausted on him. You often see a man whom you know to be good and pure and honest, set upon by the world, and mauled by whole communities, while vicious men take on a supercilious air in condemnation of him; as though Lord Jeffreys should write an essay on gentleness, or Henry VIII. talk about purity, or Herod take to blessing little children.

Now, a certain amount of persecution rouses a man's defiance, stirs his blood for magnificent battle, and makes him fifty times more a man than he would have been without the persecution. So it was with the great reformer when he said: "I will not be put down; I will be heard." And so it was with Millard, the preacher, in the time of Louis XI. When Louis XI. sent word to him that unless he stopped preaching in that style, he would throw him into the river, he replied: "Tell the king that I will reach heaven sooner by water than he will reach it by fast horses." A certain amount of and inspiration, but too much of it, and too long continued, becomes the rock Bozez, throwing a dark shadow over a man's life. What is he to do then? Go home, you say. Good advice, that. That is just the place for a man to go when the world abuses him. Go home. Blessed be God for our quiet and sympathetic homes. But there is many a man who has the reputation of having a home when he has none. Through unthinkingness or precipitation, there are many matches made that ought never to have been made. An officiating priest cannot alone unite a couple. The Lord Almighty must proclaim banns. There is many home in which there is no sympathy, and no happiness, and no good cheer. The clamor of the battle may not have been heard outside, but God knows, notwithstanding all the playing of the "Wedding March," and all the odor of the orange-blossoms, and the benediction of the officiating pastor, there has been no marriage.

Sometimes men have awakened to find on one side of them the rock of persecution, and on the other side

The Rock of Domestic Infelicity.

What shall such an one do? Do as Jonathan did—climb. Get up the heights of God's consolation, from which we may look down in triumph upon outside persecution and home trouble. While good and great John Wesley was being silenced by the magistrates, and having his name written on the board-fences of London in doggerel, at that very time his wife was making him as miserable as she could—acting as though she were possessed by the devil, as I suppose she was; never doing him a kindness until the day she ran away, so that he wrote in his diary these words: "I did not forsake her; I have not dismissed her; I will not recall her." Planting one foot, John Wesley did, upon outside persecution, and the other foot on home trouble, he climbed up into the heights of Christian joy, and after preaching forty thousand sermons, and travelling two hundred and seventy thousand miles, reached the heights of heaven, though in this world he had it hard enough—"a sharp rock on the one side, and a sharp rock on the other."

The Widow's Struggle.

Again, that woman stands in the crisis of the text who has bereavement and a struggle for a livelihood at the same time. Without mentioning names, I speak from observation. Ah, it is a hard thing for a woman to make an honest living, even when her heart is not troubled, and she has a fair cheek, and the magnetism of an exquisite presence. But now the husband, or the father, is dead. The expenses of the obsequies have absorbed all that was left in the savings bank; and wan and wasted with weeping and watching, she goes forth—a grave, a hearse, a coffin behind her—to contend for her existence and the existence of her children. When I see such a battle as that open, I shut my eyes on the ghastliness of the spectacle. Men sit with embroidered slippers and write heartless essays about women's wages; but that question is made up of tears and blood, and there is more blood than tears. Oh, give women free access to all the realms where she can get a livelihood, from the telegraph office to the pulpit. Let men's wages be cut down before hers are cut down. Men have iron in their souls, and can stand it.

Make the Way Free to Her of the broken heart. May God put into my hand the cold, bitter cup of privation, and give me nothing but a windowless hut for shelter for many years, rather than that after I am dead there should go out from my home into the pitiless world a woman's arm to fight the Gettysburg, the Austerlitz, the Waterloo of life, for bread. And yet, how many women there are seated between the rock of bereavement on the one side, and the rock of destitution on the other! Bozez and Seneh interlocking their shadow and dropping them upon her miserable way. "There is a sharp rock on the one side, and a sharp rock on the other side."

What are such to do? Somehow, let them climb up into the heights of the glorious promise: "Leave thy fatherless children; I will preserve them alive, and let thy widows trust in Me." Or get up into the heights of that other glorious promise: "The Lord preserveth the stranger and relieveth the widow and the fatherless." Oh! ye sewing women, on starving wages. Oh! ye widows, turned out from the once beautiful home. Oh! ye female teachers, kept on niggardly stipend. Oh! ye despairing women, seeking in vain for work, wandering along the docks, and thinking to throw yourself into the river last night. Oh! ye women of weak nerves, and aching sides, and short breath, and broken heart, you need something more than human sympathy; you need the sympathy of God. Climb up into His arms. He knows it all, and He loves you more than father or mother, or husband ever could or ever did; and, instead of sitting down, wringing your hands in despair, you had better begin to climb. There are heights of consolation for you, though now "there is a sharp rock on one side, and a sharp rock on the other side."

Ruin in Life and Eternity.

Again, that man is in the crisis of the text who has a wasted life on the one side, and an unilluminated eternity on the other. Though a man may all his life have cultured deliberation and self-poise, if he gets into that position, all his self-possession is gone. There are all the wrong thoughts of his existence, all the wrong deeds, all the wrong words—strata above strata, granitic, ponderous, overshadowing. That rock I call Bozez. On the other side are all the retributions of the future, the thrones of judgment, the eternal ages, angry with his long defiance. That rock I call Seneh. Between these two rocks Lord Byron perished, and Alcibiades perished, and Herod perished, and ten thousand times ten thousand have perished.

Oh! man immortal, man redeemed, man blood-bought, climb up out of those shadows. Climb up by the way of the Cross. Have your wasted life forgiven; have your eternal life secured. This morning just take one look to the past, and see what it has been, and take one look to the future and see what it threatens to be. You can afford to lose your health, you can afford to lose your property, you can afford to lose your reputation; but you cannot afford to lose your soul. That bright, gleaming, glorious, precious, eternal possession you must carry aloft in the day when the earth burns up and the heavens burst.

You see from my subject that when a man goes into the safety and peace of the Gospel, he does not demean himself. There is nothing in religion that leads to meanness or unmanliness. The Gospel of Jesus Christ only asks you to climb as Jonathan did—climb toward heaven, climb into the sunshine of God's favor. To become a Christian is not to go meanly down; it is to come gloriously up—up into the communion of saints; up into the peace that passeth all understanding; up into the companionship of angels. He lives up; he dies up.

Oh, then, accept the wholesale invitation which I make this morning to all the people! Come up from between your invalidism and financial embarrassments. Come up from between your bereavements and your destitution. Come up from between a wasted life and an unillumined eternity. Like Jonathan, climb with all your might, instead of sitting down to wring your hands in the shadow and in the darkness—"a sharp rock on the one side, and a sharp rock on the other side."

AT MR. MOODY'S BIBLE CONFERENCE.

THE closing session of the Bible Conference at Northfield, Mass., on August 10, showed no decline of interest, no weariness, but rather increased eagerness to hear all that the eminent men present had to say. The venerable Father Chiniquy, who has suffered so much to spread the light of the true gospel among the benighted members of the Church of Rome, of which he was a priest for a quarter of a century, was the first speaker on Friday. In the course of his address, he said:

"I do not come here to speak against the Catholics; I would prefer to die a thousand times rather than say aught against them. I have been bruised and have bled to give them the true gospel of Christ. I preach against the errors of the Catholic Church, but I do not hate the Catholics. When men are in a ship, and see it is going to be wrecked, they cry out to be saved. I was crossing the sea of life in a royal ship. Everything about it was magnificent. The sails were made of cloth of gold, and it was filled with precious things. One day I went to the bottom of the ship, and found that it was rotten. As we were passing a rock, I jumped from that ship upon the rock, which was Christ Jesus. You Protestants know nothing about the Roman Catholics. You have created a Catholic in your imagination, but he is not the true one. Because the Catholic Church is a Christian church, you do nothing to convert them. The Catholic Church is an idolatrous church, and their idolatry is of a more diabolical kind than that of any heathen nation. When I was a priest I was as religious and as faithful as I could be. I was worshipping a Christ, and was doing everything to show my adoration for Him. What was that Christ? It was an idol. I was cruelly deceived."

"The priest must take a solemn oath not to interpret the Bible according to common sense and common intelligence, but according to the rules and principles laid down by the Pope and Cardinals of the Church of Rome. Thus the Catholics have a Bible, but they cannot follow it. God has sent the Roman Catholics among you, because you have the true gospel and can teach them the truth. See that you heed the admonition. The hierarchy of the Church have sworn to destroy your land and your cities and your liberty. I was one of the members of a Catholic council when it was determined that not a single American Protestant should have any position under the Government from president down to a city policeman, if Roman Catholic influence could prevent the appointment. They have already determined that your sons shall attend the colleges of the Jesuits and your daughters the schools of the nuns. They have the power over the Board of Education in New York and in Chicago, and it is high time the American people were waking up to save their country. And how can it be done? Not by attacking the Catholics in the Catholic Church, but by converting them."

gave an address on the Acts of the Apostles, the value of which book he thought was too much overlooked by preachers and teachers. He regarded the Acts as the gospel of the Holy Ghost. "The receiving of the Holy Ghost was the book of Acts in a nutshell. The other gospels tell us what Christ did in the body. Acts tell us what He did in His glorified state. It might better be called the Acts of a glorified and exalted Christ. Christ's real work did not begin till after His death. The four other gospels are four currents that sweep into one grand stream in the Acts of the Apostles. Let us take up the ten sermons preached in this book. Five were preached by Peter, one by Stephen, and four by Paul, nine by apostles and one by a layman. If you will read them carefully you will notice that they preached of the death of Christ. They had been witnesses of His death, and told what they had seen and heard. What this world wants is more witnesses for Christ. After Peter got the power of the Holy Ghost he began to preach. I don't think he had preached five minutes before the Holy Ghost broke up the sermon, for the people began to cry out, 'What shall we do to be saved?'

The council told these men not to preach in the name of Christ. What a wily old devil it was to put that into the heads of the council. I might preach with all the eloquence of Demosthenes, and the newspapers might applaud, but let me preach in the name of Christ, and all the hounds of hell will be let loose upon me.

"In the third sermon, the Holy Ghost tells them what to say. They might have studied five years and they could not have given such an answer as that, for the answer came from the throne of God. In the fourth sermon, they filled Jerusalem with their doctrines. People talk about obstacles. Was there ever a darker city to preach in than Jerusalem? Christ had been crucified there by the Jews. Yet were these apostles His witnesses in that wicked city. Witnesses in our courts don't have to be theologians or college-bred men, so you can be witnesses for Christ if you can't write a sermon. The fifth sermon is the longest one in the Bible, except the Sermon on the Mount. Stephen preached it.

"The sixth is the first sermon to the Gentiles. We are especially interested in this, to see what doctrine Peter preached to the Gentiles. He preached the death and resurrection of Christ, and the Holy Spirit put His seal upon it. The eighth sermon was the first sermon preached by Paul, and it was the same old doctrine. Paul preached it to those educated Athenians, and it was just as effectual to save them. In the ninth sermon Paul preached before the mob in Jerusalem, and in the tenth he pleaded before Agrippa, not for his life and his liberty, but that Agrippa might accept Christ."

A WIFE'S PREMONITION.

The editor of Words and Weapons relates a remarkable instance which came under his own notice, of a wife's premonition of her husband's danger. He says: "At a union prayer-meeting held in a New Jersey village not long since, some cultured ladies were very much troubled by the prayer of a woman who seemed greatly concerned for her husband. Her manner, tones and words combined to give the idea of extravagant emotion, so that not only the ladies referred to, but a number of others in the congregation, seemed to feel that the proprieties were considerably disregarded. Among other seemingly wild expressions, this woman made use of the words, 'Oh I fear he is losing his last chance!' The next week these ladies met a gentlemen who had attended the meeting and to whom they had criticised the prayer. They said that they wanted to retract their statements, and that they would never again be guilty of what might prove to be rash and inconsiderate words concerning the prayer of any brother or sister, for the previous day the man whose wife had felt that he was 'losing his last chance' had taken his own life, and was now about to be carried to the hopeless grave of a suicide."

A LITTLE OUTCAST LEPER.

A very pathetic incident is mentioned by Miss Lathrop, who is laboring in India, in the course of a letter to the Missionary Link. She says: "While singing in a house in the Mohammedan quarter of the village, I noticed a little girl standing outside, and trying to join. I motioned her to sit down, but she shook her head and turned partly away. A woman, sitting close by, said to me. 'She is sick; look at her hands.' Involuntarily I did so, and before she had time hurriedly to cover them with her cloth, I saw she had the fatal marks of leprosy. I hope she did not know I saw her hands, as I looked quickly up to her face—such a sad, sweet face as it was. I asked her if she wished to learn, and she said she very much wished it, but her brother forbade her going to school, and had promised to teach her at home, in the evening. The teacher says she often comes, and sits while the others learn, and in this way she is getting the words of the hymns, and, I hope, the Bible verses. Finding her mother peeping at me through the purdah next door, I stopped and spoke with her. She told me the child was often too ill to go out of the house, but when she could, she loved to go and sit by the school. She said if she could get the permission of the husband and brother, the missionary might read and sing with them. I saw two young women peeping over her shoulder, and I hope we may be allowed to visit there. I am sure, as you read of this afflicted little one, you will join us in praying that the words of the Lord Jesus may come to be her stay and comfort."

AN OLD JEWISH RABBI LEARNING.

The Rev. B. Z. Friedmann, who is laboring among the Jews of Safed, writes: "Among the Jewish visitors who have come to me for religious conversation is an old Rabbi, with whom I spent a long time, listening to the confession of his belief in Christ. He received a New Testament from Mr. Oczeret, and has been carefully reading it. What astonishes me most is that his faith in Christ has not in the least shaken his attachment to Jewish law and customs. It was with great difficulty I could persuade him to believe that I am not scrupulous in cosher or trephah [the clean or unclean food in the ceremonial law]. The truth of the Gospel has been forced upon his conviction by reading the simple narrative of the Holy Gospels, without his realizing the true liberty of the Gospel of Christ. The next week his wife called upon me at the dépôt, telling me that her husband was ill and wished me to visit him. I went at once, and found him in bed, suffering great pain. I had some friendly conversation with him and several neighbors who were present. These gradually left, and I was left alone with the patient. 'I was thinking,' he then said, 'about the words in Kedushah for the Sabbath.' (The hymn of the Seraphim, Isaiah 6:3, appointed for the congregation to sing on the Sabbath, the words being 'And He will redeem us the second time.') This phrase, he thought, must refer to the first and second coming of the Messiah, the truth of which is commonly denied by the Synagogue at large. 'There are many prophecies in Scripture,' I said, 'by which two comings of Christ, first to suffer and atone for the sins of all who believe in Him, and again the second time to reign and judge the world, can be easily proved.' When I saw, however, that he was inclined to think his own explanation the true one, I did not wish to discourage him further. In his room he showed me three New Testaments. The Epistle to the Hebrews he generally carries about with him. He is much disturbed by visitors, but when alone reads the New Testament, especially the Gospel of St. John. He needs, of course, still much enlightenment. May the Lord grant him more light, and bring him to a saving knowledge of Christ our Redeemer!"

A LONG SEARCH FOR A WIFE.

Ten thousand miles of travel for a wife has been cheerfully undergone by a young man in Chicago. Some three or four years ago he was living in Nottingham, England, where he fell in love with an extremely pretty girl, seventeen years of age. He believed that his affection was reciprocated, and a day was set for their marriage. But the girl was very vacillating, and a short time before the wedding-day, she ran away to America. The young man followed, found her in New York, and forgave her. She was again willing to be married, but again changed her mind, and before the young man's arrangements for the marriage was completed, she secretly slipped on board a steamer and returned to England. Her lover, still bent on making her his wife, followed, went to Nottingham, but found that she had left that town. He spent some weeks in searching for her in England, and at length discovered that she had gone to Paris. He traced her from that city through a long continental wandering, which at last led him back to Nottingham, where he caught her, and she consented to be married on condition that they should go at once to America. The lover gave his promise, and the ceremony at last took place. They came to New York, but, after a few weeks, removed to Chicago, where they settled down. Last week the young husband, after only six months of married life, reported to the Chicago police that his wife was missing, and asked them to assist him in searching for her. He said she had already involved him in ten thousand miles of travel, but he was ready to tramp ten thousand more, if necessary. Few men would have thought a woman so wayward and inconstant, worthy of any mere trouble, and we naturally infer the ardor and intensity of his love by his readiness to undertake another search. What, then, must be the love of God for His people, whose sins and unfaithfulness have been a continual trial of it? (Nehemiah 9:16, 17.)

PRAYER IN A CYCLONE.

In the course of some reminiscences of his recent voyages the Rev. Henry Varley mentions the following incident: "We were voyaging to Melbourne. The day had been close and sultry, and the rapidly falling glass indicated a coming storm. One short hour and we were driving before the tempest, which lashed the sea into foam and fury. 'The tail end of an Indian cyclone.' our commander whispered, as I stood watching the stowing of the canvas. Great seas struck us, and literally filled the main deck from end to end. 'There, sir,' said our gallant captain,' 'all has been done that can be done; she must take her chance now.' All the officers were on deck, and I quietly said to Captain Black, 'We might go down to your cabin and have some special prayer.' 'Good,' was his reply. We descended to the quiet sanctum, where often we had read the Word together and met for prayer. Ten minutes had scarcely elapsed when our words were no longer audible. This was caused by a downpour of hail, such as I never remember to have seen or heard. For wellnigh a half an hour the air was charged with a rain of bullets, which covered the decks and buried myriads of ice-balls in the surging foam of the angry sea. Nothing could have been more timely, no intervention more appropriate or effectual. The effect upon the raging billows was simply wonderful. They were beaten back and down, until their turbulence had given place to comparative rest. Truly our experience comprised the necessity, prayer, Divine intervention, and natural law, amidst the fierce and circling eddies of the Indian Ocean."

GOSPEL WORK IN ROME.

In a letter from the Rev. James Wall, who is laboring under the shadow of the Pope's palace in Rome, the following among other incidents are cited as illustrations of the progress of the gospel in the city: A respectable woman received a Gospel in one of the streets of Rome. She was employed in making the embroidery which the Canons of St. Peter's use. One of the priests she served, seeing the Gospel in her house, took it away as a pestilential book, and threatened to take the work elsewhere. The Gospel made considerable impression on the woman's mind, and she longed to know the truth. Occasionally, disguised as a servant, she went to an evangelical meeting, and at last made the acquaintance of our Bible-woman, who brought her to worship. She soon accepted, and confessed the Saviour. She is excommunicated, but is happy in the Saviour.

A man passing before one of our halls received a Gospel, and, taking it home, gave it to his boy, a child of ten years. The child read it, and went through Rome in search of the place where the book was sold. That place was shut, but a boy of whom he inquired directed him to come to our Sunday-school, which he did the next morning. He is now one of our most regular attendants, not only at the school, but at all the meetings during the week. He often comes to our house, and has brought his mother and elder brother. The mother is delighted at the change in the child.

Several days since I was cited by the inspector of police in this parish, and asked to give information respecting a man who had in his possession a Bible and a number of tracts. As the man was poor, and had said he had received the books from us, the inspector wanted to hear me. I said I was surprised that the possession of evangelical books by anyone in Rome should be a ground of suspicion, and that if such was the case the authorities would have enough to do, since in the past year we had distributed, perhaps, 20,000 Scriptures and portions, and nearly a hundred thousand tracts, and that shortly we hoped there would not be a house in Rome without a copy. The inspector smiled, and said, "I have it myself, and have read it for years."

A THIEF'S RESTITUTION.

The following incident is published by Rev. Henry Varley: A clerk in a wholesale dry goods house in London some years ago left his employment to study for the ministry in Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's Pastor's College. He is now the well-known Rev. B. Sawday, the successful pastor of Vernon Chapel, near King's Cross, London. When he was in the dry goods house a silver watch was stolen from his bedroom, and no trace could be discovered of the missing property. Ten years passed away. Mr. Sawday had given himself to the work of the ministry, and was preaching in Vernon Chapel. One Sunday morning he preached a startling discourse upon Repentance and Restitution. His words evidently made a deep impression upon his hearers. During the ensuing week a young man came up to Mr. Sawday requesting an interview. Mr. Sawday, who was walking quickly to catch a train, said, "Walk with me," and in his usual friendly way linked his arm in the inquirer's on the way to the station. In a few words, the young man said, "It was I who stole your watch, some years since, at Messrs. Hitchcock's." "What did you do that for?" said Mr. Sawday, hardly knowing what to say. "I am very sorry, and I am deeply anxious to settle the matter. Here, I'll give you £10 to square it. I was passing your chapel last Sunday, and I saw your name; I thought I would go in and hear you, and your sermon broke me all to pieces; I have been wretched and miserable ever since." "Thank God!" said Mr. Sawday. "No," he added, "I cannot take £10; the watch was only worth £4; I'll take that; but I'm far more anxious that you should confess your sin to God, and obtain His pardon and grace." "That," said the man, "I have sought, and obtained."

PROPHETIC EVENTS BETWEEN 1889 AND 1901.

"BEHOLD THE BRIDEGROOM COMETH."

Mr. William Birch's 776th Printed Sunday Sermon, delivered in Free Trade Hall, Manchester, March 18, 1888.

"And at midnight there was a cry made, Behold, the Bridegroom cometh." Matt. 25: 6.

The Rapture in the Second Year of the Covenant—Simultaneous Resurrection of the Justified—The New Celestial Bodies—The Heaps of Clothes Left—Antichrist's Work After the Rapture—To Subdue Three of the Confederated Nations—Submission of the other Six—His World-wide Dominion—America also to be Part—His Vast Army—Drawn from all Nations—Jerusalem Besieged—Sudden Appearance of Christ—Panic in Antichrist's Army.

NEARLY two years after the signing the seven years' term of the Jewish Covenant, the Lord Jesus shall suddenly appear in the clouds, but His presence will be felt only by the Christians who, like the five Wise Virgins, are ready and watching for Him. Though there may be several millions of Christians, yet only 144 000 of them will in the air to be with the Lord. We read in Daniel 9: 25, "From the going forth of the commandment, to restore and build Jerusalem UNTO Messiah the Prince shall be seven weeks and threescore and two weeks" (Dan. 9: 25), or sixty-nine weeks. A future Commandment to restore and rebuild Jerusalem will go forth at the same time as when the Jewish sacrifices shall be restored in a rebuilt temple at Jerusalem, about November 8, 1894: and in sixty-nine weeks afterward, namely about March 5, 1896, our Lord may be expected to come as a Bridegroom to call His waiting disciples to His side.

At the same time "the dead in Christ shall rise first," that is, all the saints who have died since the world began shall be raised. This is called the Resurrection of the Just; in other words, those who are justified through the precious blood of Christ shed in their stead. But only the 144,000 living saints, who believe in the speedy personal coming of Christ, and are watching for Him, will be caught up in this first ascension of Christians to heaven. As steel is drawn to the magnet, so the saints will be drawn to Christ; and in the twinkling of an eye, it will be done. He who raised His crucified body to life is able to raise us in to the skies. Glory to God, these bodies of flesh and blood, of dishonor and corruption, of weakness and pain, will be transfigured and transformed into bodies of immortality, incorruption, and glory; we shall be changed. In a moment, by a miracle, our bodies will be made into heavenly celestial bodies. The moment the drawing power of our Lord is felt by our waiting souls, we shall see Him, and when we see Him be made like Him, in spirit, soul, and body. And when we meet our fellow-Christians in the air, we shall see that every face and every form is heavenly and divine.

It may be without noise, only those who are called hearing the trumpet's sound. The world at large and our companions will know that the Lord has taken us only by our absence. 'In that night, two shall be in one bed; the one shall be taken, and the other left. Two shall be in the field; the one shall be taken, and the other left." (Luke 17: 34.) In some places, the Lord will come at midnight when His people have gone to bed, no doubt praying. "Lord, if thou comest while I sleep, awake me and call me to Thyself." But in other parts of the earth at that precise moment, it may be morning, afternoon, or evening, when people will be at their daily labor, or resting after work; but exactly at the same moment all over the earth, the waiting disciples, in the twinkling of an eye, will suddenly receive a celestial body and be caught up to meet the Lord in the air (1 Thess. 4: 16; Rev. 14: 4.)

When our Lord rose from the dead, He did not need the napkin or grave-clothes, but wrapping them up, He left them in the tomb. So we and dresses, but may leave behind here and there little heaps of clothes—visible proofs of the ascension of the translated ones who will then be before the throne of God, "dressed in robes of everlasting wear." Many Christians left on the earth will afterwards fly into a wilderness.

After this Frstfruits Translation of the 144,000, business and political affairs will proceed on the earth as usual.

The King of Syria

will cast covetous eyes on Egypt, seek to obtain control of the Suez Canal; but though the ships of Kittim (probably meaning Britian) shall hinder him, he will eventually take possession of Egypt, and having previously overcome three of the ten nations (Dan. 7: 24), the remaining six will submit to his victorious arms, and acknowledge him as their Head. He will break his covenant with the Jews, and stop the morning and evening sacrifice. About this time he will receive a frightful wound and be slain, but by a miracle Satan will raise him from death, and on the supposition that this miraculous man is divine, the Pope and the ungodly world will worship him. In God's Word he is called the Antichrist, the Man of Sin, the Wilful King, and the wild beast. (Rev. 13: 3-18; 17: 8; Zech. 11: 17; Dan. 11.)

Having overcome the Jews and other nations, his navy being the combined fleets of Europe, he will rule the world, and in his pride, believing himself to be more than a man, he will sit upon a throne in the temple of Jerusalem, surrounded by the representatives of every ruling nation under heaven, probably being considered by most of the Jews as the Messiah; and the Pope of Rome, called the false prophet, his obedient friend, will say, "It is the voice of a God," when the princely assembly will fall down and worship him. But many Christians will escape into a wilderness and be hidden there during his three and a half years. Those 1,260 days from August, 1897, to January 1901, will be the time of great tribulation, for the Wilful King and the Pope will seek out the faithful Christians, and if they refuse to receive the mark of the beast on their forehead or hand, he will order them to be beheaded. There will be in every town of Europe. Two sackcloth-robed witnesses, like Elijah and John the Baptist, will go about to preach the gospel, and will be slain at the end of the 1,260 days, but God will raise them from the dead, and take them up to heaven in the sight of thousands of people in the city looking upon their dead bodies.

Including America,

Some of the Jews will then turn from their idolatry of the False Christ, and look for the Messiah (Rev. 12, 6: 13; 11.) In due time the Antichrist will receive tidings of the approach of the kings of the East, supposed to be the lost ten tribes, guided by Scripture prophecies of the Coming of Messiah, to meet Him at the Mount of Olives. Antichrist shall then make a stupendous effort, once for all, to conquer the Jews, and his army will surround Jerusalem in a compass of two hundred miles, with the view of driving them in and putting them to death. He will meet with some success. His vast army will number of all nations, and Jerusalem and the Holy Land will be taken, and the houses rifled, and the women ravished. (Zechariah 14, 2.) Then the Jews shall lift up their despairing cry to God. The whole earth shall be stained with the blood of faithful Christians, the slaughter of whom will continue in every country on the earth, and there will be such a time of tribulation as mankind has never known. Then in that terrible day, our Lord's angels shall gather the harvest of faithful Christians who are alive, together with 144,000 converted Jews (quite distinct from the 144,000 Christians translated five years earlier), and take them to heaven without dying.

The same day, the LORD JESUS will appear, standing upon the Mount of Olives, which shall suddenly cleave in two, and thus make a great valley through which the tens of thousands of Jews who cannot escape from the invading army shall flee from death and find safety. Then when they see the Christ whom their fathers pierced on the cross, they shall be converted. The same day, in the vast army of Antichrist—the horses will suddenly become blind, the soldiers mad, and every man will attack his comrade as an enemy, only a remnant escaping. The battle-field, extending two hundred miles on three sides around Jerusalem, the Mount of Olives being the other side, will be like a shambles, and in the valleys the blood will form lakes of blood up to the horses' bridles. It will take the converted Jews seven months to bury the dead, and for seven years the muskets, wheels, carts, tents, and other things on that battle-field will keep them in firewood. On the day of the battle, Antichrist and the false prophet will be seized and cast alive into a lake of fire burning with brimstone. (Rev. 19, 20; Ezekiel 39; Zech. 14.)

A Tumult will Arise

Then the converted Jews, being the only Christians left on the earth, will go up and down to instruct the nations, and our Lord Jesus will begin His personal reign of a thousand years.

The Celestial City in the Air, to which all God's people have been taken, shall then be let down within sight of the earth, and in the blue vault of the sky, the people then alive, as the earth revolves, will be able through their telescopes to see through the transparent golden pavement of the celestial city and observe some of the glory of that blessed place, while our Lord's saved ones will come down periodically to assist Him in His reign on the earth for a thousand years, during which time Satan shall be so securely fastened that he cannot deceive the nations. The desert shall blossom as a rose, and the nations learn war no more. (Rev. 21.)

It seems like a dream; but as it is revealed in God's Word as a fact shortly to come to pass, I earnestly exhort you, one and all, to be ready. Remember that many of us believe the Lord may call His waiting people home within eight years from now; and I hope that every one of you, dear friends, will be of that heavenly company who shall meet the Lord Jesus in the air.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Yellow Fever was Declared to be Epidemic at Jacksonville, Fla., on August 10, by the President of the State Board of Health. Energetic measures have been taken to stamp out the disease. Tar fires were lighted in the streets, and lime was scattered so freely that the city looked as if there had been a snow-storm. The theory that concussion of the air was fatal to the fever germs was tried by firing salvos of artillery at the battery at intervals, day and night. Dr. Echemendia, a skilful Cuban physician of experience, was appointed to manage the disinfection arrangements, and authority was given him to burn any building he might deem it advisable to destroy. A refugee camp was opened at Boulogne, twenty miles west of the city, and a competent physician placed in charge. There was, however, a more hopeful feeling prevalent toward the end of the week, and the tide of migration was checked.

The News of the Appalling Marine Disaster which reached New York on Thursday last, sent a thrill of horror through the whole community. It was brought by the captain and a handful of the passengers and crew of the steamship Geiser, which left New York for Copenhagen on Saturday, August 11. She had reached Sable Island, off the Nova Scotia coast, in safety, but on Tuesday morning, August 14, she was run into by her sister ship, the Thingvalla, and sunk. The collision occurred shortly before 4 o'clock in the morning, when a heavy rain was falling, and a mist hung over the sea. The Geiser was in charge of the first officer, the captain having gone to lie down on the sofa in the stateroom. About half-past three the lights of a large steamer were seen, and two whistles were blown, to indicate the course the Geiser was taking. A few minutes later the steamer crashed into the Geiser's side, cutting through amidships almost half across the ship. A panic immediately ensued. The sailors lowered two boats, but did it so clumsily that both were rendered useless. The two life-rafts on board were entangled in the rigging, and they and the other boats went down with the ship. The rent in the Geiser's side was so huge that, although she had water-tight bulkheads, she settled and sank stern-foremost in seven minutes after the fatal blow was struck. She had on board 93 passengers, and crew of 56, in all, 149 lives. Of these, only 31 were saved—14 passengers and 17 of the crew. All the other 118 were drowned, or crushed to death in their berths by the prow of the colliding steamer. The Thingvalla, which did the mischief, was a smaller boat than the Geiser. Her prow was crushed in by the collision, and but for the rapid closing of the forward bulkhead, she, too, must have sunk. As it was, she was so much crippled that her passengers, and those rescued from the Geiser, were transferred to a passing steamer, and carried to New York. She was on her way from Copenhagen to New York, but after the catastrophe she headed for Halifax, N. S., which was only 180 miles away, and arrived there on Friday. One of the sailors saved was in his berth on the Geiser when the collision occurred; but he clung to the prow of the Thingvalla, and when that vessel backed away, climbed upon her deck. The other thirty were picked up by the Thingvalla's boats as they swam or floated on pieces of wreckage.

Still another Political Party with a National ticket was put in the field last week. The American party assembled in national convention in Washington, D. C., on August 14. It adopted a platform and nominated Mr. James L. Curtis, of New York, its candidate for the presidency. The platform is of the type of the old Know-nothing party. Among other things it favors the total abolition of the naturalization laws, demands that no criminals, paupers, or insane persons shall be allowed to immigrate, and that in order to become an emigrant to the United States a man must satisfy the Consul at the port from which he wishes to sail that he does not come under the prohibited classes, and must pay a per capita tax to the Consul before sailing. It declares in favor of prohibiting immigration of all persons not in sympathy with the Government of the United States; against alien ownership of land; in favor of free technical schools for American children, and in favor of the expenditure of the surplus for the building of fortifications and naval vessels.

The Tariff Bill which the Republican Senators are preparing as a substitute for the Mills Bill, will, according to their own calculation, reduce the revenue by eighty million dollars. Its details have not been disclosed, but the New York Tribune, which ought to be well informed on the subject, declares that the bill will make a cut of fifty per cent. in sugar and will do away with the entire Internal Revenue tax on tobacco and spirits used in the manufactures and the arts. The duty on lumber is to remain as now, and the wool question, which has given more trouble to the committee than any other, is settled in "a way satisfactory to both growers and manufacturers." A report to the full committee is expected to be made during this week.

An Important Legal Decision Which Should have a salutary influence was rendered last week by Judge Wallace, of the United States Circuit Court. Its effect is to hold stock-brokers responsible in cases of bank failures, when they have received bank property in payment of personal accounts of the officers of the bank. The question arose out of the failure of the Albion Bank. The president of the bank speculated with the bank's funds through a firm of brokers, and the ultimate consequence was the wreck of the bank through his default. The decision of Judge Wallace sustains a verdict by which the brokers are compelled to refund the money of the bank which they received from the president in payment of his personal obligations. It is not suspected that the brokers had any intention of defrauding the bank, but their receiving property which they must have known belonged to the bank and not personally to the president of it rendered them liable. If this decision is sustained, there will probably be less speculation with bank funds, and the safety of these institutions will be proportionately increased.

The World's Conference of Young Men's Christian Associations assembled in Stockholm, the capital of Sweden, on August 15. The convention was formally opened in a brief address by Count Bernstorff, of Berlin, President of the convention held four years ago in Berlin. Dr. von Scheele was elected President, and Mr. George Williams, of London, Count Bernstorff, of Berlin, and Mr. Lucian Warner, of New York, Vice-Presidents. The following Americans were appointed members of committees: Business Committee — Mr. Robert Orr, of Pittsburg; Resolutions and Credentials Committee — Mr. Thomas K. Cree, of New York, Chairman; and Mr. Robert McBurney, of New York. Brief reports were made of the work in Ameria by Mr. Richard C. Morse, of New York; for France by Mr. Van der Beken, of Paris; for Great Britain by Mr. Hind Smith, of London; and for Germany by Mr. Phildius, of Berlin. Four hundred delegates are in attendance, of whom 200 are English-speaking, and some sixty are from America. Among the American delegates are Messrs. Morse, Cree, Wishard, and Olandt, secretaries of the International Committee; Mr. Hall, State Secretary of New York; Mr. McBurney, Secretary, New York City; Mr. McConaughby, Secretary, Philadelphia; and Mr. Orr, Secretary, Pittsburg.

The British Parliament has Adjourned after an unusually long session. Besides Irish affairs, which have been a source of embarrassment, only two measures of importance have been carried. They are Mr. Goschen's scheme for the reduction of the interest on the public debt, and the bill changing the system of county and municipal government. The former appears to be a valuable measure, and has been approved by the country. England was paying more interest on her public debt than her credit entitled her to pay, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer has remedied the waste. Of the other bill, approval is withheld until a practical test comes. The prospect is that, as it is an innovation and touches the privileges and dignities of a class extremely sensitive to change, there will be some dissatisfaction with it.

Labor Troubles in France are Causing Uneasiness. A deputation of navvies made an indignant protest on August 14, against the attitude of the Government, to M. Floquet, the Prime Minister. They declared that the masters would have complied with their demands, if the Government and police had not supported the employers. M. Floquet reminded the delegation that although the Republic allowed workmen to discuss the conditions of labor, it did not allow them the right to impede labor. The Government would protect workers against all violence. It had closed the Labor Exchange in order to put an end to the culpable provocations which the strikers had been guilty of. A number of unemployed workmen entered the shipbuilders' yards at Calais on the same day for the purpose of inducing the men at work therein to go on strike. They carried a red flag and acted in a disorderly manner. Troops were called, and dispersed the rioters.

A Speech by the Emperor of Germany, Displaying martial spirit, was made on August 16 at Frankfort-on-the-Oder, where he unveiled a statue of the late Prince Frederick Charles. After eulogizing the prince, he went on to say: "This is a serious time. Emperor William I., Prince Frederick Charles and other great military commanders and helpers in the creation of the empire, are no more, though they will continue to live in the memory of the German people forever. Just as the people of Brandenburg, with their iron strength and unwearied activity, wrest a livelihood from the sterile soil, so the Third Army Corps wrested victory from the enemy. The deeds which the Third Army Corps achieved they owe to the prince. There can be no question as to the surrender of what has thus been gained. Our eighteen army corps, our forty-six millions of people, ought rather to be left on the battle-field than to permit one stone of what has been gained to be taken." The young Emperor, in enumerating the sacrifices which should be made rather than surrender the conquests, appears, from the cable report, to have omitted to express his own readiness to be "left on the battle-field."

Evangelists or Christian Workers Desiring copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for distribution at camp meetings or other religious gatherings, will receive parcels of back numbers free of charge by writing, stating number required, to the manager, 63 Bible House, New York.

The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's Attitude toward his brother ministers of the Baptist Union was described in a letter published last week, of which the cable brings a brief summary. Mr. Spurgeon says: "I have incurred much odium, yet I am not discouraged. Though I seem to have spoken in vain, I trust there is yet enough love for sound doctrine among Baptists to prevent these errors having unlimited sway." "These errors" are, of course, those which Mr. Spurgeon denounced in the recent Downgrade controversy. Mr. Spurgeon insists that his withdrawal from the Union does not imply any change in his doctrinal standing as a Baptist.

A Pathetic Complaint was Made by a Child in Hoboken, N. J., on August 16. She and her sister were found wandering in the streets, near the City Hall, about midnight, and were taken care of by the police. The two children, who appeared to be respectively about eight and ten years old, stated that their mother was dead, and their father had placed them in a children's Home. He paid for their maintenance for some time, but he had ceased to pay, and was gone away to some distant place. The managers of the Home would keep them no longer, and they were sent in charge of a woman to the Juvenile Asylum in Jersey City, but they were refused admittance there. The woman then left them in the streets. They set out to walk to Hoboken where they formerly lived, but when they arrived they found the house they used to live in empty, and they did not know where to go. The elder child cried bitterly when they were taken to the police station. She said, "No one cares for us now." No child in a Christian country should have cause to make such a complaint. It may be hoped that they will fall into the hands of some Christian people, from whom they may learn not only that there is human kindness for them, but that God is their Almighty Friend and Protector. (Matt. 18 : 10.)

The Extraordinary Candor of a Wife has led to a divorce suit in Chicago. On August 14, a well-known wealthy citizen petitioned the court to set him free from his wife. He testified that they had been married twenty-one years, but during that time, on various pretexts, his wife had been absent from his home over fifteen years. She had travelled through all the States and in Europe, and he, believing the reasons she gave him were valid, had supplied her liberally with money. He had lived in boarding-houses during her long absences. Finally his patience was exhausted, and he insisted on her staying at home. He purchased a beautiful home, furnished it, and presented her with the deeds. Then she complained that she was so far from her mother and sisters, who were poor. The indulgent husband, to gratify her, bought them a home in the neighborhood, and made a settlement upon them. The wife then being divested of every shadow of excuse for absenting herself, told him frankly that she liked to have his money, but did not like him, and would never live with him. That statement decided him, and he at once began suit for divorce. His course is perfectly natural, and the wife cannot complain of his refusing to bestow his wealth on a woman who does not love him, nor care for his society. God's people have often been guilty of similar ingratitude toward Him, accepting His bounties, yet turning their backs upon Him and His laws. (Jer. 2 : 31.)

A Blind Veteran's Account of What He could see, astonished some visitors at an exhibition in New York, last week. He went with his granddaughter to a cyclorama representing the battle of Gettysburg, and sat down while he described to him the features of the picture in detail. She had described to him in her own way the hand-to-hand conflict at the stone fence where the Pennsylvania veterans met the charge of the Southerners, when he asked, "Is there a grove of trees?" "Yes, grandpa. It seems to be full of men, but the smoke is so thick you cannot see them." "Oh, I can see them," he replied. It was then noticed by several people who were listening to him that he was blind. The little girl said: "Oh, no, grandpa; you can't see them." "Yes, I can," he answered. "I can see them very well, and the broken cannon too. That was the last thing I ever saw on earth. There was a caisson exploded there just this side of that fence, and it was then I lost my eyesight, and I have never got the picture of it out of my head." It is a pity that the terrible picture could not be replaced by that scene which was witnessed a few days ago at Gettysburg, when the veterans on both sides met on the scene of the dreadful conflict and clasped hands in amity. Though the blind man doubtless heard of it, he could not realize it as he did the other scene. It is sometimes so with the sinner under conviction. The terrors of Sinai are very clear to him, but he is unable to see his interest in that other scene on Calvary which would give him peace and joy. (Heb. 12 : 18-24.)

A Sixty-Dollar Coffin for a Dog and a Two-hundred dollar lot in Woodlawn Cemetery were provided by a wealthy lady in New York last week. On August 15, an undertaker applied to the Health Department for a burial permit for Cosey Bell, and presented a regular doctor's certificate of death. The permit was being drawn out in due form, when the undertaker explained that the deceased was a dog. He was then informed that no permit was necessary. The application excited the curiosity of a reporter, who paid a visit to the bereaved household. He found the dead dog lying in a satin-lined coffin, which had cost sixty dollars, and learned that a lot had been secured in Woodlawn Cemetery at a cost of two hundred dollars for its interment. The dog's owner was weeping bitterly over the casket, and that evening, clad in mourning, she followed it to the grave. Probably this expenditure and grief are signs of care and affection which were lavished upon the dog during his life. As the place of household pet is now vacant, it may be hoped that some Christian friend of the lady will suggest to her that she fill it with some poor, neglected orphan child. In doing so, she may not only save a human being from a life of sin and shame, but may enjoy the blessing of God which is promised to those who have pity on the poor. (Prov. 19 : 17.)

A Search for Diamonds in a Dust-Heap is being industriously prosecuted in San Francisco. It appears that a few weeks ago, a lady took her departure from that city to spend a month in a summer resort. She left behind her in the charge of her daughter a diamond brooch and several other ornaments containing diamonds, worth altogether over six thousand dollars. The daughter became a prey to fears of burglars and took the housemaid into her confidence. The two, after consultation, decided on concealing the precious gems in the family dust barrel, where they thought that the burglars, if they came, would not dream of looking for them. But unfortunately they did not acquaint the cook with their intention. On the following Saturday morning, the daughter, on going as usual to the ash-barrel, to remove the diamonds to the casket which they occupied during the day, found the barrel empty, the cook having handed it over to the scavenger, to be dumped into his cart. The diamonds had therefore gone with the city refuse to the public dump. A search was immediately commenced, but not a jewel could be found. Subsequently it was learned that an Italian ash-picker had sold a diamond brooch to a jeweller for ten dollars, and that ornament was recovered; but no trace has, as yet, been found of the other gems. Further search will probably be futile, but if search is made among the human refuse of any of our great cities there will be found many a precious jewel which would adorn Christ's crown in the day when He makes up His jewels. (Mal. 3 : 17.)

A Mournful Parting in a NewYork Police Court occurred on August 15. A policeman brought before the justice a man and woman whom he had found the previous night fighting for the possession of a pretty little girl six years old. They were a divorced husband and wife, and the husband complained that the wife would not give up the child. He submitted to the justice his divorce papers, regularly signed, giving him the custody of his little daughter. Then ensued a painful scene. The mother admitted that the divorce had been granted because of her own wrong-doing, but she pleaded with tears that she might keep her child. She flung herself on her knees and besought the justice not to separate them. The little girl, too, added her entreaties. She was crying and kissing her mother, and she said, "I won't—I won't leave mamma. I won't go with him." The justice was visibly affected, but he said he had no power to interfere with the decision of the Divorce Court. The man was legally entitled to the custody of the child. The woman groaned, and clung to her convulsively. The little girl was, at last, wrested from her grasp by physical force, and was carried, screaming, out of court, leaving her mother almost demented with grief on the floor. If the woman had not repented of her sin before, she did so then, when it was too late. Only the one hope is left to her that after a few years she and her child may be reunited. How precious would that hope be to those who die in their sins when they see themselves separated, on the day of final account, from their beloved ones who go into everlasting happiness. (Matt. 25 : 46.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Rev. Sam Jones has been conducting a large camp-meeting at Warrensburg, Mo.

Bishop Harris, of Michigan, who attended the Pan-Anglican Synod, has been stricken with paralysis in England.

In many churches of different denominations the Christian Endeavor Society has maintained the weekly church prayer-meeting through the summer vacation.

The annual Convention of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union will be held in this city in the Metropolitan Opera-House, commencing October 19, and continuing four days.

The statement of a contemporary that Rev. C. H. Spurgeon is sick and unable to preach is incorrect. Mr. Spurgeon has recovered, and since the beginning of July has been preaching regularly.

By the will of the late Margaret R. Smith, of Philadelphia, who died in Norway recently, the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions has received $20,000, and the Board of Foreign Missions $10,000.

An English journal states that a prayer-meeting is held weekly in the precincts of the House of Commons. Several prominent and influential members of the House are among those who attend regularly and take part in the exercises.

Rev. David Smith, who opened the recent General Conference of the African Methodist Episcopal Church with prayer, is said to be the oldest preacher in the world. He is 104 years of age, and has been a professing Christian ninety years.

The North Pacific Mission Institute, in Hawaii, has just held its graduating exercises. Eleven young men have completed the four years' course of instruction there under the care of Rev. C. M. Hyde, D. D. Many of them are already called to pastorates of native churches.

The centennial anniversary of the birth of Adoniram Judson, the famous Baptist missionary, was celebrated at Malden, Mass., his birthplace, Thursday, August 9. The celebration was held under the auspices of the Baptist church in Malden, whose walls bear an inscription in honor of his memory.

The American Reformation Society has commenced a series of services in the People's Church, on Columbia Avenue, Boston, the object of which is announced to be "the evangelization of Roman Catholics, and the preservation of our national and constitutional liberties and institutions."

The wealthy Hebrews of the Mt. Sinai congregation, New York, assembled on August 3 in their recently purchased edifice formerly belonging to St. James Episcopal Church, and were about to dedicate the building, when word was received from Chief Rabbi Joseph, that as two crosses remained upon the church the ceremony must be postponed. The existence of the crosses had been overlooked.

Mr. Ben Hogan delivered temperance addresses in Harlem, N. Y., on Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday of last week. He has engaged to continue these addresses those three evenings of each week through the next two months, in New York and the neighborhood. On the other evenings of the week he is at liberty, and would be glad of opportunities to engage in evangelistic work. Applications, if sent to this office, will be forwarded.

PETER AFTER HIS RESTORATION.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"When thou art converted strengthen thy brethren." Luke 22 : 32.

Satan at Prayer—Received an Answer—Reasons for Special Temptation—Remarkable Discipline—Preparing for Remarkable Service—Christ Praying for His Tried Disciple—Peter's Restoration Assured—What the Backslider has to Do I. His Duty—He Staggers his Brethren—Should Strengthen Them—II. His Qualification for the Work—Knows the Bitterness of Denying his Master—Knows the Weakness of the Flesh—And the Joy of Restoration—III. His Reward—Will Derive Benefit Himself—A Comfort—A Prayer Between Fighting Women.

PETER was to be sifted, so our Lord warned him; and Satan was to operate with the sieve. Satan had an intense desire to destroy Peter—indeed, he would like to destroy all the chosen of God—and therefore he desired to sift him as wheat, in the hope that he would be blown away with the husks and the chaff. "Satan hath desired to have you": it would be a satisfaction to him to have a believer in his power. He was anxious to get Peter into his clutches, to give him as tremendous a shaking as he could manage. If Satan knows, as he no doubt does, concerning any one believer that he cannot quite destroy him, then he is especially anxious to worry him. If he cannot devour the chosen, he would at least defile them: if he cannot ruin their souls, he would break their quiet. As the Revised Version puts it, Satan even asks God to have them, that he may sift them as wheat. This is a curious statement, for it seems from it that and that his petition may be granted him. The margin has it, "Satan hath obtained you by asking." The Lord may grant the request of the devil himself, and yet He would not prove thereby that He had any love towards him. The Lord's wisdom may grant Satan's desire, and in the very act overthrow his evil power. Let us not then stake our faith in the Lord's love upon His giving us the precise answer we desire, for what He gives to Satan He may see fit to deny to those whom He loves, and He may do so because He loves them. We are not bound to know God's reasons for what He does or permits. It is sometimes sinful to inquire into those reasons. What the Lord does is right; let that be enough for us who are His children. But we can see sometimes a reason why the saints should be sifted as wheat; for it appertains unto wheat to be sifted, because it is wheat. Sifting brings a desirable result with it: it is for the saints' good that they should be tried. Satan has often done us a good turn when he has meant to do us a bad one. After all, he is only to clean His vessels; and some some of them have received special scouring by means of his harsh temptation. God also may find a reason for allowing His saints to be tempted of Satan, and that reason may have more relation to others than to themselves. They may have to be tested for other people's good. The testing of their faith is "more precious than that of gold that perisheth, though it be tried with fire," and part of its preciousness is its usefulness. The child of God under temptation, behaving himself grandly, will become a standing example to those who are around him. "Ye have heard of the patience of Job"; but ye never would have heard of the patience of Job if Satan had not sifted him. Let us accept remarkable discipline if thereby we are qualified for remarkable service. If by the roughness of our own road we are trained to conduct the Lord's sheep along their difficult pathway to the pastures on the hill-tops of glory, let us rejoice in every difficulty of the way. If apostles, and men like Peter, had to be put into Satan's sieve while they were being trained for work, we may not hope to escape.

A Scullion in God's Kitchen

Observe, dear friends, what came before the sifting and went with the sifting. Note well that blessed "but." "But I have prayed for thee." Jesus, that Master in the art of prayer, that mighty Pleader who is our Advocate above, assures us that He has already prayed for us. "I have have prayed for thee," means—Before the temptation I have prayed for thee. I foresaw all the danger in which thou wouldst be placed, and concerning that danger I have exercised My function as High Priest and Intercessor. "I have prayed for thee." What a divine comfort is this to any who are passing through deep waters! Blessed be God! Satan may have his sieve, but as long as Jesus wears His breastplate we shall not be destroyed by Satan's tossings.

Notice that the object of the prayer of our Lord was "that thy faith fail not." He knows and there He holds the shield. As long as the Christian's faith is safe, the Christian's self is safe. Faith is the standard-bearer in every spiritual conflict; and if the standard-bearer fall, then it is an evil day: therefore our Lord prays that the standard-bearer may never fail to hold up his banner in the midst of the fray: "I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not." If faith fails, everything fails: courage fails, patience fails, hope fails, love fails, joy fails. Faith is the root-grace; and if this be not in order, then the leafage of the soul, which shows itself in the form of other graces, will soon begin to wither. "I have prayed for thee that thy faith fail not."

Where the Vital Point Lies,

Learn a lesson from this, my brother—that you take care to commend your faith unto your God. Do not begin to doubt because you are tempted: that is to lay bare your breast. Do not doubt because you are attacked: that is to loosen your harness. Believe still. "I had fainted," said David. "unless I had believed." It must be one thing or the other with us; believing, or fainting; which shall it be? "Above all, taking the shield of faith." Not only taking it so that it may cover all, but making this the vital point of holy carefulness. Watch thou in all things, but specially guard thy faith. If thou be careful about one thing more than another, above all be careful of thy faith. "I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not." Our Saviour's pleading goes to the point, and thus it teaches us where to direct our own desires and our own prayers. He asks for us far more wisely than we shall ever learn to ask for ourselves: let us copy His petitions.

Therefore it follows because of Christ's prayer that, though Peter may be very badly put to it, yet he shall be recovered, for Christ speaks of

An Assured Fact

—"when thou art converted." As much as to say—when thou comest back to thy old life and thy old faith, then exercise thyself usefully for thy Lord. He speaks of Peter's restoration as if it were quite sure to be. And is it not quite sure to be? If Jesus, the Beloved of the Father, prays for His people, shall He not win His suit with God? He will win it! He will uplift Peter from among the siftings where Satan has thrown him. We are sure He will, for in prospect thereof, He sets him a loving and suitable task: "When thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren."

Now, beloved friends, I may be addressing a number of persons who believe on the Lord Jesus Christ as Peter did, but they have fallen into a bad state and need a new conversion. I am very sorry for you, but I am by no means staggered at the sight of you, for you belong to a numerous class. When sitting to see inquirers I am constantly stumbling on backsliders, who come back very sincerely and very truly, and feel right pleased to find a Christian home again. I meet with many who have been outside in the world, some of them, for years, attending the house of God very irregularly, and seldom or never enjoying the light of God's countenance. They have wandered so that none can tell whether they are the Lord's or not, except the Lord Himself, and He always knoweth them that are His. I bear happy witness that the Lord brings His own back again. Though the Lord's sheep stray, yet the Good Shepherd finds them. Though the Lord's children go into the far country, yet they each one in due time say, "I will arise and go to my Father." It is not every prodigal that returns, but only the prodigal son. In due time the son returns to the Father's house.

It may be, some of you have wandered into error. May you be brought back very speedily! and if you are, we are going to say to you now "Strengthen your brethren." Perhaps you have been neglectful. I find that many who were good Christian people in the country, always at the house of prayer, and walking near to God will come up to this wicked London to live, and the change is a serious injury to them. They get lost to Christian society, and by degrees they become deteriorated by the ungodliness of this modern Sodom. Nobody in the street wherein they live ever goes to a place of worship, and they do not know anybody at the chapel, or at the church, and so they give up going to public worship, and fall into the ways and habits of the world. They are not happy. You will not make an expert sinner now, for Your Hand is Out of It.

Once converted, you must be a child of God, or nothing. You are ruined for this world; and in the world to come is not yours, where are you? The devil himself will not like you long; you are not of his sort. There is something about you that will not suit Satan any more than Jonah suited the whale. The whale was quite as glad to part with Jonah as Jonah was to be set free from the whale. I see arrangements for your coming home again. A deceived heart has turned you aside, but in love to your soul the Lord has made you aware of it, and your cry is, "I will go and return to my first husband, for then was it better with me than now." These are tokens by which I am assured that the Lord will bring His own back. I rest confident that He will turn them, and they shall be turned; and I am going to talk to backsliders about what they are to do when they do come back again.

I. First, it is his duty. He has gone astray, and he has been brought back; what better can he do than to strengthen his brethren? He will which he has wrought. Peter must have staggered his brethren. Some of them must have been quite frightened at him. John soon looked after him, but then they were not all John. Full of love, John soon hunted up Peter; but the others must have felt that he was a mere reed shaken by the wind. It must have staggered the faith of the weaker sort to see that Peter who had been such a leader among them, was among the first to deny his Lord. Therefore Peter, you must build what you have thrown down, and bind up what you have torn! Go and talk to these people again, and tell them how foolish and weak you were. Warn them not to imitate your example. You must henceforth be more bold than anybody else, that you may in some measure undo the mischief which you have done.

Now, do think of this, any of you who have been cold towards the Lord. You have wasted months, and even years, in backsliding. Try to recover lost ground. It will be almost impossible for you to do it, but do at least make a serious attempt. If anybody has been staggered by your backsliding, look after him, and try to bring him back, and strengthen him. Ask his pardon, and beg him to recover the strength of which you helped to rob him. This is

The Least You Can Do.

If almighty love has drawn you back again after sad wanderings, lay yourself out with all your heart to do good to those who may have been harmed by your sad turnings aside. Am I asking more of you than simple justice demands?

Besides, how can you better express your gratitude to God than by seeking to strengthen your weak brethren when you have been strengthened yourself? Those of you whom the Good Shepherd has restored should have a quick eye for all the sickly ones of the flock, and watch over these with a sympathetic care ou should say, "This is the field which I shall to cultivate. Because in my spiritual sick- ss the Lord has been pleased to deal so gra- ously with me, I would therefore lay myself out cherish others who are diseased in soul."

Still in the Family.

By the way, the very wording of the text seems suggest the duty: we are to strengthen our rethren." We must do so in order that we ay manifest brotherly love, and thus prove our nship towards God. Oh, what a blessed thing is when we come back to God, and feel that are still in the family! To have a question out your position in the heavenly family is a ry painful thing, and should not be endured e moment if it be in our power to solve the ubt. But if the Lord has brought you back His child, you now know that you belong to e family, and it will be suggested at once to u to do something for the brethren. Natural- you will look around to see whether there be y child of God to whom you can show favor his Father's sake. You have injured all by ur backsliding; and hence it is your duty, en restored to the family, to benefit them all special consecration and double earnestness. t it be your delight, as well as your duty, to engthen your brethren.

I. Now, secondly, he has a qualification for it. is Peter is the man who, when he is brought ck again, can strengthen his brethren. He n strengthen them by telling them of Master. He went out and wept bitterly. is one thing to weep; it is another thing to ep bitterly. There are sweet tears, as well as tears; but oh, what weeping a sin costs a ld of God! I recollect a minister speaking y unguardedly: he said that the child of God t nothing by sin except his comfort; and I ought, "Oh, dear me! And is that nothing? that nothing?" It is such a loss of comfort t, if that were all, it would be the most aw- thing in the world. The more God loves , and the more you love God, the more ex- sive will you find it to sin. Now Peter, be- se he could tell of the bitterness of back- ling, was the man to go and speak to anyone o was about to backslide, and say, 'Do not my brother; for it will cost you dear.'"

The Bitterness of Denying

Again, Peter was the man to tell another of weakness of the flesh, for he could say to , "Do not trust to yourself. Do not talk out never going aside. Remember how I ced about it.

I Used to Be Very Lofty

my talk and feelings, but I had to come vn; I felt so sure that I loved my Lord and ster, that I put great confidence in myself, I could not think that I should ever wander m Him. But see, see how I fell! I denied m thrice ere the time called cock-crowing." us, you see, Peter was wonderfully qualified, having known the bitterness of sin, and by ling the weakness of his own flesh, to go l strengthen others in these important nts.

And could not Peter fully describe the joy of loration? "Oh," he would say, "do not nder. There is no good in it. Do not go y from Jesus. There is no profit to be found re. Come back to Him: there is such peace, h rest with Him. Never, never go away in." Peter ever afterwards in his epistles— we are sure that it must have been the e in his spoken ministry—would testify to love and goodness of Christ, and urge the nts to steadfastness in the faith. I would ap- l to any child of God here whether he ever ned anything by going away from Christ. ser, closer, closer, this is the way to spiritual lth. To follow afar off, and live at a distance m Christ, even if it does not make your soul perish, yet it will wither up your joys, and ke you feel an unhappy man, an unhappy nan. Therefore, all those who have tried it uld bear their witness, and put their experi- e into the scale as they thus strengthen ir brethren.

III. And lastly, the restored believer should strengthen his brethren, because it will be

A Benefit to Himself.

He will derive great personal benefit from endeavoring to cherish and assist the weak ones in the family of God. Brother, do this continually and heartily, for thus you will be made to see your own weakness. You will see it in those whom you succor. I think that a true minister is often excited to better work by what he sees of weakness in his people, because he says to himself, "Am I feeding this flock well?" Perhaps he thinks to himself, "If I had properly tended them they would not have shown all these weaknesses"; and then he will begin to blame his own ministry, and look to his own heart, and that is a good thing for us all. We very seldom, I think, blame ourselves too much, and it is a benefit to us to see our own failings in others.

But what a comfort it must have been to Peter to have such a charge committed to him! It is a grand proof of our being fully restored to the divine heart, when the Lord entrusts us with work to do for His own dear children. If you and I are made the means of strengthening our brethren, what a comfort it will be to our hearts! I know that it is not the highest form of comfort, for Jesus would say of it, "Rejoice not in this, but rather rejoice that your names are written in heaven"; but still to a loving child of God it is no mean consolation to find that God is using him. I know, for my own part, that when I go to see our friends who are ill, and near to die, it is a supreme consolation to see how calm they always are, without any exception; yes, and how joyful they generally are—how triumphant in the departing hour! Then I say to myself, "Yes, my Master has owned my ministry." So you see that it is a benefit to a man to strengthen his brethren, because it becomes a comfort to his own soul.

And, brethren, whenever any of you lay yourselves out to strengthen weak Christians, as I pray you may, you will get benefit from what you do in the holy effort. Suppose you pray with them. With regard to those who are strangers to divine things, there will often occur opportunities in which you have put them under an obligation, or they have come to you in trouble to ask advice, and then you may boldly say, "Do not let us part till we have prayed." We used to have of this church who used to pray in very extraordinary places. Two women were fighting, and he knelt down between them to pray, and they gave over fighting directly. Before a door, when there has been a noise in the house, he has begun to pray. He was better than a policeman, for his prayer awed the most obstinate. They could not understand it: they thought it a strange thing, and they did not care to put themselves into direct opposition to the man of God. There is a wonderful power in prayer to bless ourselves, beside the blessings that it will bring upon others. Pray with the weak ones, and you will not be a weak one yourself.

And again, suppose that in trying to strengthen these weak ones, you begin to

to them—quote a promise to them—this will bless you. Some of you do not know which promise to quote. You do not even know where to find it in the Word. But if you are in the habit of studying Scripture with a view to strengthening the weak, you will understand it in the best way, for you will get it in a practical form and shape. You will have the Bible at your fingers' ends. Moreover, one of these days the text that you looked out for old Mary will suit yourself. How often have we paid Paul with that which we meant to give Peter! We have ourselves fed on the milk we prepared for the babes. Sometimes what we have laid up for another comes in handy for ourselves.

Now, I have said all this to you that have wandered and come back, and I want to say it right home to you. May the Holy Spirit speak to your inmost souls. You know who you are, and how far all this applies to you. The Lord bless you. But, dear friends,

If You Have Not Wandered,

if the Lord has kept you these twenty years close to Him, and given you the light of His countenance all that time, then I think that you and I, and any of us of that sort, ought to strengthen our brethren still more. Oh, what we owe to sovereign grace! To be kept from wandering—what a blessing is that! Let us feel that instead of having a small debt to pay, we have a greater debt to acknowledge. Let us wake up to strengthen our brethren. Amen.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS.

A BEATIFIC VISION.*

A FRIEND of mine lay dying not many months ago. His voice was clear and strong almost to the very latest syllable. Then the light of the eyes went out, and the hands dropped, and the head drooped, and we said one to another, "He is gone." Suddenly the head turned upon the pillow, the hands moved, and light was in the eyes again. Surprise, wonder, adoration, rapture, wave on wave, rolled across that pallid face. It was the beatific vision. Now I know the meaning of that text, "I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with Thy likeness."

The Living Voice.

A Bible in every human habitation is something well worth trying to achieve. But I can tell you of something better still. It is Christ Himself in any one of the humblest of His disciples casting His shadow on the wall. Breathing men, not breathless books, must carry salvation round the globe. Despise not the little tract. "Come to Jesus," written by a London clergyman, has been the means of saving many souls. But there is nothing to rival the human voice. What would Peter the Hermit have accomplished had he stayed in his monastery, and from that retreat had issued a printed call to arms, even though he had showered Europe with his circulars? Who cares for circulars? But when that fiery little monk, lean, swarthy, keen-eyed, eloquent, bare-headed, bare-footed, girded about the loins with a heavy cord, and mounted on his mule, undertook the tour of Europe, preaching the first crusade, with tears and groans, smiting his breast, kissing his crucifix, passionately invoking the vengeance of God and man on the ruthless Saracen, all Europe sprang madly to its feet and hurled itself steel clad upon the Orient. So of the gospel now and always. It must be in the blood like iron, in the eye like fire, in the voice like a trumpet call. It must be preached; preached by men who have had it preached to them; preached to sinners by men who have sinned themselves; by dying men to dying men.

The One Book.

The story told of the burning of the famous library of Alexandria by order of the Caliph Omar is probably apocryphal. But what the Caliph is reported to have written to Amru, his general commanding in Egypt, has a grand moral. "If those books contradicted the Koran, they were false and ought to be destroyed; if they agreed with the Koran, they were superfluous and might well be spared." One book was enough for Mohammedans. So when Sir Walter Scott lay dying, he said to his son-in-law one day, "Lockhart, read to me." "What book shall it be?" said Lockhart. "Why do you ask? there is but one," said Scott.

Now if this book itself were in danger of being destroyed, and I might have only one chapter out of it, I rather think it would be the fourteenth chapter of John's gospel. Probably no single chapter is read so much. We read it to ourselves when we are all alone, on the land,

* From "Eternal Atonement," by Roswell Dwight Hitchcock, D. D., LL. D., late President and Professor of Church History in the Union Theological Seminary. This book contains nineteen brief sermons, selected, since Dr. Hitchcock's death, from about thirty, which were overlooked when he destroyed his manuscripts, or were saved intentionally for future use. 306 pages, with portrait. on the sea, in the solitudes of nature, in the solitudes of personal experience. We read it at the communion table, catching the very tones which made such music nearly nineteen hundred years ago. We read it to the dying, and they are soothed. We read it over the dead, and thank God that they are safe. These are sacred and tender offices. But we narrow the chapter when only such offices are thought of. It was the speaker himself who was about to die. His hearers were about to be launched into the life-long service. Their feet were on the threshold of a ministry whose first and whose last necessity was absolute child-like faith.

REV. JOHN A. BROOKS, D. D.

THE Prohibition nomination for the Vice-Presidency could have gone to no man more worthy of the honor, nor better fitted for the labor of the campaign, than to John Anderson Brooks, the pastor of the Church of the Disciples in Kansas City, Mo. His piety, his manliness, and his self-sacrificing spirit are well known in the Prohibition party, and it has honored itself in honoring him.

Dr. Brooks is fifty-two years of age, having been born in Mason County, Kentucky, in 1836. His father was comparatively poor, having undertaken the support of his wife's widowed mother and her three daughters, besides his own family. In addition to this he gave much of his time which he might have devoted to his business as a planter to preaching the gospel in the villages near his home. The boy had not many school advantages, but he made up for the lack of those by home study, often reading far into the night after a day's hard labor with his father's negroes in the tobacco-field. His evident love of study, and his bright intellectual promise led his father to send him to Bethany College, where he labored so diligently that he graduated with honors at the end of three years. This was in 1856, when he was twenty years old.

Brooks intended to be a lawyer, but just at the end of his college course he was converted under the preaching of Alexander Campbell, and resolved to devote the remainder of his life to his Master's service. He commenced his ministerial labors at a protracted meeting in his native county, where he was so much blessed that his services were called for all around. Finally, while he was holding meetings at Flemingsburg the church there invited him to become its pastor. He accepted on condition that he should have time for the work of a revivalist. His ministry there was a wonderful success, and during its course a college was built for the education of ministers, of which Dr. Brooks became President. During the war Dr. Brooks was active in promoting the good, physical and spiritual, of the wounded on both sides.

The Temperance crusade early enlisted his sympathies and active service. He joined Murphy in his movement, but soon saw reason to separate from him, and labor independently, where his unselfish spirit could have free play. With a few others he called a convention at Sedalia, Mo., which assembled on July 4, 1880, and organized the Prohibition State Alliance, of which Dr. Brooks was made first President. Since then his efforts to have a Prohibition amendment submitted to the people have been unceasing. He was nominated for Governor of Missouri in 1884, and during the campaign had a memorable controversy with Senator Vest. He polled 10,500 votes by the admission of his opponents, who had charge of the ballot-boxes. His nomination by the Indianapolis Convention for Vice-President has given unqualified satisfaction throughout the party.

A NOTABLE TERCENTENARY.

(See Illustration.)

ON July 19 last, the English people celebrated with considerable enthusiasm the three hundredth anniversary of one of the most notable deliverances in the history of their country. In July, 1588, Philip, King of Spain, Portugal, the Netherlands, and part of Italy, despatched the Armada, which under the blessing of the Pope, was to oust Queen Elizabeth from her throne, seat Philip there in her stead, and restore England to her former condition of subordination to papal rule. The story has been often told of the scattering of that magnificent and powerful fleet. After suffering severely by the storm, it was attacked with consummate skill and courage by Lord Howard, who was in command of the English fleet, which was much smaller in number and power. He succeeded in beating the Armada in detail, carefully avoiding engaging its main body in pitched battle, and by sending fire ships among them, drove the remnant in terror from English waters. Our illustration represents the rewarding of the three captains whose bravery had most materially contributed to the victory. The sailors had received gifts of money, but the three captains were to be knighted. They were Captains Hawkins, Frobisher, and Drake. By Queen Elizabeth's command, they were taken on the Ark Royal, and there Lord Howard performed the ceremony of laying the sword on their shoulders, bidding them rise, knight

A COSY old-fashioned mansion was t which the widow Brettell lived. Its room small and its ceilings low; but no newe dence, however magnificent, would have her so well as that. There she had com bride more than forty years before; the only daughter had been born, grown u been married; there her husband had die and her old help—almost as old as herself— fore occupied the house.

"Sadie," said Mrs. Brettell, one mo "what is to be done about little Ethel? I think we could manage a child now?"

"Bless your dear heart, ma'am, yes, w reply; "why not? Such a sweet little cre too, and all alone in the world! Why, in c and manage her better than her own fath mother, as wouldn't have had the heart her nay, whatever she wanted."

Little Ethel was the four-year-old ch Mrs. Brettell's daughter, and the proble denly developed arose from her being l orphan by a railroad catastrophe, in whic father and mother had perished.

So it was settled, and little Ethel was br to the home in which her mother, befor had grown up. Sadie's notion about t vantages of such a training were not, ho fully realized. Still, the child grew up an loving, and loveable, possibly thought beyond her years, and rather more sedate were most of her girl friends. Only one cause for anxiety, in regard t pressed upon Mrs. Brettell's mind, and circumstances intensified it. She want make some provision for Ethel. She knew something of the nature grandmother's relations with Mr. Manton r money embarrassment, though of course g of the farmer's good bargain. The news ned in the letter, she rightly judged, would rtinent to the interview, and therefore t hesitated to break in upon it. She came around to her grandmother's chair and held the letter for her to see, while her companion stared contemptuously at the farmer. Mrs. Brettell took her spectacles out of their case to read the letter, saying as she did so to the man arrested in his menacing attitude, "If that is the only condition you have to propose you must do as you will."

Turning to the letter, however, she saw at a glance that the consequences she dreaded were averted. Ethel was already a heiress in her own right. Some land belonging to her deceased father, hitherto regarded as worthless, had suddenly become of great value, and the girl was rich. Ethel's companion was her late father's lawyer, who had come to give all necessary information. God had answered the widow's prayers, as He so often does, not in the way expected, but fully and bountifully. It was a joy to Ethel to repay some of her grandmother's kindness by relieving her of her creditor with some of her own wealth, and Mrs. Brettell was relieved of her anxiety about Ethel's future, which was now so abundantly provided for.

THE EPOCHS OF A LIFE.

A NEW SERIAL STORY.

By Rev. L. S. Keyser.

The Campaign Opened.

THE opening words of Duneman's oration showed considerable sagacity. He desired first of all to put his audience into a good humor and thus elicit their sympathy. After he had arrested their attention, he ventured upon several mild and facetious thrusts at infidelity, and seemed to be much gratified with the vociferous merriment which they evoked from his hearers. Satisfied that he was carrying the audience with him, he proceeded to the main part of the discussion with more self-assurance. Straightening himself up to his full height, he began, at first adroitly, and then more boldly, to hurl thunderbolts of scorn and sarcasm and insinuative logic into the camp of unbelievers. What he said was true enough, but even truth in the hands of an insincere man has a distorted aspect. The spirit of hatred and malignity which animated him was revealed beneath the armor of the champion of truth, showing that he was prepared "to fight the Lord's battle with the devil's weapons."

"What has been the tendency of unbelief in all ages and countries?" he cried. "Look at its black record. It cuts the nerve of all moral restraint, it opens the flood-gates of iniquity, allowing it to pour its foul deluge upon all community and individual life. If a young man would have all his moral instincts destroyed, his conscience anæsthetized so that it utters no admonitory cry at the approach of sin, let him throw away the religion in which he was reared, and espouse the cause of infidelity. By a sure and gradual process his moral principles will be undermined, and he will lose his sense of right and wrong. Even now we have among us those who deny the validity of all moral distinctions, asserting that sin is only an accident or lapse."

As he said this he turned toward the seat occupied by the young sceptics, his eyes gleaming upon them like burnished metal.

"What can we expect from men whose thinking is controlled by vicious and degrading theories—men who have so depleted and stultified the higher rational faculties of their souls that all sense of moral responsibility is lost? What must be the result upon their individual lives? Can you repose confidence in a man who denies the existence of God, the authority of the Bible, and throws off all moral obligations? God save our country from the withering blight of atheism!"

There was an audible "amen" from one of the Professors in his rear. The speaker accepted the ejaculation as sanction of his utterance, and proceeded with more vigor than before.

"There is abundant evidence in the history of unbelief of the effect that negation of God has upon moral principle and character. You have only to examine the teachings and lives of the men whom our modern sceptics venerate—the saints of the devil's calendar—to perceive the moral degradation which is the natural product of unbelief. A few examples, fairly representative, will suffice here. Hobbes was a prominent rejecter of Christianity. The standard of his morality may be inferred from the fact that he held a man blameless who, being a Christian, might deny his faith when being examined before a magistrate. Lord Bolingbroke, another noted unbeliever, taught that morality was only the principle of self-love in action, and that even avarice and sensuality might be lawfully gratified, if they could be safely gratified. He believed that man was only a superior animal, whose chief end in life was the gratification of the appetites and desires of the flesh. Hume, the most celebrated of English infidels, has left behind him a 'private correspondence' full of teaching so base and sensual that I could not describe it before an audience of decent persons. Gibbon, the author of 'The Decline and Fall,' was more decent; but his portrait, sketched by his own hand, shows him to be utterly heartless and grossly selfish, servile of the rich and contemptuous of the poor. Voltaire was as notorious for his gross immorality as for his infidelity, and a man whose character was stained by all kinds of baseness, perfidy, and lechery. Rousseau was a horrible example of dishonesty, perjury, and profligacy. Tom Paine, a miserable inebriate. Blount was a man of passions so uncontrolled that he committed suicide in his chagrin when disappointed of their gratification.

"The list might be indefinitely extended. These are only a few of the most prominent of the leaders of the last century in the war against religion, but their followers were like them, and are they not sufficient to prove the truth of my assertion, that infidelity saps the foundations of national, social and individual purity?"

"Yes, yes!" was shouted by an excited listener from the audience; which exclamation was followed by a perfect stampede of applause.

"Are not these facts sufficient to fasten suspicion upon the moral character of any man who advocates the principles of Free Thought, and seeks to undermine public confidence in religion?" the speaker questioned, bending forward with flushed face and glowing eyes.

The insult was too great to be borne with equanimity. Hadley would have sprung to his feet had not his friend, who was more self-restrained, held him down to his seat with desperate energy, while he whispered: "Your turn will come before long, Hadley; for goodness' sake, keep quiet!"

A pair of flashing eyes across the aisle also noted Hadley's excited movement. They were the eyes of Belle Havelock, and a feeling of exultation filled her bosom "At last his blood is stirred," she thought. "What a crushing retort he will make when his opportunity comes! How this callow declaimer will get castigated! Well, that will be a double blessing. It will give an impetus to Free Thought in the college, and it will put an end to this miserable infatuation with Miss Winters. If he speaks as he feels now, she will have no more to say to him." Then she gave her attention again to Duneman's speech.

"In juxtaposition with the champions of infidelity, I place representative champions of Christianity. What a contrast of life and character! Paul, Chrysostom, Luther, Knox, Whately, Payson! Can any one find a blemish on their characters? And yet these, and thousands of noble men of God, trace the purity and uprightness of their lives to the regenerating and sanctifying influences of the Gospel under whose standard they marched to victory over the forces of sin. The religion of Christ revitalizes, strengthens, binds together, and sustains the moral energies of the human soul; whereas, infidelity in all its forms, devitalizes, benumbs, and disorganizes the higher nature with which God has endowed the human family."

Very various were the effects produced upon the audience by the speech. "A fine oration," said one, "That man will make a grand preacher." "What a merciless exposure of infidelity!" said another; "it ought to put some of our young friends on their guard." "Very smart," said a third, "but to me it did not sound true. I should say Duneman could speak just as well on the other side if it suited his purpose. He spoke like a hired advocate, not like a man arguing from conviction." "Did you ever hear so malignant an effusion!" said a young man inclined to Free Thought; "how bitter the fellow is. I suppose his facts are right, he would hardly dare to misstate them, but I doubt his fairness, I would not be surprised to find that he has exaggerated. He would never convince me; he seemed more anxious to denounce than convince." As for Madelling and Dane, they were certain that Duneman's object was to ostracize them in the college, and to create a prejudice against them personally, as men whom it was dangerous if not dishonorable to know.

Hadley stood in the hall quietly observant of the reception accorded to Duneman by his acquaintances. While many pressed around him to congratulate him, the manner of two persons particularly impressed him. They were Miss Winters and Miss Havelock. The former looked at the orator with her usual kindly smile, but her manner was cool, and her congratulations by no means effusive. Belle Havelock, on the other hand, who might have been expected to feel hurt by so savage an attack on her principles, greeted Duneman warmly, and seemed to be praising and complimenting him. "What does she mean?" Hadley asked himself. "Surely she cannot approve of such an outrageous exhibition of spleen! There is some mystery about it. I must call on that young lady, and find out what part she is playing."

He was still brooding over the mystery when he returned to his rooms, and he found Dane as much mystified as himself. "Well, I will ask her to explain," said Hadley; "she must have some motive," and accordingly that evening he presented himself at the Havelock mansion. Belle met him with so hearty a welcome, and was so evidently delighted to receive him, that he dismissed on the instant a passing thought that she had abandoned her attitude of opposition to religion, and had been won over by Duneman's eloquence. After a conversation on commonplace topics, Hadley introduced the subject of his visit.

"I noticed you were at Chapel Hall this morning. What did you think of Mr. Duneman's effusion?"

"I was disgusted," said Belle shamelessly; "I thought it displayed a lack of good breeding, and was a gratuitous insult to some of his fellow-students. Those innuendoes were meant for you, I presume. Well, I shall hope to hear you give him the castigation he deserves. It was a most unjustifiable and unmanly attack!"

"Why, then, did you congratulate him so warmly?" asked Hadley with some sharpness.

Belle was evidently taken aback. She had no idea that her reception of Duneman had been witnessed by her visitor. She was confused by the direct question, and hesitated in replying. At last she said: "Oh, that was only his rhetorical genius that I praised, but, Mr. Madelling, I was really pleased that he had made the attack, for now at last you will be spurred to aggressive action. You seemed to need a stimulus, and Mr. Duneman certainly furnished that."

Naturally unsuspecting in his disposition Hadley accepted the explanation, and declared his purpose of picking up the gauntlet his rival had thrown down, and Belle dexterously fanned the flame of his angry passion.

"Do you not see, Mr. Madelling," she said, "what was implied in those innuendoes? It is obvious that his address was a personal thrust at you. He wanted to stigmatize you, and create suspicion against you in the college. Certainly you did not fail to notice the manner in which he turned to you when he said, 'Can you trust a man's moral purposes if he denies the existence of God and rejects the Bible?'"

"Yes, his directness was unmistakable, the insolent hypocrite!" muttered Hadley.

"You ought to exonerate yourself from the false accusation," continued Belle, "and prove that it is not a larger liberty of thought, but a superstitious reverence for defunct dogmas, that depletes man's moral nature. You ought not to delay your reply. Seize your opportunity, Mr. Madelling! Strike while the iron is hot," she concluded, in urgent tones.

During the weeks that followed, Hadley devoted almost every moment that he could spare from his regular studies to the preparation of his speech. Not only did he ransack the Bible for disparities, but he also read carefully every book that would throw light upon his theme. Having filled his mind with the subject, he proceeded to systematize his data, and with pen in hand the theme was unfolded in a terse, logical, and climactic address that he knew would startle his audience, and, as he hoped, convince them. As the example of torpedo-like assault had been set by Duneman, Hadley was not loathe to follow it, and therefore his manuscript was embellished with cutting retorts, which were more the outgrowth of passion than of reason.

Meanwhile, Miss Winters was the recipient of his polite attentions. But as he was extremely wary in her company, he successfully piloted their conversation away from theological themes, so that there was no conflict of words between them. Whether she knew of his hostility to religion or not, he was not aware; but she had had ample opportunity to make the discovery, if she was sufficiently interested in his spiritual welfare to make inquiries.

Yet he was not altogether left in doubt as to her moral earnestness, and it must be said, to her credit, that he respected her more highly on account of her solicitude than if she had been indifferent as to her beliefs. One Sunday evening he proposed, half jestingly, that they remain away from church, because he thought it would be pleasanter to talk on literary topics.

"No, Mr. Madelling," she replied, with a glow in her eyes that he had never seen there previously, "I think it is not only a duty to go to the house of God, but also a privilege. The Bible tells us that we should not forsake the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is. Since I have enlisted in the service of Christ, I have determined not to miss an opportunity of attending church. Besides, our presence there will encourage others to go, and in that way they may be induced to accept the truth."

"Oh, certainly, certainly," he began, apologetically, "if you wish to go, I would not persuade you to stay at home. I merely thought that, perhaps, an examination of some good literary or scientific work would be just as profitable."

Hadley was just a little nettled by her words, for they seemed to imply a rebuke. The girl was, perhaps, quick-witted enough to divine the unpleasant feeling, and therefore said:

"Thank you for being so considerate. But we have plenty of science and literature every day of the week in our college work, and I like to devote Sunday to the cultivation of my religious faculties. Is not that philosophical?" she subjoined, smiling.

"Oh—yes—yes," he conceded, rather reluctantly. But he made a mental reservation, which was, "Providing there are such faculties in one's psychological make-up."

"Really, Mr. Madelling," she continued, "I am anxious that you go to church. Mr. M——'s sermons are so germane to—to—all one's needs, that I hope they will do you—us all a great deal of good."

Like the dew that distills from heaven fell her words fall on his ears. It is to be feared, however, that his anxiety for her personal regard was more potent with him than her manifest concern for his salvation. Unable to understand the solicitude of the earnest Christian for every individual, he was inclined to think that her interest in his welfare was the index of a feeling in her heart similar to that which moved himself.

More than these few words she had not ventured to say. She seemed as anxious as he was to avoid every provocative to controversy. Indeed, she had said frankly, one evening: "I am by nature averse to verbal disputes. Good seldom comes from them. I do not allow my own attitude to be misunderstood; I am always ready to avow my faith, and I would defend it if attacked, to the best of my ability, but I never seek controversy. There are better ways of influencing opponents than by argument."

THE SPIES SENT INTO CANAAN.

HE thought of sending spies into the land of aan, who should explore, and then give a re- t of the land, seems, in the first instance, to e originated with the people, and not with). Moses, in recapitulating the history of children of Israel in their wilderness jour- s, says, "We came to Kadeshbarnea. And id unto you, Ye are come unto the moun- n of the Amorites, which the Lord our God h give us. Behold, the Lord thy God doth the land before thee; go up and possess it, he Lord God of thy fathers hath said unto e; fear not, neither be discouraged. And came near unto me, every one of you, and , We will send men before us, and they shall rch us out the land, and bring us word again what way we must go up, and into what es we shall come." (Deut. 1:19–22.) What, n, would they not give credence to the Word he Lord unless it was supported by the tes- ony of some human witness? Did they ik the God who led them through the sea mpetent to guide them into Canaan? Alas the evil heart of unbelief, which requires that very Word of God Himself shall be support- y some further proof than its own witness tself, which is people could not trust His word without spies, and so in His wonderful long-suffer- He came down to their weakness. He or- ed that these spies should be representative men, each of them rulers, and twelve in number, that each tribe might be represented. Moses himself sided with the people, and said, "And the saying pleased me well, and I took twelve men of you, one of a tribe." (Deut. 1:23.) It seems strange that Moses should not have encouraged the people to

of God. The land of Canaan was the Land of Promise. Every believer may and ought to be at home in the promises of God, not only knowing them intellectually, but counting on them, and staking all upon the truth and faithfulness of Him who has spoken them. The spies are very like people who try experiments with the promises of God. After all, their journey was to be one of discovery, "Moses sent them out to spy out the land of Canaan, and said unto them, Get you up this way southward, and go up into the mountain; and see the land, what it is." But God had already spoken of Canaan as "a good land and a large . . . . a land flowing with milk and honey." (Ex. 3:8.) What need, then, to go and search whether God had told the truth?

They were to see whether the people that dwelled therein were "strong or weak, few or many." But God had already declared, "I will send My fear before thee, and will destroy all the people to whom thou shalt come; and I will make all thine enemies turn their backs unto thee." (Ex. 23:27.)

what mattered it how strong or how many soever were the inhabitants of the land? The spies were to search what cities they dwelt in, "whether in tents or in strongholds." But with the promise behind them, "I will send hornets before thee, which shall drive out the Hivite, the Canaanite, and the Hittite from before thee," would it not have been better for them, and more to the glory of God, if they had rested on His Word, and left their unknown enemies to His conquering hand? The only visible witness which they could bring back was a specimen of the fruit of the lands. It required two of them to carry one cluster of grapes on a pole between them, so wondrously fertile was the land. We may toil all night and take nothing, but the right side of the ship is the Land of Promise—there grow the giant grapes, there is found a multitude of fish. When we look away from our resources to God's, then five loaves can feed five thousand, and water can spring out of the solid rock. God's promises when received by faith, exceed all our expectations; He always does abundantly above all we can ask or think.

The spies were forty days searching the land, just the same length of time that Moses was in the mountain alone with God, both the first and second time. Moses came down with His face shining, for he had been looking on what God was and what God said. The spies had been looking on what man was: they had spent forty days in a most unprofitable occupation! When they gave in their report to Moses, they said, "We came unto the land whither thou sendest us, and surely it floweth with milk and honey; and this is the fruit of it. Nevertheless (if they had been content to trust the living God, there would have been no nevertheless) the people be strong that dwell in the land, and the cities are walled and very great; and, moreover, we saw the children of Anak there." These children of Anak are always to be found where they are looked for, and they are a real power. The spies were not exaggerating the greatness of their difficulties; their mistake was in going after them, and so being led to measure them with their own powerlessness instead of waiting until God took the initiative and revealed them at the same time as He made known His power in destroying them. Oh how many a child of God is kept in bondage to some sin of appetite or temper, because he has been exploring in his family history the fortresses of the foe, has learned how this tendency has descended to him through generations of his forefathers, instead of looking at the right hand of the Most High, and His written Word, "Sin shall not have dominion over you, for ye are not under the law but under grace"! (Rom. 6:14.) How many a missionary has explored the difficulties of caste in India, ancestral worship in China, polygamy in Africa, and his heart has sunk within him! and still more where the opium trade and the liquor traffic, carried on by professedly Christian people, stand in his way, he has seen before him, like the spies, insuperable difficulties. Two of the spies who accompanied the other ten saw

With Other Eyes.

The cities indeed were great and the walls were strong; the sons of Anak were giants indeed—but against them all these men of faith measured the almightiness of God, and said, "Let us go up at once and possess it, for we are well able to overcome it." With God on our side, God fighting our battles, God pledged by promise to overthrow them, how shall we fear? Shall our hereditary tendencies of mind and body prevail against God? Shall the unbelief or indifference of our families prevail against God? Shall the drink traffic, the opium trade, caste or anything else prove mightier than God? Let us not explore the difficulties, but explore the height and depth and length and breadth of the love and power of our mighty God. The ten spies contradicted Caleb, and said, "We be not able to go up against the people, for

They are Stronger Than We."

They told no lie, but they left God out of their reckoning. What! were God's promises all to go for nothing, and to be counted as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal, because the odds against themselves were so great? Was God nothing, God nobody, that He should be thus ignored? that God whose bread from heaven was falling daily around their tents? did they count Him out of their reckoning? "O fools and slow of heart to believe." "They brought up an evil report of the land which they had searched unto the children of Israel." The exploration of their difficulties had not answered, themselves were disheartened, and they encouraged others in unbelief. They said, "The land through which we have gone to search, it is a land that eateth up the inhabitants thereof: and all the men that we saw in it are men of great stature," The more we look at our difficulties, the more we talk of them, the more eloquently we describe them, the greater they grow. Many people expect that if they exercise faith in a promise of God which they have not been awake to until now, all difficulties will vanish. But it is not so. There are sons of Anak in every corner of the Land of Promise, and it is only by looking unto Jesus that they are overcome. The spies said, "Then we saw the giants, the sons of Anak, which come of the giants, and we were in our own sight as grasshoppers, and so we were in their sight." David said, "I have set the Lord (not the sons of Anak) always before me; because He is at my right hand, I shall not be moved." (Ps. 16:8.) Let this be our confidence also.

"CASTING ALL YOUR CARE UPON HIM." 1 Peter v. 7.

WHAT! all our burdens—every little trial—
The cares that seem so very, very small?
We know that heavy griefs He soothes and lightens,
But does He note, and will He carry all?

When at our waking, everything seems dreary,
And all day long our spirits are at strife
With little, never-ending, ever changing
Annoyances that fill the thread of life;

And when we do our best, yet fail of pleasing,
And they to whom our very lives are given,
So little comprehend, so little heed us—
Do these things touch the heart of Christ in heaven?

And may we tell Him all things, nor offend Him?
Will He not weary of our ceaseless 'plaint?
And does He care to have us bring before Him
Our every need with child-like unconstraint?

Oh, yes! Thou never yet hadst any trial,
However trivial it has seemed to be,
That did not hold the sympathy of Jesus,
And bind His heart still closer unto thee.

Well, God loves patience! Souls that dwell in stillness, Doing the little things, or resting quite,
May just as perfectly fulfill their mission,
Be just as useful in the Father's sight,

As they who grapple with some giant evil,
Clearing a path that every eye might see!
Our Saviour cares for cheerful acquiescence,
Rather than for a busy ministry.

And yet He does love service, where 'tis given
By grateful love that clothes itself in deed;
But work that's done beneath the scourge of duty,
Be sure to such He gives but little heed.

Then seek to please Him, whatso'er He bids thee!
Whether to do—to suffer—to lie still!
'Twill matter little by what path He led us,
If in it all we sought to do His will.

THE LIFE OF GENERAL
CLINTON B. FISK,
By Prof. A. A. HOPKINS.

Cloth, Nearly 300 pages—Illustrated—Price,
ONE DOLLAR.

It is a Full and Authentic Biography of the Standard-Bearer of the Prohibition Party.

A million of our people are to-day looking toward GENERAL CLINTON B. FISK with the greatest interest. The distinguished Standard-Bearer and Presidential Nominee of the Prohibition Party is undoubtedly the honored cynosure of the nation in this campaign.

The calumny so freely resorted to by opposing factions in a Presidential Campaign will, no doubt, be directed against him. All this may be effectually met by the presentation of facts culled from this history of his life—the history of a typical American life; from a log-cabin to positions of national honor; early struggles for an education; remarkable self-reliance and wonderful personal resources; distinguished record in the Civil War, and after; endeared to whites and blacks in the South, and popular with the mixed multitude of the North, East, and West; intimate friendships with Lincoln, Grant, and Greeley; splendid business career side by side with noble Christian activities; a volume full of life and spirit, delightfully entertaining, of permanent value and great interest.

The book also contains a sketch of the life of
Rev. JOHN A. BROOKS,

Christian Work in Mexico.

Through the reading of the Holy Scriptures translated into Spanish some earnest souls in Mexico have, by God's blessing, been led to a clear knowledge of the Gospel. From their numbers able preachers of the Christian faith in its primitive purity have been raised up, around whom congregations have been gathered from among the humble poor, who have been the first to publicly welcome and defend the pure Gospel in Mexico. The members of these congregations, rich in faith, have worked earnestly and bravely for Christ and His truth among their fellow countrymen in that beautiful Southern portion of North America called Mexico. Schools have been established by them, in which large numbers of bright boys and girls have received a good secular education and have been carefully taught the Christian faith. From the children thus educated faithful Christian workers have been raised up. A Mexican Branch of the Church of Christ, that maintains the faith in its purity and integrity, has been organized among these native Christians in the Republic of Mexico. The members of this Mexican Church of Christ, though gathered mostly from among the poor, are yet doing a most important Christian work. To continue that work, we need to pay a few leading workers small monthly salaries, and also to defray some current expenses. To raise the needed funds we have formed a society with an office at 43 Bible House, New York, U. S., and should be pleased to have many of our fellow Christians join this society by becoming regular contributors to its treasury. We are trying to secure monthly or quarterly contributions to meet the regular monthly expenses of the work. In order to continue and extend the work, we wish to raise four hundred dollars a month, by endeavoring to have four hundred persons each give on an average one dollar every month to this object, leaving the donors to give less or more as they may be able and willing.

We earnestly invite all who will, to join us in this systematic effort in behalf of the cause of Christ in Mexico, by becoming monthly subscribers to this fund. We have already regular subscribers whose gifts amount monthly to over eighty dollars, and a growing circle of friends who are forwarding us occasional donations.

This Mexican Church of Christ is a very effective instrumentality through which to do Christian work among the many millions on this Western Hemisphere who speak the Spanish language, comparatively few of whom have ever had a Bible in their hands. A beautiful church building has been secured in the City of Mexico as the centre of the activities of this Mexican Church of Christ. Through the workers connected with that centre more than forty congregations have been gathered from among the poor in different parts of the Republic of Mexico. We have some faithful and able preachers now in the field, but more young men need to be trained for the ministry. Multitudes of Protestant children in Mexico, some of them orphans, need to be educated. We make three requests of you, Christian reader: first, that you will, if possible, become a monthly or quarterly subscriber in behalf of this Christian work; second, that you will try and induce your friends also to contribute to it; third, that you will remember this precious work in Mexico in your prayers.

We most sincerely thank all who are already generously contributing to this Christian work for their timely and generous gifts, and we earnestly invite many others, to unite with us in aiding it by also becoming monthly subscribers in its behalf. Those who may not feel that they can give as much as a dollar a month are earnestly asked to give what they can, whenever they are able—EVERY LITTLE HELPS. Fellow Christian, if you will generously consent to contribute a dollar a month or more or less to the work, will you kindly inform me of the fact? Contributions either large or small can be mailed directly to my address as follows:

AT THE SORTING TABLE IN THE SOUTH-AFRICAN DIAMOND DIGGINGS.

The Late Clarence S. Lindsay, Killed in the Recent Fire in the De Beers Diamond Mine in S. Africa.

THE LATE CLARENCE S. LINDSAY.

THE untimely death of this gentleman among those who perished at the disastrous conflagration at the De Beers Diamond Mine, near Kimberley, in South Africa, on July 11, has excited deep regret in the English mining districts, where he was widely known and highly esteemed. He was the son of Mr. James Lindsay, an official in the civil service at Sunderland, and was twenty-eight years of age. Having been educated for the profession of mining engineer, he was first employed at the Marsden Colliery, where he distinguished himself in some remarkable operations; and about 1883 he was appointed by Sir Charles Mark Palmer, manager of the Ilsworth Colliery.

While occupying that position he performed a feat of courage and daring which gave him a national reputation. There was an explosion in the mine in 1885, and young Lindsay with a couple of miners descended into the mine to rescue the workmen. Both his companions succumbed to the after-damp. Lindsay found some rusty nails, the chewing of which counteracted the poisonous gas he had inhaled, and thus saved his life. In a half unconscious condition he dragged his companions a considerable distance through the workings at the risk of his life. His efforts to save them were futile, but that he should make those efforts in a condition so full of peril proved the heroism of the man.

Mr. Lindsay could not, at the time of his death, have been more than a full week at the mine, since he had not long arrived in South Africa, being appointed manager of four great diamond mines, of which the De Beers is one. As proof of the estimation in which he was held by the profession, on the occasion of the visit of the Institute of the Mining and Mechanical Engineers to Newcastle he was appointed to inspect and report upon the various methods of ventilation in mines in Great Britain and on the European continent.

THE FIRE IN THE DIAMOND MINE AT KIMBERLEY, SOUTH AFRICA.

AN appalling calamity occurred on July 11 at the famous diamond mines in South Africa, by which more than two hundred lives were lost. There are four of these mines within the borders of Cape Colony, which have recently been amalgamated under one management. They are known as the Griqualand, East and West, the Kimberley, and the De Beers mines.

On the evening of July 11 a general alarm was caused around the De Beers mine by the sudden ringing of the fire-alarm bell, indicating that there was fire in the mine. Soon a large crowd, consisting of thousands of people—men, women, and children, of every grade and nationality—assembled at the edge of the mine. They had not been there long when the rumor began to circulate that there were more than in the mine, and that there were no means of exit for them. It is needless to dwell on the heartrending scenes that followed such a rumor. They can be well imagined when it is known that there were wives and mothers whose husbands and children had just descended into the mine.

The first intimation of the accident was given between the hours of six and seven in the evening, when the night shift of workmen was relieving the day shift. There are two shafts, which have lately been constructed for the better underground working, known as No. 1 and No. 2 shafts. These are incline shafts, and No. 1 leads to the 500-foot level. From these again, other vertical shafts lead to greater depths. One known as the Friggens shaft leads to the 700-foot level. It was in this shaft that the fire first broke out, but in an incredibly short space of time it spread to the main shaft.

The First Horror

was caused by the breaking of the rope of the skip which was employed in hauling up the men of the day shift. Several men had rushed to this skip to be hauled up, as soon as they saw signs of danger, and the engineer at the mouth of the shaft at once proceeded to haul, but the heat of the fire burnt the ropes and precipitated the skip with its occupants to the bottom of the shaft, where they must have been crushed to death or have died by suffocation if they escaped death by burning.

It was daybreak before any organized attempt could be made to proceed to the rescue or assistance of the miners.

The Rescue Party

gained an entrance to the mine through an opening to a long-disused passage, and worked with a will until they had reached the natives and white men confined in the tunnels. They found the foot of the main shaft piled up with the bodies of natives who had evidently fallen on the top of each other as they rushed to get out of the mine. In other places, where ladders were placed to gain a higher level from a lower, many natives were found hanging on these ladders, with their hands firmly grasping the ropes as if in the last death struggle they had laid hold of them as their only hope of safety. The explorers also came upon some white men, whom they rescued and brought to the surface, where they were received by their friends, and the crowd anxiously awaiting them with a welcome cheer and shouts of joy.

Providentially, a fresh breeze was blowing all day, which caused a strong draught in the tunnels and shafts. Had it been otherwise there would have been no hope of any being saved alive. As it was, the exploring party brought back word that there were piles of dead bodies of natives lying in the mine, and that they recognized the bodies of many white men, some of them lying peacefully, as if they had died without a struggle, and others looking as if they had made desperate efforts to escape.

All day long the toilers worked, and before nightfall they had succeeded in recovering about 408 natives alive, and forty-seven white men. As the natives working in the mine must all pass through a searching-house, it was no difficult matter to obtain the number who had gone down for the night. The number of white men was ascertained to be about sixty-seven. Of these forty-seven were rescued. The remaining twenty, in addition to about two hundred natives, were given up as dead. Among the dead was the young manager, Mr. Lindsay. He was comparatively unacquainted with the course of the workings. When he saw the first indications of danger, he at once prepared to descend to help in the work of rescue. Already the skip was full of brave men, intent on risking their lives for the rescue of their comrades, but Mr. Lindsay ordered one of the men who was going into the skip to retire, while he took his place to meet, as it proved, his doom, for after the descent of the cage he was not again heard of.

Many stories are told of daring and heroic courage on the part both of the Europeans and of the natives. One white man could have escaped, but he returned to try to save his comrades, and was suffocated in the attempt. A native also, who had formerly been distinguished in the Caffre wars, took up and carried his master, who was exhausted and in a fainting condition, to a place of safety. The natives generally showed great coolness. About $100,000 of damage has been done to the mine.

THE DIAMOND DIGGINGS

are situated, for the most part, in the Valley of the Vaal River, to the northeast of the Orange River Free State, but within the boundary of the Cape Colony. The land is intersected by long stony ridges, called Kopjes by the Dutch Boers, which consist of large fragments of rock thrown together, and covered with a deep ferruginous gravel. In this gravel, which fills the interstices between the loose rocks, the precious gems are found. The manner of working is simple enough. The miners remove the loose blocks of stone, which are cast aside; then take up the gravel, and sift it thoroughly, either in a dry state or with abundance of water, in a sieve rocked by a cradle. When the pebbles have been thus separated from the sand, they are cleansed and placed upon the sorting-table (as shown in the illustration on our frontispiece), and are most carefully examined, to find any diamonds that may lie in the heap. The result is often disappointing, but sometimes the diggers are richly rewarded for their toilsome drudgery by the discovery of a glittering prize. Much of the work is done by natives, who, being almost naked, have no pockets in which to conceal the precious gems which otherwise they might be tempted to purloin.

The Diamond fields have been the cause of Political Trouble.

It was in 1835 that the Dutch families in Cape Colony, becoming dissatisfied with British rule, sent out from among themselves a sturdy band, chiefly of young men, across the Orange River to found the Orange Free State. The British made no objection to their going, and doubtless expected that the natives, who enormously outnumbered them, would soon kill them or drive them back. Quite unexpectedly, however, the Dutch got on tolerably well with their native neighbors, and, in spite of quarrels now and again over stolen cattle, succeeded in maintaining their position. Then the British, regarding them as the Queen's subjects still, endeavored to impose the British rule over them, but were stubbornly resisted. In 1852 it was finally decided to abandon the attempt, and the independence of the Orange Free State was recognized, the Orange River to be the boundary of the British possessions. This treaty was renewed in 1869, after a rupture caused by an appeal of the Basutos to the British for protection against the encroachments of the Boers.

The Discovery of Diamonds was made soon after the treaty of 1869 was ratified. The diamond field was north of the Orange River, and, therefore, outside British territory, but neither was it technically in the territory of the Orange Free State. It was in land held by a Griqua chief named Waterboer, who, in former troubles, had been an ally of the British. The Boers treated his claim contemptuously and took possession of the magnificent prize. Waterboer then appealed to his former ally, the British, who, with like cupidity to that of the Boers, went to his aid. Finally, they took possession of the diamond fields, gave a little more than one-tenth to Waterboer, and kept the remainder, Lord Kimberley giving his name to the new territory.

Fresh trouble arose out of this proceeding. England had just arranged to unite her South African colony under a parliament, as in Canada and Australia, and she intended the diamond field to be a possession of the colony. But a large proportion of the voters were of Dutch origin, fathers of families whose sons and brothers had gone out in 1835 to found the Orange Free State. They were much more friendly to the Free State than to Great Britain. Accordingly, when the parliament of Cape Colony assembled, it was found that the members declined the gift of the diamond fields or would accept it only on condition that the Orange Free State declared itself satisfied with the arrangement. They bluntly said that the English Government had pledged itself in the two treaties of 1852 and 1869 not to interfere beyond the Orange River, and if the Government chose to break its treaties through cupidity, it must keep the spoil itself; they on their part would not be party to the iniquity. Eminent men among the English who had respect for justice and righteousness, made remonstrances to their Government, and finally Mr. Brand, the President of the Orange Free State, went to London to plead its cause. He succeeded so far as to obtain from the English Treasury $450,000, as compensation.

Another attempt was subsequently made to bring the Orange Free State under British domination, by annexing the Transvaal, which it was expected would ultimately bring the Free e into confederation. The terrible war followed in 1880, with the disaster of ıba Hill, and the death of Sir George Colsprang from this scheme. Valuable as the of diamonds is, its acquisition has been pured at a deplorable cost of money, life, and acter.

ISSION WORK IN SOUTH AFRICA.

HE Paris Evangelical Society sent to the ıtos in 1833 three missionaries, Messrs. Rol, Lemue, and Besseux. On their arrival at Cape, they were welcomed by a few descend of the French Huguenots, who had emied there after the revocation of the Edict of tes. They settled at Mosega, but had hardegun work when Moselkatse, the chief of Matabeles, and the terror of the country, them an order to appear before him. Knowthat he fully intended to murder them, they from the district, and subsequent fiendish s of the Matabeles proved that they were lent in doing so. Ultimately, the fugitives ıd a refuge near Litaku, which they named ito, where they labored until Providence ıed the way for labor among the Basutos.

circumstances that led to the beginning of work among the Basutos of South Africa peculiar. A raid had been made upon them heir enemies, the Korannas and Griquas, many of their cattle had been driven off. e of them, in their extreme destitution, ked the marauders, being resolved to retake of their property or die in the attempt. heir great surprise, they found among the es to which their enemies belonged, men were touched by a recital of their woes, who treated them with generosity. One ıese, who had previously been in contact the missionaries, told the Basuto chief the Christian religion alone could give e and prosperity to his people. The chief ıediately expressed to this man an earnest re for missionaries; and some time afterd, fearing that he had forgotten the matter, him some oxen with the naive request that ould procure him "in exchange a man of er." Providentially Messrs. Casalis and ousset had arrived about this time, and ceeded without delay to Basutoland.

Chief Moshesh

the greatest and wisest of the chiefs of the Ba-s. He was remarkable for his patience, tact, iness, and firmness. He found his people tered, oppressed, overrun by their enemies, apparently destined to extinction. For s the country had been desolated by tribal s and stained with the blood of cannibal or-. The peace-loving Basutos had been the of every invader. But Moshesh, without ing any long-continued or sanguinary wars, ıaged to restore order and peace, and make nation one of the most powerful and respectin South Africa. He, his uncles, and his s were all converted through God's blessing he labors of the missionaries. He died in ch, 1870, in perfect peace.

The Conversion of Libe, ıncle of Moshesh, and called the "Father of Basutos, was very remarkable. He was an man nearly eighty years of age. For a long e he bitterly hated the missionaries. He ed, however, to influence his nephew Mosh against them, though he earnestly endeaed to persuade him to expel them. Finally, he could not get the missionaries driven y, he removed his own residence from their ghborhood, in order that he might be out of ring of their singing and preaching. So ch did their visits enrage him, that they were ength obliged to leave him alone. Imagine ir astonishment, then, when one day a mesger from the old man arrived at the station ing: "Behold Libe prays and begs you to go l pray with him!" It was true! The old eftain was found at prayer, eagerly desiring truction, and shortly afterward, at his own re-st, was publicly baptized.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT RECENT EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Taking a Public Stand for Christ.—"Soon after my conversion," said a speaker, "I was helping at an open-air meeting near a saloon in which I was well known. I went forward and took my place beside the minister. Soon the bar-tender came to his door to look at the proceedings. It was not long before he recognized me, and turning, he called to his wife to come out and see me. I could stand that, but when it came to the close, and I was asked to offer prayer in the hearing of that man who had so lately seen me helplessly intoxicated, I felt very nervous. For a few moments I went through intense agony, the perspiration was running down my face, and my limbs almost gave way under me, but through the grace of God I was enabled in His strength to publicly show on whose side I had taken my stand. Then the minister linked his arm in mine, and took me home with him. What joy I had after that first public avowal of my faith! It seemed to be another and very strong band binding me to Christ, and such always is open confession of Christ."

Smashing the Whisky Bottle.—A Member of the Mizpah Band testifies: "Some years ago I was well known as a hard drinker. Not content with six days to indulge my depraved appetite, I generally brought home a supply on Saturday night to last me until Monday morning. One Saturday night I had brought home the usual allowance, and after placing it on the table fell asleep. Next morning when I awoke with an aching head, I found my little girl in the room. Motioning towards the bottle on the table, I said, 'Annie, will you hand me that over?' Annie did not move, but with eyes swimming in tears she said, 'Oh, father, I cannot. Don't you know I am a member of the Band of Hope?' And coming nearer, she laid her hand on my shoulder, and said, 'And, father, if you would give up the drink how happy we should all be!' 'Ah, I replied, 'if I only could I would gladly do so.' 'But you can do it, father,' persisted the child. 'Jesus says He will help you if you will trust Him.' With these words she left the room, and rising from my bed I dashed the whisky bottle in pieces, and kneeling I asked God to forgive the past, and to receive me for Christ's sake. He did so, and still keeps me."

Mother and Daughter at the "Penitent form."—Richard Weaver says: "Not long ago I was preaching in a meeting where the front form got the name of the 'penitent form,' to which, at the close of the address, we invited all who were weary of sinning, and willing to come to Christ. Scarcely was the invitation given when a young woman in the body of the hall rose and made her way to the form; she was quickly followed by an aged woman. Those two knelt humbly before God, and soon it was evident that the Holy Spirit was striving with them, for the young woman in a short time rose to her feet, and with a shout of 'Praise God!' gave evidence that the Lord had saved her. Nor was the elder woman long behind, and soon both were praising God. So great had been their anxiety about their salvation, that they had not looked at each other, but now that anxiety had given way to joyful confidence, they had more leisure to regard one another. At the first look there was an exclamation of joyous surprise, and the next instant they were in each other's arms. They had recognized in each other, the one a long lost daughter, and the other a forsaken mother, whom she had not seen for nine years."

A Mistake of Two Rum-sellers.—Mr. Dunn, evangelist, remarks: "Another evangelist and myself had been working for some time in a district in the south of Scotland, and the Lord had greatly blessed our efforts. But the work was telling upon our bodily health, and we went for a day's rest to Melrose, returning the same night. When we entered the railway-station there were two very fine-looking and apparently wealthy old gentlemen walking up and down the platform. They appeared to take a great interest in us. When we had taken our seats, and the train was just about to move, one said to the other, 'There are those two fellows gone at last. We are well rid of them now.' Hurriedly I took down the window, and thrusting out my head said, 'No, gentlemen, you are mistaken; we shall be back to-night, and have our meeting as usual.' When we got back I asked the booking-clerk who these gentlemen were. 'What!' he exclaimed in surprise, 'have you been so long in the town and yet do not know who those two gentlemen are? They are the leading saloon-keepers of the town.' These are the people who wish to keep back the Gospel. They fear lest the people learn to do right and give up the intoxicating cup and accept Christ."

A Variety Theatre Singer's Conversion.—A member of the Mizpah band testifies: "For fifteen years I earned my livelihood by singing in a variety theatre. About two years ago, having an interval of two weeks between the end of one engagement and the beginning of the next, I thought I could not do better than have a big spree, so came to this city for the purpose. But, thank God, that spree has never come off yet. I was wandering about, at the wrong end of the town, looking for a certain theatre, and not knowing the city well, my search was in vain. But I heard a song. I stopped and listened. In the open air a band of men were singing: 'I will sing of my Redeemer, and His wondrous love to me.' I waited until they were done, and then followed them into the meeting. There I heard of Jesus, about whom my mother had taught me. I went away deeply impressed, and during all that week was very anxious about my soul. The Holy Spirit strove to bring me to Christ, but I thought if I gave myself to Christ, I should require to give up my profession, my only means of gaining a living. I asked God to guide me. I then opened my Bible and read, 'Seek ye first the kingdom of God and His righteousness.' There and then I sought the kingdom of God, and giving myself to Christ, He has kept His promise, and given me all things which I require."

A Prodigal's Father Softened.—An Evangelist said: "While I was preaching in a well-known chapel in London, I noticed a young man, seated in one of the pews, every now and then brush a tear from his eye. As soon as I could I spoke to him. 'Can God save me?' he excitedly asked. 'Yes, He can,' I answered. We knelt, and at once he gave himself to the Saviour. In the chapel a gentlemen recognized the unfortunate youth, and kindly offered to take him home, but on the way they had to pass the prodigal's old home. The young man thought he would like to ask his father's forgiveness, so, though trembling with fear and shame he knocked at the door. We requested the servant to ask the gentleman to speak for a moment. He came, and the young man dropping on his knees said, 'God has forgiven me, will you forgive me?' The father at first seemed petrified, but recovering himself, bade his son begone, as he would never forgive him. We had just arrived at the friend's house, and were striving to comfort him, when we were surprised by a knock at the door. It was a servant who had followed us with a cab to convey the young master home. That night at family worship, as the father prayed, 'Forgive our trespasses as we forgive them who trespass against us,' his daughter interrupted him with 'No, father, you cannot pray that, for you know you have not forgiven my brother.' The old man saw he was acting in an un-Christlike spirit, and sent off at once for his son, knowing that he could not hope for God's favor until he had forgiven him."

THE EVENTFUL EPOCH.

A Vacation Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

"I will show wonders in the heavens and in the earth." Joel 2 : 30.

A Momentous Time—A Period of Disaster—An Epileptic Earth—Disasters Volcanic—A Series of Earthquakes—Disasters Cyclonic—A Cyclone at Sea—Disasters Oceanic—The Roll of the Lost—Disasters Epidemic—An Era of Blessing—Of Longevity—Rapid Travel—Blessing of Quick Information—Of Gospel Proclamation—A Falsehood on its Travels—Wonders of Self-Sacrifice—The Track and the Engineer—Relics of Peter the Great—The Incoming Fleet.

Our eyes dilate and our heart quickens its pulsation as we read of events in the third century, the sixth century, the eighth century, the fourteenth century; but there are more far-reaching events crowded into the nineteenth century than into any other, and the last quarter bids fair to eclipse the preceding three quarters. We read in the daily newspapers of events announced in one paragraph and without any especial emphasis—of events which a Herodotus, a Josephus, a Xenophon, a Gibbon would have taken whole chapters or whole volumes to elaborate. Looking out upon our time, we must cry out in the words of the text: "Wonders in the heaven and in the earth."

A Period of Disaster.

I propose to show you that the time in which we live is wonderful for disaster and wonderful for blessing, for there must be lights and shades in this picture as in all others. Need I argue this day that our time is wonderful for disaster? Our world has had a rough time since by the hand of God it was bowled out into space. It is an epileptic earth. Convulsion after convulsion. Frosts pounding it with sledge hammer of iceberg, and fires melting it with furnaces seven hundred times heated. It is a wonder to me it has lasted so long. Meteors shooting by on this side and grazing it, and meteors shooting by on the other side and grazing it, none of them slowing up for safety. Whole fleets and navies and argosies and flotillas of worlds sweeping all about us. Our earth like a fishing smack off the banks of Newfoundland, while the Gallia and the Bothnia and the Arizona and the Great Eastern rush by. Beside that our world has by sin been damaged in its eternal machinery, and ever and anon the furnaces have burst, and the walking-beams of the mountains have broken, and the islands have shipped a sea, and the great hulk of the world has been jarred with accidents that ever and anon threatened immediate demolition. But it seems to me as if our century were specially characterized by cyclonic, oceanic, epidemic. I say volcanic, because an earthquake is only a volcano hushed up. When Stromboli and Cotopaxi and Vesuvius stop breathing, let the foundations of the earth beware. Seven thousand earthquakes in two centuries recorded in the catalogue of the British Association! Trajan, the emperor, goes to ancient Antioch, and amid the splendors of his reception is met by an earthquake that nearly destroys the emperor's life. Lisbon, fair and beautiful, at 1 o'olock on the first of November, 1755, in six minutes 60,000 have perished, and Voltaire writes of them: "For that region it was the last judgment, nothing wanting but a trumpet!" Europe and America feeling the throb; fifteen hundred chimneys in Boston partly or fully destroyed.

But the disasters of other centuries have had their counterpart in our own. In 1812, Caraccas was caught in the grip of the earthquake; in 1822, in Chili, 100,000 square miles of land by volcanic force upheaved to four and seven feet of permanent elevation; in 1854, Japan felt the geological agony; Naples shaken in 1857; Mexico in 1858; Medosa, the capital of the Argentine Republic, 1861; Manilla terrorized in 1863; the Hawaiian Islands by such force uplifted and let down in 1871; Nevada shaken in 1871; Antioch in 1872; California in 1872; San Salvador in 1873; Ischia in 1883; Charleston in 1886.

But look at the cyclonic, the disasters cyclonic. At the mouth of the Ganges are three islands—the Hattiah, the Sundeep and the Dakin Shabazpore. In the midnight of October, 1877, on all those three islands the cry was: "The waters, the waters!" A cyclone arose and rolled the sea over those three islands, and of a population of 340,000, 215,000 were drowned. Only those saved who had climbed to the top of the highest trees. Did you ever see a cyclone? No. Then I pray God you may never see one. I saw one on the ocean, and it swept us eight hundred miles back from our course, and for thirty-six hours during the cyclone and after it we expected every moment to go to the bottom. They told us before we retired at nine o'clock that the barometer had fallen, but at eleven o'clock at night we were awakened with the shock of the waves. All the lights out. Crash! went all the lifeboats. Waters rushing through the skylights down into the cabin and down on the furnaces until they hissed and smoked in the deluge.

Seven Hundred People Praying,

blaspheming, shrieking. Our great ship poised a moment on the top of a mountain of phosphorescent fire, and then plunged down, down, down, until it seemed as if she never would again be righted. Ah! you never want to see a cyclone at sea. But a few weeks ago, I was in Minnesota, where there was one of those cyclones on land that swept the city of Rochester from its foundations, and took dwelling-houses, barns, men, women, children, horses, cattle, and tossed them into indiscriminate ruin, and lifted a rail-train and dashed it down, a mightier hand than that of the engineer on the air-brake. Cyclone in Kansas, within a few months; cyclone in Missouri, cyclone in Wisconsin, cyclone in Illinois, cyclone in Iowa. Satan, prince of the power of the air, never made such a cyclonic disturbance as he has in our day. And am I not right in saying that one of the characteristics of the time is disaster cyclonic?

Disasters Oceanic.

But look at the disasters oceanic. Shall I call the roll of the dead shipping? Ye monsters of the deep, answer when I call your names. Ville de Havre! The Schiller! City of Boston! The Melville! The President! The Cimbria! The Oregon! But why should I go on calling the roll when none of them answer, and the roll is as long as the white scroll of the Atlantic surf at Cape Hatteras breakers. If the oceanic cables could report all the scattered life and all the bleached bones that they rub against in the depths of the ocean, what a message of pathos and tragedy for both beaches! In one week eighty fishermen perished off the coast of Newfoundland, and whole fleets of them off the coast of England. God help the poor fellows at sea, and give high seats in heaven to the Grace Darlings and the Ida Lewises and the life-boatmen around Goodwin's Sands and the Skerries!

The sea, now owning three-fourths of the earth, proposes to capture the other fourth, and is bombarding the land all around the earth. The moving of our hotels at Brighton Beach backward from where they once stood, a type of what is going on all around the world and on every coast. The Dead Sea rolls to-day where ancient cities stood. Pillars of temples that stood on hills, geologists find now three-quarters under the water, or altogether submerged. The sea having wrecked so many merchantmen and flotillas, wants to wreck the continents, and hence disasters oceanic.

Disasters Epidemic.

Look at the disasters epidemic. I speak not of the plague in the fourth century that ravaged Europe; and in Moscow and the Neapolitan dominions and Marseilles wrought such terror in the eighteenth century; but I look at the yellow fevers, and the choleras, and the diphtherias, and the scarlet fevers, and the typhoids of our own time. Hear the wailing of Memphsis and Shreveport, and New Orleans, and Savannah, of the last two decades. From Hurdwar, India, where every twelfth year three million devotees congregate, the caravans brought th cholera, and that one disease slew 18,000 eighteen days in Bossorah. Twelve thousan in one summer slain by it in India, and twen five thousand in Egypt. Disasters epidem Some of the finest monuments in Greenwoo and Laurel Hill, and Mount Auburn are to do tors who died battling with Southern epidem Blessing of Gospel proclamation. Do you know that nearly all the missionary socie have been born in this century? and nearly the Bible societies, and nearly all the philanthropic movements? A secretary of of the denominations said to me one da Dakota: "You were wrong when you said denomination averaged a new church every of the year; they established nine in one w so you are far within the truth." A clergy of our own denomination said: "I have been out establishing five mission stations tell you Christianity is on the march, while ese things I say because I want you to be I want you to be watching all these ers unrolling from the heavens and the . God has classified them, whether calam-or blessing. The divine purposes are harnessed in traces that cannot break, and in girths that cannot slip, and in buckles that cannot loosen, and are driven by reins they must answer. I preach no fatalism. A swarthy engineer at one of the depots in Dakota, said: "When will you get and take a ride with us?" "Well," I said, "now, if it suits you." So I got on one side the locomotive and a Methodist minister, who was also invited, got on the other side, and between us were the engineer and the stoker. The train started. The engineer had his hand on the agitated pulse of the great engine. The stoker shoveled in the coal and shut the door with a loud clang. A vast plain swept under us and the hills swept by, and that great monster on which we rode trembled and bounded and snorted and raged as it hurled us on. I said to the Methodist minister on the other side the locomotive: "My brother, why should Presbyterians and Methodists quarrel about the decrees and free agency? You see that track, that firm track, that iron track; that is the decree. You see this engineer's arm; that is free agency. How beautifully they work together! They are going to take us through. We could not do without the track, and we could not do without the engineer."

So I rejoice day by day. Work for us all to do, and we may turn the crank of the Christian machinery this way or that, for we are free agents: but there is so long ago no one remembers it; laid by the hand of Almighty God in sockets that no terrestrial or Satanic pressure can ever affect. And along that track the car of the world's redemption will roll and roll to the Grand Central Depot of the Millennium. I have no anxiety about the track. I am only afraid that for our indolence God will discharge us and get some other stoker and some other engineer. The train is going through, with us or without us. So, my brethren, watch all the events that are going by. If things seem to turn out right, give wings to your joy. If things seem to go wrong, throw out the anchor of faith and hold fast.

There is a house in London where

Peter the Great,

Czar of Russia, lived a while when he was moving through the land incognito, and in workman's dress, that he might learn the wants of the people. A stranger was visiting at that house recently, and saw in a dark attic an old box, and he said to the owner of the house: "What's in that box?" The owner said: "I don't know; that box was there when I got the house, and it was there when my father got it; we haven't had any curiosity to look at it; I guess there's nothing in it." "Well," said the stranger, "I'll give you two pounds for it." "Well, done." The two pounds are paid, and recently the contents of that box were sold to the Czar of Russia for fifty thousand dollars. In it, the lathing-machine of Peter the Great, his private letters and documents of value beyond all monetary consideration. And here are events that seem very insignificant and unimportant, but they encase treasures of divine providence and eternities of meaning which after a while God will demonstrate before the ages as being of stupendous value. As near as I can tell, from what I see, there must be a God somewhere about.

God at the Helm.

When Titans play quoits they pitch mountains; but who owns these gigantic forces you have been reading about the last few years? Whose hand is on the throttle-valve of the volcanoes? Whose foot suddenly planted on the footstool makes the continents quiver? God! God! He looketh upon the mountains and they tremble. He toucheth the hills and they smoke. God! God! I must be at peace with Him. Through the Lord Jesus Christ this God is mine and He is yours. I put the earthquake that shook Palestine at the crucifixion against all the down-rockings of the centuries. This God on our side, we may challenge all the centuries of time and all the cycles of eternity.

The Incoming Fleet.

A short time ago I was at Fire Island, Long Island, and I went up in the cupola from which they telegraph to New York the approach of vessels hours before they come into port. There is an opening in the wall, and the operator puts his telescope through that opening, and looks out and sees vessels far out at sea. While I was talking with him, he went up and looked out. He said: "We are expecting the Arizona to-night." I said: "Is it possible you know all those vessels? do you know them as you know a man's face?" He said: "Yes, I never make a mistake; before I can see the hulks, I know them all by the masts; I know them all, I have watched them so long." Oh, what a grand thing it is to have ships telegraphed and heralded long before they come into port, that friends may come down to the wharf and welcome their long-absent loved ones. So to-day, we take our stand in the watch-tower, and we look off through the glass of inspiration or providence, we look off and see a whole fleet of ships coming in. That is the ship of peace, flag with one star of Bethlehem floating above the top-gallants. That is the ship of the Church, mark of salt wave high up on the smoke-stack, showing she has had rough weather, but the Captain of salvation commands her, and all is well with her.

The Ship of Heaven,

mightiest craft ever launched, millions of passengers, waiting for millions more, prophets and apostles and martyrs in the cabin, conquerors at the foot of the mast, while from the rigging hands are waving this way as though they knew us, and we wave back again, for they are ours; they went out from our own households. Ours! Hail, Hail! Put off the black and put on the white. Stop tolling the funeral bell and ring the wedding anthem. Shut up the hearse and take the chariot. Now, it comes around the great headland. Soon she will strike the wharf and we will go aboard her. Tears for ships going out. Laughter for ships coming in. Now she touches the wharf. Throw on the planks. Block not up that gangway with embracing long-lost friends, for you will have eternity of reunion. Stand back and give way until other millions come on. Farewell to sin. Farewell to struggle. Farewell to sickness. Farewell to death. All aboard for heaven!

A CHURCH ON A FARM.

In the course of a journey in Asia Minor, which Dr. Constantine, of Smyrna, describes in a letter to the Missionary Herald, he came upon a little gathering of Christians upon a farm, who in spite of persecution and without the help of a clergyman had remained true to their faith. He says: "The work began ten years ago through a colporteur, and three years ago the converted few were anathematized and cast out of the old church by their bishop. They were stoned and terribly abused by their fellow-townsmen, yet they not only held their own, but steadily increased. There are now seventy-five souls who have accepted the gospel, including the children. They have services on Sunday, a Sunday-school, a prayer-meeting during the week, a day-school, and a women's meeting. In winter they meet in a silkworm shed, and in the summer out-of-doors.

"The driver of the buffalo-cart that brought me to the village, while going through a ravine struck up 'What a Friend we have in Jesus!' in Greek, and when I asked him if Jesus was his friend, he pulled out of his bosom a copy of the whole Bible; and yet the teacher of this people is a farmer and the preacher is a shepherd. While there I examined for the communion four men and ten women; among them was a tall man who had been the terror of the village; he was a thief, a drunkard, and a cruel husband; he would tie his poor wife's hands, and then beat her unmercifully. Yet that little woman became converted, and through faith brought her wild husband to Christ. Both of these united with church on that day."

A CHURCH FOUNDED BY A HERMIT.

An interesting story of the founding of a church in Africa is told by the biographer of the late Bishop Hannington. He says: "Some time ago a native servant of the pioneer evangelist, Rebmann, ran away from the Mission station of Rabai, Africa, under somewhat peculiar circumstances. He was a Christian, and, as the event proves, a sincere one. But—his temper was not always under control. In a fit of passion he struck his wife; the blow was fatal, and he fled. With the guilt of blood upon him he sought the discipline of solitude. He became a hermit. He lived 'for some time in great obscurity and absolute solitude.' He did not relapse into savagery. On the contrary, he seems to have lived a life spent chiefly in the study of the Gospel of St. Luke, his sole possession when he left the station. It happened, upon a certain day, that a man of Godoma, gathering wood in the forest, chanced upon the hermit reading a book. The encounter was alarming to both; but presently the man recognized in the forlorn student an old acquaintance, and called him by name—Abe Ngoa. After this the two had several interviews. The man of Godoma was curious to know what was the nature of the book which had so engrossed the other's attention. Abe Ngoa offered to teach him to read its pages. A comrade soon joined them; and the two persuaded the man of letters to leave his retreat and to return with them to the village as their instructor. He proved to be no ordinary tutor. His mind was saturated with the spirit of the book which he had so long pondered over. He imparted his knowledge with such fervor of faith, that eleven persons renounced their heathen 'customs,' and made it known that they had 'joined the book.'

"It was in 1874 that three men came into Frere Town from this obscure village of Godoma, to ask for baptism. A native catechist was sent to the village, and was warmly welcomed by the inquirers, over thirty in number. This body of thirty-four catechumens, so strangely found in an unknown village of a wild district, and far removed from all outside influence of any kind, had been gathered together solely and entirely by the teaching of one man, himself but half taught, and the possessor of but a single copy of the Gospels, but whose faith had been intensified by his long solitude in the wilderness, and by his continued pondering over the words which brought him a release from his sense of guilt.

"The first baptism took place on August 22, 1875, and about two months later a very important convert was won in the person of Abe Sidi, the head-man of the village. This Abe Sidi was a remarkable man, well fitted to be a leader, and who could not fail to influence others strongly. This man at once assumed the leadership and direction of the new Christian settlement, and became a zealous propagandist of the faith. Under his directions a church was built, and the community was regularly organized.

"From this time this 'independent, self-supporting, and simple, native Church continued to increase rapidly. In 1880 the opposition of the surrounding chiefs became rather pronounced, as more and more of the people declared against the old fetish 'customs.' The medicine men began to be aggressive. There were threats of burning down the church and village, and even of shooting or poisoning Abe Sidi himself. For this and other reasons it seems to have been decided that Abe Sidi should leave a strong community at Godoma, and himself lead off a 'swarm' to seek a new settlement farther north. He found a good site at Fulladoyo, which is an island on the river Voi. There he built his church and erected his grass huts, and there a considerable Christian population soon gathered around him, as they had done at Godoma.

"For three years this little independent self-governed community of African Bible Christians held their own against threats and persecutions. At last, reports spread that the slave-traders had prevailed to destroy the Christian settlement, and that Abe Sidi was a prisoner. Then came worse news; he is said to have died 'a horrible death' at the hands of the Mohammedan slave-holders. His settlement is destroyed, his people are scattered. It is the story of John the Baptist over again. The wicked seem to prevail, the godly man seems to perish. It is but seeming. The foundation-stones of the City of Peace are often cemented with blood."

A FATHER'S PROFANITY OVERCOME.

Victory over the habit of profane swearing, which is one of the most difficult to achieve, has come to a man in Kansas through the guidance of his little child. A journal of that State reports that a young man who was much given before his marriage, to the utterance of blasphemous ejaculations, and whose ordinary conversation was interlarded with oaths, was married a few years ago. Under the influence of his wife he made strong efforts to overcome the habit, but without much success, though he was ashamed of it, and restrained himself in her presence.

One morning, standing before the mirror shaving, the razor slipped, inflicting a slight wound. True to his fixed habit, he ejaculated the single word, "God!" and was not a little amazed and chagrined to see reflected in the mirror the pretty picture of his three-year-old daughter, as laying her doll hastily down, she sprang from her seat on the floor, exclaiming eagerly, and looking expectantly about the room, "Is Dod here?"

Pale and ashamed, and at a loss for a better answer, he simply said, "Why?"

"'Cause I thought He was, when I heard you speak to Him!"

Then, noticing the sober look on his face, as he gazed down into the innocent, radiant face, she patted him lovingly on the hand, exclaiming assuringly; "Call Him again, papa, and I dess He'll surely come!"

Catching the wondering child up in his arms, he knelt down, and for the first time in his life implored of God forgiveness for the past and help for his future, thanking Him in fervent spirit that He had not "surely come" before, in answer to some of his awful blasphemies.

A MUTE TESTIMONY IN CHINA.

A brother of Mr. Studd, the young collegian who is now a missionary in China, thus writes of his experience during a tour in the country: "About a year ago I started, with my brother and Mr. Orr Ewing, to go inland from Tien-tsin. We travelled first by boat for three or four days, until we came to a large city called Pau-ting Fu, and there we found American missionaries, who helped us on our way. Then we went overland, and for ten days we travelled on. Occasionally we met at an inn, or on the roadside, a man who had heard something about the foreigners' doctrine, but there was no missionary, no one in the ten days' journey to tell of the Lord Jesus Christ and His salvation; and yet the people were ready enough to hear. If one only sat down at a tea-shop on the roadside, there would at once be a crowd. Well, we were travelling along through the country, a sixteen days' journey, and there was only one station where there was a missionary; and yet we were passing through villages every two or three miles, and we went across a plain every day with, perhaps, three or four large walled cities. One felt oppressed with the multitude of people there—millions to whom the gospel had never yet been taken. And that is in a part of China which is, I suppose, as well supplied with missionaries as any other part. After sixteen days' journey we arrived at a station called T'ai-yuen, and there it was my privilege to be present at a service.

"It may be that we appear fools in the eyes of the Chinamen, especially at first, when we can only say two or three words. I have been through a little of that experience myself, because I did not learn the language at all; but still I used to enjoy going out into the streets night after night, with one of the friends who was preaching, and taking a banner or scroll, with the fundamental truths of Christianity, or a text, upon it, perhaps to be laughed at, and asked questions which I could not answer, because I could not understand. One felt that even to stand there mute as a witness for the Lord Jesus was an unspeakable privilege. I well remember one morning sitting on the city wall in T'ai-yuen. I was reading by myself, and a young Chinaman came up. He watched me for some time, and then he came closer, and seemed very friendly. I longed to be able to talk to him and tell him about Jesus. I asked the Lord that He would give me some little word to say, and He brought to my memory some words that I had heard preached in the streets the day before. I could point to the mission-house, and tell him of the meetings, and ask him whether he would not come. My heart felt that I would have given anything to preach the gospel to that man. And there are millions who would listen; it needs people to go and tell them."

THE ROMANCE OF MISSIONS.

In the course of an address delivered by the Rev. A. J. Gordon, D. D., of Boston, Mass., to an English audience, he graphically sketched the result of individual effort in the case of certain well-known missionaries, which he called the romance of missions. He described the marvellous outbreak of Christian faith among the Karen tribes, through one of the slave converts of Dr. Adoniram Judson's co-laborer, Mr. Boardman. In three years' time that slave was instrumental in leading to Christ 2,500 souls who were admitted into the Church by baptism. From that seed wonderful fruits have grown. The Karens have recently built a memorial hall to celebrate the jubilee of their missions, and for that purpose they raised among themselves 15,000 dollars. In contributing annually to the funds of the American Baptist Mission, these Karens come next in amount to the wealthy States of Massachusetts and New York. Another case of missionary success, even more wonderful, is that of the Telegu Mission, the story of which is now pretty well known. The first missionary to that part of India, said Dr. Gordon, is still living. The other day he celebrated his eightieth birthday in America, and his great desire is to be sent back to his loved field at Ongole. For thirty years he toiled on there without success. Then came the story of the young American engineer, Mr. Clough, who went to the Telegu—called "The Lone Star" Mission. The time of famine came, and the young engineer undertook the construction of a canal as relief works. He employed batches of 4,000 or 5,000 at a time, preaching the gospel to them in the evenings. Then, after a while he took on a fresh batch of laborers, and dealt with them in the same way. Almost the only thing he could preach in the language was John 3: 16, but that was enough for God to work upon, in fructifying the seed sown during many years. In the result 10,000 people made public profession of Christ in one year, and after being fully tested.

A CRY OF ALARM FROM INDIA.

The terrible plague of drunkenness is menacing India. Hitherto, both the Mohammedans and the high caste Hindoos have been preserved from it by the commands of their religion, but now the Indian Witness says: "Strong drink is raging furiously in India. The unimpeachable testimony of Christian officials places this fact beyond question. The moral, social, and religious inundation of India by this liquor deluge, which is hardly less destructive than the Noachian, seems probable. The Mahommedan smiles when you ask him why his co-religionists drinks; the three Napali castes, forbidden by their shastras to drink, are now slain by the excise system; while liquor-shops in Darjeeling are mostly kept by Brahmans! If caste is brushed aside by this awful tide, what can withstand its rage? 'For every native the mission is encing for good,' says the Rev. Mr. Turnbull, e drink traffic is influencing ten for evil.' here is only one evil which can destroy the wer of the body, the power of the soul, and power of the spirit at one fell stroke, and t,' says an English bishop, 'is the evil ef- ted by strong drink.' As a speaker at Dar- ling said, 'Our drink traffic commences with nging up a sign, "Wines and spirits sold here," ends by hanging up a man on the gallows.' , it does not end there, and will not end ile the flames of perdition continue to burn."

AFTER THE MILLENNIUM.

By John Storie, F. R. S. T.

Cor. 15: 24-28; Col. 1: 16-20; Rev. 20: 21, 22.

e Final Subjugation of all Authority—To be Executed by Christ—The Seven-Sealed Com- nission—Part Executed at the Second Advent—Two Enemies Still Remaining—Satan and Death—Satan Works a Second Fall—Dire Mis- hief to Follow—Final and Supreme Assault on he Deity—Satan Struck Down Red-handed—Death the Last Enemy—The End of its Reign.

WE are taught in these passages the Divine rpose in respect to this fallen world; that it s been selected as the field on which is to be ght out to its close the great spiritual con- t of the universe; that on it shall be put wn "all rule, and all authority, and all pow- ' that is arrayed against the majesty and minion of the Godhead; that the Second rson of the Divine Trinity has accepted the nmission to this end; that He has been in- ted, as the Son of Man, with the power ded for its complete execution; that He is fulfil here on this earth all that righteous- s demands for the expiating and arresting human sin; that He is to preside here in gment, and to reign here as King till He has dued and restrained rebellion, and "put un- His feet" all the enemies of the Godhead; t He is to deliver up to the Father ace rescued and immortal; creation in all its allen Principalities and Powers re-establish- and reconciled: and that, this done, and fidence and peace restored throughout the verse, all will then be received into immedi- and eternal union with the Godhead; and l will thenceforth be "all in all."

When the Lord Christ, as the Son of Man, eived from the Father's hand that seven- ed roll (Rev 5: 1-7), it conveyed to Him world as its Redeemer, and invested Him h the authority and power to enter on its plete possession; to deliver it from that dage in which it had been so long enslaved; to rescue God's people, the living and the d, from the malign influence of Satanic er. We see how the Son of Man descending he Glory and Majesty of His Epiphany, will down "the rule, the authority, and the er" of the Antichrist and the false Prophet; end this troubled dispensation by binding an in the prison of the abyss. One part of ist's commission thus fulfilled, but

Two Enemies will then Remain

God and man—the Devil or Satan and Death. ore the end can come, He is to put these two mies beneath His feet; and end their power ever.

the period we are now considering, the gdom of the Son of Man is established here, Satanic Tempter imprisoned, and the Spirit God poured out on all flesh. The earth is ding again its rich primeval harvests; the ons have known what it is to live in a world God would have it, free from war and want: grief and pain, and under the pious and teous rule of the Great King and His risen ts; a life like that of Adam in Paradise. this is destined to be invaded by a second ptation and ll in which not one man, but nations, perish. by whose agency is to be wrought this nd wreck? By the same, that old Serpent's, e Devil and Satan," who had before and through its ages of sin and sorrow deceived the world. "When the thousand years are finish- ed, He shall be loosed again out of His prison. (Rev. 20: 7.) He is to be once more free. In this period of His long imprisonment He shall have the time and the opportunity to look back over His blighted and wretched past; and will He come forth taught by the experience of that past; saddened and subdued by the consciousness of past wrong; convinced of the madness of renewed defiance; and prepared to enter, as modern spiritists are teaching, on a wiser and nobler career? No! "He shall go forth" unchanged and unchangeable, fired with only madder passion, "to lead astray the nations which are in the four corners of the earth, Gog and Magog"; and exciting in them a spirit of malignant hostility against the favored nation and its king. "He will gather them together to the war, the number of them as the sand of the sea;" and lead them on to

on the Son of Man and His cause. They cover with their armies the whole breadth of the Land of Israel, and, breathing extermination, "they compass with a beseiging host the camp * of the saints and the Beloved City." (Ver. 9.) As to these invading nations, it is ruin. "Fire comes down out of heaven to destroy them." In this last act of impiety they perish, and remain among the dead for judgment. But the Devil, He who leads them in this last rebellion, what of Him? "He is cast into the Lake of fire and brimstone; where the Beast and the false Prophet already are." Ver. 10; Matt. 25: 41.)

But why—if it be fore-known that this will be His immediate action and this

Dire Mischief is to Follow

—why is He to be let loose again by the Son of Man? What can justify this act of his liberation? We are told that there is not only a reason for it, but a divine necessity. "When the thousand years are fulfilled He must be loosed for a little season." (Ver. 3.) The statement is absolute. "He must be." This last loosing of man's tempter and man's destroyer is declared to be an act of mediatorial administration, in which the Son of Man is under the control of a divine decision. It is not only to be permitted, but is, at this last stage of the Divine judgment, inevitable; and if for some great end or ends judged to be essential and inevitable, then certainly for these two:

First. That there may be, before the closing of Christ's intermediation, one last dreadful manifestation of sin; one last example in the face of creation of its blinding, corroding, mad dening, merciless power; of that ineradicable and unrestrainable force in which it may rise when it reigns within the will of one to whom a nature has been given, intelligent and free.

The Infatuating Impulse of a single malignant passion in a strong, intelligent agent, bent on resistance to the Eternal Law of right, free to act, and conscious of ability to act its purpose out, is known only to God. We do not yet know the daring defiance to which this may reach, nor does creation know it—its aim the deposing of the Godhead. But in this, the last act of the fallen Archangel, the demonstration is complete. Transgression is then to be seen by men and angels in its finish, its crisis, and its close; its last act the foulest and the maddest; and its gain, perdition.

And second, It "must be" in order to the vindication of Eternal righteousness. This mighty Being has chosen deliberately to fall from his fidelity to God, and to spend the life and powers God-given in resisting and degrading that Law which lives and reigns within the Godhead, and binds the Creator and intelligent universe in one. He has chosen to be, through these long troubled ages, the instigator of transgression, disorder, and ruin; false and the father of lies; deceiving men and angels; instigating hatred and murder; destroying the bodies and souls of unnumbered men; all this amid divine forbearance. But is the long-suffering of heaven never to end? Yes! It is to end, and to end now that he is seen using this last hour of granted liberty to assault the camp of the saints of God, and head the nations to their destruction. In justice to those who might live on in fear to fall his victims; in justice to those who have been the wondering and anxious witnesses of his long license and his unavenged misdeeds; in mercy to a creation that has suffered in confusion and danger so long, the decisive hour has come to stop his career, and to stop it for-ever. He is by the Son of Man, into the Lake of Fire; and heaven and earth set free. He inspired men of light and leading to teach that though men live and die here unsaved, they may yet find a place of repentance. He has found none. He gave currency to the lie that there is no Hell. He believes it now, that everlasting fire has been prepared for him and his angels. Damnation he has long set at defiance; its sentence is now resting on his head. He has spread far and wide the doctrine that annihilation is the doom of the lost; he is himself to live on for ever; in prison for ever; in torment for ever; Satanic for ever. This his end! he is put down by the Son of Man. "It must be."

One enemy still remains,

The Last Enemy,

death. That, too, is to be put down by the Son of Man. "After this," John writes, "I saw a great White Throne, and Him that sat on it; and I saw the dead, the great and the small, standing before the Throne, . . . and the sea gave up the dead that were in it;* and Death and Hades gave up the dead which were in them"—that is, Death gave up its hold on the bodies, and Hades its hold on the souls of men. "And they were judged every one according to their works. And Death and Hades were cast into the Lake of Fire. This is death the second. And if any was not found written in the Book of Life, he was cast into the Lake of Fire." (20: 11-13.)† Thus is brought to pass the end of death; not in its extinction; not in the destruction of its power, but the end of its reign here. While death was under the power of Satan, it reigned over all flesh. But in that dread Day of judgment it is to be severed from his control by the Son of Man; restrained for ever from acting on this regenerate earth; and shut up by Him in the Lake of Fire, there to hold in its grasp the lost and the condemned. This is death as it shall be; death in its new and eternal form; Death the Second.

Thus is to end the conflict and the victory of the Son of Man; not in annihilating the Antichrist, the Devil, the dead, or death, or Hades (a breath of the Almighty might do that), but in putting down all rule and authority and power that has lifted head or hand against heaven; and in ending for ever within the scope of this world both the will and power of transgression.

* The exact meaning of this word is to my mind by no means clear. Scott and Liddel give it: "A drawing up in battle order; a body so drawn up; then, a camp; a fortified place."

* Not only those who from time to time have found a grave in it, but more especially the bodies of that whole generation which perished in the flood; and it may be the fallen angels who had led the daughters of Adam astray. (Comp. Jude 5: 6.)

† This is the final resurrection and final judgment. These are the dead who have lived and died in all ages since the fall of Adam, the millions who have not shared in the first resurrection and have not been with the Lord in glory during the Parousia and the millennial age.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Rejection of the Fisheries Treaty with Great Britain and Canada was carried in the Senate on August 21, by the strict party vote of 30 to 27. It has been evident throughout the long debate that the Senators were determined, for political reasons, that the treaty should not be ratified. That the treaty was defective, was generally admitted, even by Democrats, but had it been perfect it would have had no chance of ratification by the Republican Senate. That fact was proven by the reception given to an amendment moved by Senator Gibson, of Louisiana, who, foreseeing the rejection of the treaty, proposed that it be referred to a committee who should point out its defects and suggest such improvements as would render it acceptable to the Senate. This proposal was also rejected by a strict party vote. The Senate, evidently, did not wish the question settled, at any rate by a Democratic administration. The treaty was therefore rejected, and the subject must remain in abeyance until after the Presidential election. There is a possibility that then, when political capital cannot be made out of it, another effort will be made to arrive at an amicable settlement with Canada of the question.

The Project of Retaliation upon Canada was revived in a message sent by President Cleveland to Congress on Thursday last. The rejection of the treaty leaves the fishery question in an anomalous condition, and disputes are likely to arise in which the claims of American fishermen will be disregarded by the Canadian authorities. The President, therefore, asked Congress to grant him power to suspend certain laws which operate in favor of Canada. He appears to think that it may not be necessary to use such power, but the fact of his having it might exercise a deterrent influence on Canada. The Canadian authorities would be less likely to take severe measures with American fishermen if they knew that their doing so would provoke the President to exercise the power granted to him. The laws which the President wishes to have the power to suspend, are those permitting the transportation of goods through the United States to and from Canada without the payment of duties. When the St. Lawrence River is closed in winter it is a convenience to Canada to have goods from Europe landed at United States ports and sent by rail to Canada, and to have her exports sent in the same way. During the past six years goods worth $270,000,000 have been so sent without the payment of duty. This right or privilege the President now asks Congress to give him the power to withhold. It was doubtless suggested by the fact that a prominent subject of dispute in the negotiation of the treaty was the desire American fishermen expressed to send their catch home by Canadian railroads. Another form of retaliation is connected with canal traffic. At present the boats of both countries pay the same tolls, but the President states that Canadian boats, though paying the same tolls as United States boats, are repaid a portion of the tolls paid. He now proposes to exercise similar discrimination on American canals in favor of American vessels. This mode of dealing with the question may be good politics, but it is undignified, and unworthy of two great Christian nations.

The Cyclonic Storm which Traversed the United States from New Orleans to New York, on Tuesday, August 21, was of extraordinary violence, and caused serious loss of life and property. Its centre travelled from New Orleans to Louisville, Ky., at the rate of twenty-three miles an hour; but from that point its speed increased to fifty-two miles an hour. As it passed over Maryland it cut a clean path fifty feet wide, for several miles, tearing up and destroying buildings, trees, and shipping. In the village of Still Pond, it overthrew a factory, killing eleven persons and injuring six others severely. At Wilmington, Del., one man was killed, and about a score seriously injured. At Pittsburg, Penn., bridges were swept away and four persons drowned. In New York, the furious downpour of rain by which it was accompanied, caused barrels of lime to slack in unfinished buildings, and led to four disastrous fires. Many buildings were injured and much property was washed away.

The Yellow Fever Epidemic at Jacksonville, Fla., developed with alarming rapidity last week. The first notable rise in the daily bulletins occurred on Wednesday, when nine new cases were reported, and this was followed by Thursday's report of sixteen new cases, and two deaths. It is believed that the sudden rise in the rate is in part due to the greater promptitude of the physicians in reporting cases, but the disease is unquestionably spreading. This fact is now clearly recognized by the authorities, and greater care in enforcing isolation and quarantine is being taken. The physicians, also, are becoming more systematic in their management of the sick and convalescent. The general cleaning up of the city is still going on. Lime is again to be sprinkled everywhere. The whitewash gang is giving every tree trunk, post, hydrant, curbing, and sidewalk edge another thick coat of lime, to which some of the chloride of mercury will be added. Congress has appropriated $200,000 to aid State or municipal Boards of Health in establishing efficient quarantine and sanitary precautions.

Another Fatal Marine Disaster Occurred on August 22 off the San Francisco coast. The steamer City of Chester set out from San Francisco at half-past nine o'clock in the morning, bound for Eureka, on the northern coast of California. When near Fort Point she ran into a fog and began sounding her fog-horn. In a few moments it was answered by another fog-horn, and the City of Chester signalled to the approaching vessel to pass on the left side. Her signal must have been misunderstood, for in less than a minute the huge prow of the other steamer crashed into her side, cutting her almost in half. The colliding vessel proved to be the Oceanic, from Hong Kong. Some of the City of Chester's passengers and crew climbed upon the Oceanic before she backed out of the chasm her prow had made, and were saved. Others ran to the boats and cut them adrift, and others, again, seized life-preservers and jumped over into the sea. The Oceanic also promptly lowered her boats to rescue the floating human beings. All were saved who managed to keep afloat, but some were below the decks of the City of Chester, and had not time to get out. The vessel sank in five minutes, and at least thirteen persons sank with her. This catastrophe, like that of the Thingvalla, emphasizes the need for a better system of signalling in a fog.

The Earthquakes and Volcanic Eruptions in Japan are more fully described in the mails received last week than in the previous telegraphic reports. It appears that on July 15, about 8 o'clock in the morning, there was a terrific volcanic eruption on Mount Bandai, in the province of Inawashiro, one of the northern and hilly provinces. Over five hundred people were buried alive and over one thousand wounded. This eruption was preceded by three severe shocks of earthquake. The third shock had scarcely passed, when Mount Bandai was seen to have lost its head, and an immense black cloud hung over the mountain and the sky. In another second the cloud was broken up into fragments and began to fall in minute lava and ashes, soon covering the ground six inches deep. At the same moment two streams of boiling mud, presumably burned stones and rocks, were thrown up from the fiery peak, which filled up valleys in the vicinity, and newly formed many a hill over them. The area of ground thus covered with the boiling mud is now roughly estimated at fifteen miles square, burying everything underneath, including nearly every living thing. The estimate of deaths at five hundred is a mere guess on the part of the authorities.

The African Slave Trade, to which the Attention of Europe is being called by M. Lavigerie, appears to be largely the result of ignorance as well as of cupidity. M. de Brazza, the explorer, stated, in an interview published in the New York Herald, that he once bought forty slaves, and kept them for some months under the care of kind overseers. Then he set them at liberty, and supplied them with huts and tools in the hope that they would settle down to agriculture, but they ran away, returned to their old homes, and were re-enslaved. Subsequently he bought three hundred men for ten cents each, and conducted them to the coast, where they worked for two years. There they saw that a ball of rubber, which cost practically nothing in their woods, would sell for more than a slave cost. When they returned to their tribe, they told what they had seen, and the tribe, instead of selling their able-bodied men as slaves, set them to work carrying rubber to the coast. Slave dealing, M. de Brazza states, has wholly disappeared among that tribe. He argues that education and enlightenment would do more to annihilate the slave trade than soldiers. The tribes themselves connived at the traffic, or it could not be carried on.

General Boulanger has Gained a Political triumph in the French elections. He was last week at the head of the poll in three separate districts. He was triumphantly elected by the Department of the Somme, and in the Departments of the Nord and the Charente Inférieure he received more votes than any of his rivals, though not the majority of all the votes cast, which under the French constitution is required for election. His aggregate majority in the three Departments was 101,894, in a total vote of 678,700. The fact that in spite of his failure as a legislator, and in spite of the ridiculous figure he made in his recent duel, he should receive so large a support at the polls, receives a significant explanation in Parisian journals. It is stated that Legitimists, Royalists, and Bonapartists have combined to support him under the belief that he is an enemy to the Republic, and that in his popularity and ambition are the surest means of overthrowing it. It is confidently believed that a popular vote, like Louis Napoleon's plebiscites, would make Boulanger the ruler of France.

The Right Rev. Samuel S. Harris, Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Diocese of Michigan, died in London on August 21. As mentioned in our last week's edition, he was stricken with paralysis at a service in Winchester Cathedral. The Bishop was only forty-seven years of age, having been born in Alabama in 1841. His early manhood was spent in the study of the law, but he practiced for only a few months before the war broke out. He enlisted in an Alabama regiment, and before the close of the war he had risen to the rank of colonel. He opened an office in New York in 1866, but soon afterward quitted the profession to study theology. He was ordained in 1869, and was elected Bishop of Quincey, Ill., in 1878. At the urgent request of his church in Chicago, he declined the office, but the following year he was again elected, this time by the Diocese of Michigan, and that call he felt it his duty to accept.

A Letter from the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon was received last week by Dr. William Stewart, of Winchester, Ky., in acknowledgment of the resolutions of sympathy and confidence recently adopted by the General Association at Eminence, Ky. In the course of his letter Mr. Spurgeon says: "I must beg you to thank all the kind friends who have thought upon me in the day of trouble, and have so generously sympathized with me. The letter was a note of good cheer, and the resolution stirs my soul as a clarion blast arouses a warrior. I feel that I must live a noble life to deserve such Christian love. I am none the less a Baptist because I leave the Baptist Union, but I think I am all the more a Baptist of the old style. I am, at least, one with you all. I feel that I am spiritually a member of an International Baptist Union, a part of which is in Kentucky. God bless that portion of a great whole! Of personal affliction I have lately had a varied store, but none too much. My beloved wife, though a great invalid, is spared to me, and the joy of having her alive is a very great mitigation of the pain of having her ill. The Lord has so enriched me by pain and sorrow that I cannot wish to be spared a measure of it. It has brought me nothing but good. It has brought me the precious spices of your brotherly sympathy, and in its sweet odor I am very happy this day. The Lord reward you all for this great deed of kindness. Peace be to your churches. Success to your ministers. Bliss to all your hearts."

A Snake at a Camp Meeting Caused Some excitement at Asbury Park, N. J., on August 19. About noon on that day the gospel tent was crowded with colored people, and a prayer was being offered by an earnest preacher, when a piercing shriek rang through the meeting, and a woman, jumping on a chair, pointed to the straw in the aisle. All eyes were directed to the spot, but nothing could be seen that could account for the woman's terror. She declared, however, that she had seen a big black snake crawling toward the platform. Search was made for it, but without success. The service was resumed, but in a few minutes there was a chorus of screams from the front. A huge snake emerged from the straw close to the platform. The women ran, but one of the preachers jumping off the platform, set his foot vigorously on the snake's head, while others trampled its body flat. It would be well if Satan, of whom the serpent is a type, always met with so vigorous a resistance when he comes, as he often does, into religious assemblies. Unhappily his motions are generally too subtle for recognition, and he succeeds in distracting thought, encouraging procrastination and deadening the soul to divine influence. (II Cor. 11: 3.)

A Dismayed Bridegroom Fled from Virginia City, Nev., to California recently. A newspaper of that city states that some time ago a clerk twenty-three years of age, in a grocery house, entered into correspondence with a Chicago lady whom he heard of through a matrimonial agency. She represented that she was owner of considerable real estate, and was of amiable disposition. Her photograph which she sent to him was of a woman about thirty, with blond hair and handsome features. It was the last she had had taken, she said, but did not say how long a time had elapsed since she sat for it. The clerk having ascertained that the real estate was genuine, promptly proposed marriage, and when the lady accepted him, he was highly elated, and was congratulated on his good fortune, by his friends. The marriage was to take place at Virginia City, two weeks ago. On the day before that fixed for the ceremony, the bridegroom went to meet his bride at the depot. To his amazement he met a lady fully sixty years of age, whose hair was snowy white and whose features were wrinkled with age. Concealing his disappointment as well as he could, he conducted her to the rooms engaged for her in the hotel, and then excusing himself for a brief absence on business, he hurried to the depot, and took the first train for California. The lady, on hearing of his departure, rightly concluded that he did not intend to return, and took her departure for Chicago. She must have been prepared for the clerk's disappointment at her appearance, but may have supposed that he would overlook that for the sake of her property. It is well for the Church, which is Christ's bride, that she need have no such apprehension, though she is both poor and disfigured by sins and shortcomings. When she meets the Bridegroom she will be transformed, and be perfect in beauty. (Eph. 5: 27.)

Detailed Preparations for a Funeral were made fifteen years ago by a citizen of Mobile, Ala., who died August 15. The deceased was a man of singular habits. Fifteen years ago he purchased a red cedar log, which he had taken to a saw-mill and sawed into plank; then he went to the shop of a cabinetmaker, had his measure taken, and gave directions for the manufacture of a coffin of the red cedar planks. The casket when finished was regarded as a fine piece of workmanship. The owner then had it taken to an undertaker's place, where it was trimmed according to his taste. The coffin was then taken to his bedroom, and has ever since occupied a place against the wall at the head of his bead. After his death on Wednesday, it was taken down, and on being examined was found to contain a complete suit of clothing and underwear, to be used in laying out his body. He was buried in this coffin on August 16. The Mobile journal which records these facts, does not say whether the deceased was a Christian man. The natural inference, from the fact that he had contemplated his death, and had made preparation for it, would be that he did not neglect the most important preparation of all—that of securing through Christ a place in heaven. Unhappily the inference is not always a safe one. Too often men make every preparation for death but that. (Prov. 19: 20.)

Six Days of Lonely Suffering on a Mountain were endured by a traveller in Colorado recently. He started out from Breckenridge, Col., on August 10, to cross the Silver Plume by the Argentine Pass. He reached the top of the range at about dark. He missed the road at a very dangerous place, and followed an abandoned trail. Missing his footing on a broken bridge, he was precipitated to the bottom of the gulley, a distance of twenty-five feet. The poor fellow broke one arm and both legs in his fall. In this condition the unfortunate traveller remained on the mountain for a period of six days and six nights, suffering untold torture, with no food or drink. He cried for help, but no succor came until the sixth day, when a traveller happened to cross the range and found the helpless man yet conscious. After giving the sufferer a drink of water, the rescuer at once went for assistance, a distance of fifteen miles, and upon his return he found the suffering man still alive. He was carried to a carriage and placed upon a comfortable cushion, and taken back to Breckenridge, but before reaching that place he died. Such work as that rescuer did for the helpless traveller needs to be done for many, quite as helpless, who have fallen upon the mountains of sin. The Christian worker who seeks such, has more hope to encourage him because none ever perish who are led by him to Christ. (Matt. 28: 18–20.)

Twenty-five Dollars were Paid for a Penknife on August 12 under peculiar circumstances. A lady residing at Ashland, Ky., was notified by the postmaster that a registered letter was awaiting her at the post-office. On opening it she was surprised to find enclosed twenty-five dollars, and a note explaining the remittance. The writer said: "You will doubtless be surprised in receiving the contents of this letter. When your father lived in Clarksburg, O., and sold goods, I was a boy. I took a pen-knife from his store and never paid for it. I feel it my duty to compensate some one of the family for it. I have learned that you are his youngest child. Hence send you $25." It is now over fifty years since the lady's father was in business at Clarksburg, so it would appear that the thief's conscience has operated after half a century. He has now gone beyond the Levitical law, which required that in making restitution to the person wronged, or his kinsman, a fifth of the value should be added to the principal. (Num 5: 7.) It may be hoped that the repentant thief has also remembered that his sin was a sin against God, for which even restitution to man will not atone, but which can be blotted out through faith in Christ. (Zech. 13: 1.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The King of Sweden entertained the delegates to the Conference of Young Men's Christian Associations at luncheon on August 20.

An aged Christian Burmese lady, who was baptized by Dr. Adoniram Judson, has given three thousand rupees (about $1,500) to the Judson Memorial Church building fund.

The priests of the Roman Catholic Church of the Holy Family in Chicago have notified parents that any child attending the public schools of the city will not be prepared for first communion.

It is believed that fully five hundred persons were converted at the Sing Sing Camp Meeting, which closed on August 19. Rev. Thomas Harrison and other preachers addressed audiences of eight thousand persons.

Rev. A. B. Simpson announces that the annual convention of the Gospel Tabernacle Church in New York will be held October 1 to 8. As the Tabernacle has been sold recently, the place of meeting has not been fixed.

An effort to build a Free Will Baptist Church is being made by our friends of Concord, Ky. They need a little outside help, and their cause is strongly endorsed by well-known men. Contributions may be sent to Mr. W. H. Cox, Concord, Ky.

The corporation of Holy Trinity Church, New York, has appealed to the United States Supreme Court against the decision of Judge Wallace, condemning it to a fine for importing a rector (Rev. E. Walpole Warren) from England, in violation of the contract labor law.

At the late meeting of the Moody Bible Society, in Northfield, Mass., ninety persons pledged themselves to foreign mission work, twenty of them having formed a band for missionary work since the school opened. Several expect to begin work in the foreign field this year.

The centennial of the Friends' Meeting House at Plainfield, N. J., was celebrated on August 20. The Society was organized in 1721, but the meeting-house was not built until 1788. Among the members who attended the celebration on Sunday was Miss Catherine R. Laing, who is ninety-two years old.

The anarchist, Johann Most, in his examination before the Congressional Immigration Committee made the statement that the laws of this country were as stringent against socialism as those of any other land, and that in these days there was no difference between monarchies and republics. If European journals will publish his statement, perhaps, some of his brethren contemplating emigration will stay in Europe.

Dr. George T. Dowling, pastor of the Euclid Avenue Baptist Church, Columbus, O., has resigned his pastorate. As mentioned in a recent number of this journal he invited all in the congregation who loved the Lord Jesus Christ to join with the church in celebrating the Lord's Supper. The comments upon this action by his brethren have led him to retire from the denomination. After a season of rest he will recommence preaching, probably among the Congregationalists.

THE RULE OF THE RACE.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Let us run with patience the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus the author and finisher of our faith; who for the joy that was set before Him endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God." Heb. 12 : 1, 2.

The Foot-Race in the Olympic Games—The Celestial Spectators—The Weights to be Laid Aside—A Competition Between Ploughmen—All Eyes to be on Jesus—I. As the Author of Faith—On What He has Wrought—II. As the Finisher of Faith—As a Rewarder of the Victors—What to Look Away From—III. As the Pattern of Faith—In Motive—In Endurance—A Man Stung to Death by Wasps—IV. As the Goal of Faith—Getting Nearer to Him.

THE apostle saith, "Let us run." He has in his mind's eye the Olympic games, where all the different tribes of Greece were gathered together in general assembly to display the prowess of the race. Among the athletic exercises were foot-races. The apostle makes this foot-race an illustration of the Christian life. We must run with patience along the appointed course if we would win the prize of our high calling.

Before we start, with a wave of the hand the apostle directs us to who throng the sides of the course. There were always such at those races: each city and state yielded its contingent, and the assembled throng watched with eager eye the efforts of those who strove for the mastery. Those who look down upon us from yonder heavens are described as "so great a cloud of witnesses." These compass us about. Thousands upon thousands who have run this race before us, and have attained their crowns, behold us from their heavenly seats, and mark how we behave ourselves. This race is worth running, for the eyes of "the nations of them which are saved" are fixed upon us. This is no hole-and-corner business, this running for the great prize. Angels and principalities and powers, and hosts redeemed by blood, have mustered to behold the glorious spectacle of men agonizing for holiness, and putting forth their utmost strength to copy the Lord Jesus. Ye that are men, now run for it!

Our apostle, anxious that we should so run that we may obtain, points to certain which he foresees will hinder us, and he says, "Let us lay aside every weight." Note how he includes himself, so that his warning may not sound like upbraiding. We cannot win if we are weighted; the pace will have to be very swift, and we cannot get to it, or keep it up, if we have weights to carry. Unloaded, we shall find the race taxing all our powers; but weighted, we shall be doomed to failure. Oh, to lay aside all carking care, fretfulness, ambition, anger, greed, and selfish desire! These were never worth the labor they have cost us; but now that we have become running-men, we must have done with them.

Still attentively considering us, the apostle notes that even when the weights are laid aside, there is a garment about us which will assuredly twist about our feet, and throw us down.

Sin, as Well as Care, must be laid aside. It doth easily beset us, and therefore we must be more careful to be rid of it. Our original sin, our natural tendencies, our constitutional infirmities—these must be laid aside as garments unsuitable for men who are running the heavenly race. We cannot win heaven and wear sin. Heaven is for the holy: "there shall in no wise enter into it anything that defileth." Darling sins must go first: these as they are most loved, will have the most power to hinder. Every kind of sin must be watched against, and struggled against, and mastered. "Sin shall not have dominion over you." We hope to see all our tendencies to sin killed and buried—buried so deep that not even a bone of a sin shall be left above ground. This will be heaven to us.

Do I not hear you say, "May God help us"? This must be a tough race which requires such stripping as this. If every weight of care must be laid aside, and every rag of sin, who is sufficient for these things? We are compelled even before we take a step in the running, to bow the knee, and cry unto the strong for strength. We dare not retreat from the contest; but how can we begin a struggle for which

We are so Unfitted?

Who will help us? To whom shall we look? Does not all this very admirably introduce the verse which is specially my text—"Looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith"?

But the apostle has not quite done with us, for he warns us to remember the rules of the course in these words, "Let us run with patience the race that is set before us." You are not to run anyhow, or anywhere: you must keep the appointed course, or you might as well stand still. The way of God's command, the way of obedience, the way of humble trustfulness, the spiritual way, the way of the life given from above—this, and no other way will do, for this is the race set before you! Do you shrink? Does the way seem too mysterious, too contrary to the flesh, too trying? All this adds to the force of the precept—"Looking unto Jesus." Because the way itself and the rules of the running are such as your nature will fight against, therefore look the more earnestly to the great Captain of your salvation.

In a race a great point is the way in which a man keeps his eyes. I have read of who were set to plough for a prize. The most of them made very crooked work of it. After they had ended, one of the judges said, "Young man, where did you look while you were ploughing?" "I kept my eyes well on the plough handles, sir, and saw what I had to hold." "Yes," the judge said, "and your plough went in and out, and the furrow is all crooks." He asked the next ploughman, "And where did you look?" "Well, sir," he answered, "I looked at my furrow; I kept my eye always on the furrow that I was making. I thought that I should make it straight that way." "But you did not," answered the judge; "you were all over the place." To the next he said, "What did you look at?" "Well, sir," he said, "I looked between the two horses to a tree that stood in the hedge at the other end of the field, right in front of me." Now that man went straight, because he had a fixed mark to guide him. This helps us to appreciate the wisdon of the text, "Looking unto Jesus." Run: run straight: you cannot run straight except you keep your eye on one who is always the same.

I. First, then, we are to look to Jesus as

The Author of Faith.

The beginning of faith is "Looking unto Jesus." Let us consider this. We have to look to Jesus, first, by trusting in that which He has wrought for us. It is described in these words—"Who for the joy that was set before Him endured the cross, despising the shame." Jesus has endured the suffering and shame which were due to us. O soul, thou canst never start on the road to heaven unless thou dost look to Him who "endured the cross" on thy behalf! Thy sin will make thee to endure the wrath of God forever, unless thou dost look to Him who bore our sins in His own body on the tree. Thou must get a faith's view of the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world, or else thou hast not even begun the heavenward race.

Dost thou look upon thine own righteousness with pleasure? This is an ill start for thee, thy back is on the prize. "As many as are of the works of the law are under the curse." Dost thou look to thy frames and feelings? Thou wilt make a bad start with these, for they will guide thee into a fog, in which thou wilt lose the track. Look thou to Jesus, the suffering Saviour. He by His bearing the cross, has removed thy heaviest weights, and by His death has destroyed thine entangling sin. He can renew thy nature by His resurrection power, and save thee from the dominion of sin by His glorious reign. If thou lookest alone to Him, thou startest well; but not else.

But then, dear friends, we also begin looking unto Jesus, because of what He has wrought in us. I would remind you who are a good way on in the course of those first eager paces with which you started heavenward. Did you not begin with looking unto Jesus? As you have received Christ Jesus the Lord, so continue in Him. The Lord Jesus first called us out of darkness into His marvellous light. Did He not give us pardon at our setting out? It was by looking to Him that the great load of sin fell from off our conscience. With pardon of sin came a great loathing of sin; washed in the precious blood, we could not wantonly repeat the stains. Our earliest repentance and its fruits came from "looking unto Jesus."

Have I any here this morning who are about to start for heaven? Mind that you start aright. I pray you, do not fall into any delusion. Do not imagine that your life will avail you anything, however good and moral it may have been, unless you begin by looking unto Jesus. Mr. Bunyan, in his "Pilgrim's Progress," frequently speaks of those who tumbled over the wall, or came in by other irregular ways; but they all missed the end. As they came in without Christ, so they went out without hope. One who came near to the celestial city, who had not come in at the gate, was made to know that there is a back way to hell, even from the gate of heaven. You must begin with looking unto Jesus, or you will end with a fearful looking for judgment. Doth not Jesus say, "I am the beginning"? Would you set up another beginning?

II. But now, secondly, we must look to Jesus as

The Finisher of Faith.

As Jesus is at the commencement of the course, starting the runners, so He is at the end of the course, the rewarder of those who endure to the end. Those who would win in the great race must keep their eyes upon Him all along the course, even till they reach the winning-post.

Jesus has sat down; He takes His rest because He has completed His work. Here on earth He was filled with shame, but yonder in glory He is full of honor, for He is set down "at the right hand of God." Here He was bound, and led captive; there He is King of kings and Lord of lords, for He sits at the right hand of the throne of God. Here on earth we see His manhood, born in a manger, living in poverty, dying the ignominious death of the cross; there we adore His divine glory, for He is "at the right hand of the throne of God." Think of your Saviour as your God, clothed with all power and authority. Surely this should urge you to quicken your pace, and never to become weary or faint. You began by looking to Him as a sufferer, persevere by looking to Him as a victor.

Looking unto Jesus, you will get many a direction; for, as He sits at the winning-post, His very presence indicates the way. If our eyes are up to Him, as the eyes of a servant to her mistress, we shall run well. "Be ye not as the horse, or as the mule, which have no understanding, whose mouth must be held in with bit and bridle"; but say with David, "Thou shalt guide me with thine eye."

of Jesus is enough for a saint; and if you, my hearer, are indeed "looking unto Jesus," you will avoid crooks and turns, and will take the shortest road to holiness and eternal glory. Consider Him who endured such contradiction of sinners against Himself, and you will not grow weary, neither will you miss your way.

When the race is over, Jesus will appear as the finisher of faith by coming forward to crown you with His own right hand. Yes, His hand shall award the prize, and His lips shall say, "Well done, good and faithful servant." Jesus Himself will admit the faithful to the place which He has gone to prepare for them. Wherefore be of good courage and run! Jesus at the end of the race will enthrone us with Himself.

I invite you, taking the sense of the word "looking" which I have already hinted at, to urn over in your mind these things. Look away from all self-denials, difficulties, labors, sufferings, temptations, and persecutions; and equally look away from all pleasures, profits, and preferments, and look to Jesus, who has won the race Himself, and now helps you in the race, and holds out the crown at the end of it. Does Jesus lean forward as if He would crown me even now? Then I will quicken my pace to come to Him. Does the Holy Spirit help my infirmities? Then will I run in His strength.

III. Let us next consider our Lord Jesus as

The Pattern of Faith.

Run, as Jesus ran, and look to Him as you run, that you may run like Him. How did our Lord pursue His course? You will see this if you first note His motive: "Who for the joy that was set before Him." Jesus had a motive in all that He did. Men do not do much if they act from mere feeling, and have no underlying design. Indeed, a life without an object must be a frivolous, useless life. Jesus had before Him the great joy of glorifying the Father in the salvation of His chosen. For this He lived, for this He died: it was a joy to Him to think of accomplishing this object. Beloved, if you want to run your race aright, it must be for the glory of God, and in the hope of the salvation of your fellow-men. These two things, blended into one, must be your joy. Oh that this motive took possession of our entire being!

Wherein are we to imitate Jesus? First, we are to copy His endurance. He

"Endured the Cross."

Ours is a trifling cross compared with that which pressed Him down; but He endured it. He took it up willingly, and carried it patiently. He never rebelled against it, and never relinquished it. He bore the cross till the cross bore Him, and then He bore death upon it. He could say, "It is finished." Brethren, let us do the same. Are you persecuted, are you poor, are you sick?—take up the appointed cross. Do not try to escape trouble: the followers of the Crucified must be familiar with the cross.

Imitate your Lord in His magnanimity. He endured the cross, "despising the shame." Shame is a cruel thing to many hearts. Our Lord shows us how to treat it. See, He puts His shoulder under the cross, but He sets His foot upon the shame. He endures the one, but He despises the other. What! Shall His disciples make much of that which He despised? Are you such gentlemen, that none may come between the wind and your nobility? I wonder when I hear some people say, "I cannot stand being laughed at." Does laughter break bones? "But ridicule is very sharp!" Is it? Do the wounds bleed? "Well," cries one, "a keen sarcasm from a wit stings you!" Does it? Have you no cures for such bites? Some of us have been like Marcus Arethusa, who was and yet we are none the worse, but rather are we all the better, for there remains no place whereon a new sting can operate. Oh, that some of you, who are so tender, could have thicker skins in this respect! I heard of a prayer the other day which I did not quite like at first, but there is something in it after all. The good man said, "Lord, if our hearts are hard, make them soft; but if our hearts are too soft, make them hard." I know what he meant, and I think I can pray that last prayer for some of my friends who are so delicate that a sneer would kill them. Shut your ears and run, despising the shame.

Our Saviour is to be imitated in His perseverance. For the joy that was set before Him He endured the cross, despising the shame, and "is set down." He never stopped running till He could sit down at the right hand of the throne of God; and that is the only place where you may sit down. My brother, Satan puts before you a comfortable arm-chair, and he says: "Take thine ease." No, no; run till you can sit down at the right hand of the throne of God. There are many dainty little arbors all along the Hill Difficulty, with settles and tables; and men, if they get into them, are very apt to fall asleep, and lose their roll of comfortable assurance: therefore, pass these arbors by. The only running that will save is persevering running. From starting-point to winning-post there must be no pausing. We must practice daily obedience, daily holiness, daily service. An off-and-on religion is a false religion. We must keep to the running till God gives us rest.

IV. Lastly, our text sets before us Jesus as

The Goal of Faith.

We are to run "looking unto Jesus" as the end we should aim at. We go towards our Lord every step that we take. True faith neither goes away from Christ Jesus, nor takes a roundabout road to Jesus, nor so much as dreams of going beyond Jesus. We have wise men about us nowadays who are going a long way beyond the gospel. The old faith which inspired apostles, enabled the glorious army of martyrs to lay down their lives, and produced the noblest of human characters in past ages, is not good enough for the superfine sophists of these days. This boastful nineteenth century demands a new God, a new Christ, a new heaven, a new hell, a new gospel, and everything else new except a new heart. But we, brethren, are not going to run in that direction. We run toward Christ.

Let us run toward Jesus, that we may grow more like Him. It is one of the virtues of Jesus that He transforms into His own image those who look at Him. He photographs Himself upon all sensitive hearts. There are no looking-glasses that I know of which improve the looker's eye; but this mirror of God, as you look into it, enlightens your eyes and beautifies your character. As you see Christ you become Christians. Oh, beloved, our lives would not be so faulty, so wrinkled, so uncomely, if our eye were more completely taken up with beholding the transcendent charms of the Lovely One!

Run, that you may come

Nearer to Jesus.

Seek after more near and dear fellowship with Him. He is not far away from us. He is absent as to His corporeal frame, but He is with us in spirit. He comes very close to us at times, when He finds us fit for the joy. We can never forget the golden moments and the hallowed places wherein He has manifested Himself unto us as He doth not unto the world. There are hours when our head is on the bosom of Christ. There are times when we sit at His feet and hear His words, and, looking up, behold His beauty, and are ravished therewith. Run towards Him till you are nearer to Him in communion than up to now you have been. This is worth running for; but you will not have it without running.

Keep on looking and running till you are with Him. Oh, I talk to you now about being with Him, but how soon this may be realized in the most literal sense! During my ministry in this place it has occurred two or three times, that when the service has ended, dear friends have essayed to go to their homes, but they have died in this House of Prayer. What must it be to go from this congregation to the assembly above? We do not know how near to Jesus on the throne we may now be. The sea-fog is around our vessel. Could we see before us, the white cliffs of our native shore are almost within touch. Think not that we are far out at sea. Within the next week, perhaps, some of us will see the King in His beauty. We may spend next Sunday in heaven! Does anybody shrink from such a prospect? No; each heir of heaven says "Amen; so let it be."

Formerly when great ships went to the Indies, the passengers would for a while toast the friends they had left behind. But when they were in the Indian Ocean they begun to drink the health of friends ahead. Though comparatively young, I have many, many friends who are in the land beyond, to which I am making my way. I salute the glorified. Some of the dearest and best people that ever lived were members of this church, but they are now safely landed on the celestial shore. They are waiting and watching for us. We are coming, brethren! We will be with you soon. Best of all, our Lord is there. Once crowned with thorns, His head is now radiant with the diadem of universal dominion. He will come to welcome us on that blessed shore. Hasten, oh, time! Be like a seraph with six wings, and bear us swiftly to that golden strand where we shall see the face of Him we love, and shall be "Far from this world of grief and sin, With God eternally shut in."

HARRISON THE REGICIDE.*

THERE was in the first half of the sixteenth century a Thomas Harrison, known as Harrison the Cromwellian. It is thought that he began life as a vender of beef in the open market, and he might have continued such indefinitely in his native England but for the quarrel between Charles I. and Parliament. Macaulay has made it unnecessary to speak at length of the points involved in that dispute. Briefly stated, the King claimed certain privileges by prerogative right. Parliament denied the claim, and protested against it in the name of the people of England. Theretofore there had been English kings and barons; then for the first time an English people was distinctly heard of. The dispute was waged through a long term of years. Parliaments came and went at the royal pleasure. At last one assembled to stay. In the meantime battles had been fought, and war grew into a normal condition of the country, finally involving Cromwell and his Roundhead battalions. With reputation born of hard fighting and much praying, not to speak of a skilful use of scriptural phrases, illustrative of sincere religious convictions, up, one of many, rose Thomas Harrison. Swapping his butcher's apron for a martial cloak, he at length appeared a lieutenant-general, beloved by the companies, and trusted by Cromwell. Nor were his talents of exclusive application to the field. One great day he was found in his seat, a member of the Parliament court in session for the trial of Charles I. There is an historical picture of the assemblage in ruffs and broad-brimmed, steeple-crowned hats, sitting solemn as ghosts, with the King over against them, face to face. A company of ghosts would have been doubtlessly of pleasanter aspect and sweeter effect to the monarch's troubled soul. Lieutenant-General Harrison was amongst them. Though now unrecognizable, we know he was there because of his signature; in a hand clear, legible, almost as bold as John Hancock's on an instrument of yet greater celebrity, may be read below the death-warrant which was the final resolution of the high court. Opposite it is his seal in red wax, on which, singularly enough, is stamped an eagle, winged like the bird on our silver dollar.

The staunchness of the man was subsequently tested. Upon the return of the Royalists to power, like other regicides, he might have fled to America, and found refuge in its impenetrable woods; that, however, was not his way. He remained at home, was seized, summarily convicted, and executed. Pepys was an eyewitness of the execution, and saw the heart of the Roundhead Lieutenant-General borne round as evidence that the son of the King had come to his own again.

Captain Harrison's Marriage.

When Fort Washington was established at Cincinnati William Henry Harrison was stationed there. Duty called the gallant captain to North Bend, and he became a guest at the Symmes residence. It was not long until he succumbed to the black eyes of Miss Anna. She was at that time twenty years of age, small, graceful, intelligent, and by general agreement beautiful. He was twenty-two years of age, with a reputation well established as a gallant soldier. The two were mutually pleased with each other,
